Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from The Institute of Museum and Library Services through an Indiana State Library LSTA Grant http://archive.org/details/harpersweeklyv12bonn

899
a8689

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 575.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1867, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE SISTERS OF MERCY.

WOMAN'S work in the war has been made the subject of a large volume, setting forth the great and good labor which the gentler sex did at home and in the hospital, and even in the field, during the rebellion; and every person who has watched their tenderness and bravery and devotion to the cause, has felt proud of the noble record. What a ponderous volume and what a noble record would the history of the charity of woman fill all ages make! The war served to organize and thus bring to notice, not to develop, the charity of woman. It caused the stream to run for a time in one great channel, not in thousands of smaller but not less purer rills, and thus it came to be more apparent to eyes that were unobservant of it in its more quiet progress.

The organized bands of charitable women which have always existed in this country and Europe have been and are numerous, but their labors have attracted little attention, for true Charity is unobtrusive, and avoids praise as well as scrutiny. Among the most diligent and useful of these organized bands are those known as "Sisters of Charity," "Sisters of Mercy," and "Sisters of the Holy Community"—each distinct in organization, though single in purpose. The Sisters have in view, besides other charities, the visitation of the sick in hospitals and homes, and of criminals in prisons, the instruction of poor girls, and the protection of women and children in distress. They have established in Europe and in this country "Houses of Mercy," or refuges, where girls of good character find shelter and assistance while out of employment.

The Sisters of Mercy are to be found daily on the streets of our principal cities engaged on errands of mercy. They appear to congregate where misery does only in the great cities, and here find their ample fields for charitable labor. The habit of the various orders is very similar, and noticeable for its simplicity. It usually consists of a black robe with long loose sleeves, and a hood of the same sombre hue, though within doors this attire is relieved by a white bonnet or veil, and sometimes by both. This costume appears to be a sort of protection; for, clothed in it, the Sisters of Mercy penetrate with safety the vilest haunts of vice in the city. It is a remarkable fact that none of them have ever met with insult or injury at the hands of the rough characters whom they are frequently compelled to encounter.

Our illustration of the Sisters of Mercy on this page represents two of the order on a visit to a condemned man. The sketch was made by Mr. BUSH in the Tombs in this city. The Sisters generally visit prisoners in pairs, and read to and pray with them. They are admitted at all times to the Tombs and other city prisons, and are generally very popular visitors with the prisoners.

THE OLD YEAR.

WITHOUT, the heavy darkness drippeth snow;
Within, the ruddy-fire-shine dances;
A sombre time for this good year to go,
Rich in sweet memories and fair romances!

Wert thou not more than my friend to me,
A faithful ally that coldly closes,
Grown old with the sorrows laid on thee,
Thy darkened days and all thy ruined roses!

I feel thy farewells years about me here,
Faint as a passing breath that lingers,
I dream of dying murmurs in my ear,
And airy touches of phantasmal fingers.

Oh, bleak, snow-bearded gales, your voices call
A requiem for the great departed,
While one by one the mournful moments fall
Like burial earth-clods to the broken-hearted!

THE NEW YEAR.

WASHINGTON IRVING missed one good point in the construction of his delightful legend of Rip Van Winkle when he failed to have his good-humored Dutch hero disappear on his target excursion of one on a New-Year's Day and return on another just twenty years after to find himself among a people whose New-Year-Day customs should be as strange to him as their faces. Our artists have remedied this defect in part, though the space of time which is supposed to have elapsed between the occurrences pictured in the two engravings on pages 12 and 13 is much greater than the twenty years during which Rip slept. One of these engravings represents the sports on New-Year's Night of the ancient Knickerbockers of a hundred years ago; the other illustrates the manner in which the same day is observed by their descendants of the present age. Disappearing a hundred years ago—or even twenty years ago—Rip would have recollected the New-Year holiday as a home festival—a fireside feast; coming back this New-Year's he would have found that it is looked upon as a sort of "outdoor sport." As Christmas is now preeminently the "home festival," New-Year's is the "away-from-home holiday;" on one day no one thinks of going abroad, and strangers are voted bores; on the other no man is expected to remain at home (all who do are voted bores), and strangers hold high carnival in the houses of their neighbors. Rip disappearing on a New-Year's Night a century ago would have left his Knickerbocker friends dancing by the dim light of a few tallow-candles and the flickering glare of a great wood-fire to the merry music of the fiddle and violoncello, or sitting quietly in a corner occupying over knitting or pipes and beer. Their New-Year's Day was merely the conclusion of the Christmas-week festival, and was enjoyed in something of the quiet, domestic style in which we of to-day enjoy our Thanksgiving. Returning this New-Year's Rip would find himself invited, through wide-opened doors, into some rich interior like that which we illustrate on page 13, and urged, after warming his chilled and rheumatic bones at the great hearths where the anthracite glows, to partake of that which cheers and strengthens and inspires, and sometimes inebriates, when too freely and injudiciously taken. And under the pressing circumstances of the case—the cold without and the warm entreaty within—the most moral and temperate of Rip Van Winkles, or Van Rensselaers, or Van Twillers, or any of their descendants, would be apt to break all temperance resolves and exclaim with the inimitable Rip of JOE JEFFERSON:

"Well, dis time don't count. Here ish your health and your families' health, and may you live long and prosper!"

When this which we write shall have reached the eyes of those for whom it is intended—and who, we trust, read the Weekly with as much genuine pleasure as that which we enjoy in its preparation—they will have just entered on the festivities of the Christmas week, and New-Year's Day, the jolly climax of the merry holidays, will still be before them, with all its promises of enjoyment. We have already served at the annual Christmas feast, and wished our many thousands of friendly readers "A merry Christmas," and we now coin on the first of our New Year calls. The customs of the day have changed, as all things change; but they have never been at any time entirely unobserved; and it will, we hope, always be customary to wish our friends as we do now, "A happy New Year!"

THE SISTERS OF MERCY.—[DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1868.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW-YEAR.

CHRISTMAS returns, the genial, generous season, when the mind is involuntarily full of the loveliest figures of domestic joy and the romance of the fireside, the feast that makes winter beautiful and the old young. Our Christmas traditions are a curious blending of Christian and Pagan; but they are all humane and tender, they all repeat the first Christmas carol of peace and good will.

We do not in America, indeed, hear the Waits on Christmas-eve, but we hear the chimes; and if we do not kiss under the mistletoe, it is only the mistletoe that is wanting. As for Santa Claus, he was never so reverend and so prodigal a saint as with us. The old English Christmas, which survives in poetry, and story, and imagination, was mingled of spiritual and material. The boar's head was brought into the college hall to the chanting of hymns. The church is opened and the plum-pudding is served. Indeed, immense good cheer is the counterpart of the most exquisite religious remembrance at this season. Hospitality is the Christmas virtue. It is Christianity in practice. It is symbolically visiting the fatherless and the widow by opening wide the door, and actually, by the fat turkey, which is made to smoke on many a grateful table which would otherwise go bare.

Yet because it is the home festival it is full of sad and tender memories. Christmas makes us Swedenborgians. The lost sit with us, and walk, and play, and chasten with indescribable serenity the universal joy. This is the minor chord that perfects the melody.

"Evenings we knew,
Happy as this;
Faces we miss,
Pleasant to see.
Kind hearts and true,
Gentle and just,
Peace to your dust!
We sing round the tree."

With the New Year we look out again from the home window upon the world. Upon our part of it, at least, our eyes must rest with gratitude and joy. We are not, indeed, wholly at peace again. Political passion seethes, and the embers of a dying fire that raged and wasted so long glow and linger as they expire. But we have seen the great curse disappear which no reaction can restore; nor is there any trouble now apparent which sagacity and resolution will not remove. The year opens in which the great question will be decided whether the first results of the war shall be secured in a settlement of unparalleled mildness—a settlement which inflicts no punishment, and requires only equal rights—or whether that settlement must be deferred until sharp experience has taught us that no other is practicable. But as during the war there was a man whose patient and wise moderation persisted to the end, and won the whole loyal country to his support; so in the days that follow the war there is a man of the same simplicity, sagacity, and honesty, whose equal patience and perception and moderation win for him as universal a confidence, and will give him as high an honor.

WANTED—A CANDIDATE.

THE Democratic party are entering upon the presidential campaign with the ennobling cry of "Down with the nigger!" and if General HANCOCK will contrive to subject the Union men of every complexion in Louisiana to those who still hate the government of the United States, he will be the candidate of the Democratic party. Since he has shown a disposition to undo the work of SHERIDAN, and to foster the hope that somehow the political and social power of the state of Louisiana will be exclusively confided to worthy patriots like Mayor MONROE and his police, who engineered the New Orleans massacre of 1866, the Democratic papers have begun to perceive what a brilliant soldier, what an able and modest gentleman, and what an accomplished statesman General HANCOCK is.

General HANCOCK's military career was distinguished. He did not make a name among the most illustrious of the war, and, while it is associated with many gallant services, it is not identified with any great and decisive action. He was one of many brave and meritorious officers of whom perhaps more was popularly expected than was achieved. But his military career alone, however bright it may have been, would never have commended him to the purveyors of a candidate for the Democratic party. But when the vast and universal popularity of GRANT, founded both upon admiration of his resplendent service and confidence in his practical wisdom, revealed to the Democratic managers their doom—when Lieutenant-General SHERMAN declared that time would but deepen the infamy of the rebellion, and so ceased to be a possible Democratic candidate—they were compelled to scan the whole army list to discover who could furnish a military mask for the Democratic copperhead, and, luckily finding General HANCOCK "conciliating" in New Orleans, they have grasped at him; and, as we said, if he only continues to "conciliate," General HANCOCK will be the successor of General M'CLELLAN in the favor of the framers of the Chicago platform of '64.

Those builders are logical. They then declared in Chicago that the war was a failure, and they are now trying to make it so. They acted then under the counsel of VALLANDIGHAM, and with the co-operation of CLEMENT CLAY and the rebel chiefs, and they are now united with the same persons in hostility to the steady Union element of the rebel States. They represented then the spirit of hatred of equal rights, under the plea of State rights, and they maintain now the State right to destroy the equal rights of citizens. They still hold that the war was really the work of the Northern spirit, and that the Southern States were deeply wronged. They still adhere to caste and exclusive privilege. They still deny the fundamental principle of the American Government; and upon a platform of such hostilities and denials they will ask General HANCOCK to stand, unless he should betray some sympathy with justice, and generously insist that a loyal man should not be wholly subordinated to the disaffected citizens of the late rebel States.

RAILWAY EXTENSION EASTWARD.

WHILE our famed Pacific Railroad is pushing with gigantic strides across the continent to our western confines, we should not be unmindful of the rapid progress of our railway connections eastward. If the one overshadows the other, it is simply by reason of its greater extent in miles, or the magnitude of the resources and commercial connections which it is expected to develop. The Pacific Railroad adds 1565 miles to our great western railway system, and brings California within seven days of the great commercial metropolis of the continent. The link of about 200 miles, now in progress between Bangor, Maine, and St. John, New Brunswick, will unite the New England system of railway with that of the Lower British Provinces, which consists of 500 miles of line, either already constructed or in progress. The first touches the western limit on the Pacific; the other the eastern boundary on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Both together span the continent. Both will be in operation in 1870. What an achievement then, to make an uninterrupted journey by rail from ocean to ocean!

The benefits to accrue from the construction of the Pacific Railroad have been duly weighed and considered. We wish now to direct attention to those advantages which must surely follow the completion of our Eastern connection—an enterprise which has scarcely been publicly noticed, if indeed any considerable portion of our people are even aware of its existence and progress, but which nevertheless adds to our railway system 700 miles of line—equal to nearly one-half the length of the Pacific road.

In the first place, with respect to natural products and resources, the Lower Provinces are less valuable than the Pacific region only because their area is less. In gold, Nova Scotia is equally rich with California. Veins of ore have been opened in every part of it from one extremity to the other, and the aggregate yield is small only because the mines are not worked to any great extent. In 1862 the product was but $14,500. In four years it increased to more than half a million, and during the current year reached $600,000. The average number of men employed in the diggings is only 717 per diem, and the yield of gold per man $2 30. Where the mines are properly worked they are almost invariably worked at a profit, which can not be said of our Western mines; and the product is capable of being increased to an unlimited extent. The coal deposits of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia underlie a vast extent of surface. Some of the veins are more than thirty feet thick. The ore crops out of the surface in all directions. The number of acres under license in Nova Scotia alone amounts to over two thousand square miles—an area equal to seven times the entire workable area of the anthracite coal-fields of Pennsylvania. Upward of thirty collieries are in operation, and most of them are of easy access to tide-water, which is a consideration of the greatest importance. The yield per annum is now about 700,000 tons. It might be increased indefinitely by energy and capital. The iron deposits of both Provinces are also immensely rich and of the best quality, both for the manufacture of iron and steel. The Woodstock iron commands the highest price both in England and the United States. Gypsum also exists in unfailing supply, while beds of copper, lead, and antimony are by no means rare. We can barely allude to the wealth of timber which the forests of Maine and New Brunswick afford, and which will be brought nearer to market by the railroad—to the fish, the ice, the valuable stone quarries, the oats, potatoes, cattle, and other farm produce, which swell the resources of these valuable Provinces. One fact is incontrovertible, that convenient access to a country is the necessary condition of its development; and it is only the inaccessibility of these Provinces that has retarded their material advancement hitherto. Even now the mines are worked in great part by American capital; it is easy to foresee how much more the attention of Americans will be directed thither when the railroad shall be completed.

Another important consideration: This railway must become the route for the European mails, as well as of a large portion of the passenger traffic via Halifax, as the saving in time, comparing railroad with steamer, would be fully thirty hours. As a military road also, its importance to the United States can not be too highly estimated, both as a means for offense and defense. Again, it will, when finished, complete an unbroken line of communication between Montreal and Halifax, three hundred miles of which will lie within United States territory. This route from Montreal is twenty-five miles shorter than the proposed intercolonial road, and passes through a richer and much more populous section; for which reasons the most sagacious citizens of the New Dominion do not hesitate to predict for the latter a miserable failure. The contest was long and fierce between the Provincial advocates of the two lines, but now that the "Western Extension" line is a finality, the prospects of its projected rival look slim indeed.

The subject in hand deserves closer consideration than can be given in a single article. However, it will be readily perceived that the railroad must necessarily help to foster such a community of interests between our neighbors and ourselves as will lead to close political ties, while as an agent of reciprocal free trade it would contribute greatly to the common prosperity.

ENGLISH FEARS AND PERILS.

THE attempt to blow up the Clerkenwell prison in London to release a Fenian prisoner is but one of a series of events which seem to have aroused a kind of lurking fear in the country remotely akin to that caused by the "Irish night" long ago. It is, however, one of the incidents which illustrate very plainly the character of the present outbreak of the Irish disaffection. Nobody can doubt that there are very earnest enthusiasts among the Irish agitators. There are honest visionaries and scholars, often bearing historic Irish names, who cherish a belief in the final emancipation of Ireland from England, which is suggestive in its romantic intensity of the devotion to these dreams of the older English Republicans.

Such men do not suppose that a liberating army is likely to march through Ireland. They do not propose to array the Irish population against the trained troops of England. Against foreign foes England is armed. The assault of such foes is a rain of blows upon a shield. But an internal, immeasurable, mysterious conspiracy, intrenched in race and religion, and every where dispersed, is a poison in the blood. It is an immediate and perennial peril. The empire becomes weakened by demoralization, and the speculative enthusiasts would look upon it as the decline of England into a lesser, even a secondary power, which would be but the beginning of the end.

Such men see, too, that this movement is strong in England itself; it is not confined to Ireland. Moreover, it is not led by the priests, but seems to be strong despite them. It asserts itself, too, at a time which is remarkable in English history. A remarkable political reform has just been accomplished; a vigorous blow has been struck at class rule; and a total change of the traditional method of the British Government has been effected; in fact a democratic revolution has occurred under the auspices of the Tory party, led by a political adventurer. The most accomplished of British statesmen, the acknowledged Liberal leader, Mr. GLADSTONE—the most truly popular chief, Mr. BRIGHT—and the most brilliant of Conservative Whigs, Mr. ROBERT LOWE, have all been outstripped by Mr. DISRAELI, who is a very different kind of British Minister from WALPOLE, or CHATHAM, or PITT, or CANNING, or PEEL. Indeed, he seems not to be British at all, and yet, at the head of the most peculiarly British party, he not only carries the extraordinary reform in the suffrage, but the Ministry of which he is the master spirit refuses to resign when it is outvoted in the Commons. He merely smiles and says, "If you will not have my way, I will take yours"—a method which retains him permanently in office, and shocks every precedent of the British system.

While England is spell-bound by the brilliant audacity and Mephistophelian acuteness and adroitness of the minister, the Irish question presses more urgently than ever, and the Irish leaders of the kind of which we have spoken doubtless see in DISRAELI's prominence and power another sign of the essential national decay upon which they count. Their hope, as we said last week, is not reform, but independence. Their cry is Ireland for the Irish. Their argument is, that although conquered centuries ago, Ireland has never been subdued by England, and that in the nature of things there can be no peace until she has her own again. It is impossible to imagine England yielding to such a demand; but if she should yield it is still more impossible, if we might say so, to imagine the consequences.

Whatever, therefore, is now done—whether, as many of the English papers demand, the most rigorous treatment is shown to every troublesome Irishman, or a milder policy prevails, something must be done for Ireland. DISRAELI is meditating a plan, and JOHN BRIGHT in a late letter repeats his. In his judgment it is the land-tenure which is "the desperate malady which keeps your country in a state of chronic discontent and insurrection." He wishes, therefore, to make the Irish farmer an owner, to give him a better national sentiment, and to show him (hic labor!) that England is truly friendly. He would therefore have a Parliamentary Commission to buy large Irish estates of English owners and to sell them in existing farms to existing tenants, and upon easy terms. £5,000,000 to begin with would secure instant good results, and the process would go forward rapidly. In five years, he thinks, it would do much; in twenty it would change the aspect of things in Ireland.

Of course the Fenian alarm, which merely exasperates England, makes the adoption of any reasonable policy more difficult; but every nation seems unwilling to move in radical reforms until it is roughly seized and shaken.

GENERAL GRANT'S LETTER.

THE letter of General GRANT to the President upon the removal of STANTON and SHERIDAN is characteristic of the man. It shows the same supreme good sense which distinguishes GRANT as it did LINCOLN; the same sagacity and moderation, but clearness and firmness which endear him more and more to the country. In regard to Mr. STANTON the General reminds the President that the Tenure of Office Bill was intended especially to protect the Secretary of War, and concludes quietly: "The meaning of the law may be explained away by an astute lawyer, but common-sense and the views of the loyal people will give to it the effect intended by its framers." In speaking of SHERIDAN he gives him high praise in saying: "He is universally and deservedly beloved by the people who sustained this Government through its trials, and feared by those who would still be the enemies of the Government."

It seems to be impossible for any man to pretend further that he does not know what GRANT's views and sympathies are. Could he make them more clear; could he awaken profounder public confidence if he should write a letter advocating certain details of policy? On the contrary, if there be any thing which would disturb the feeling which the vast body of faithful Union men in the country entertain for General GRANT, it would be a letter from him "defining his position." Deep and permanent faith in public men at such a period as this is not founded upon what they say for a particular purpose, but is the result of the impression of their whole career.

This letter, written under a strong sense of public duty, shows that the General's opinion of the policy of reconstruction which has been adopted is that of the most intelligent men in the country. Supporting his friend SHERIDAN against the rebel pressure to which the President gladly yielded, he says that the assertion constantly made that the administration was dissatisfied with SHERIDAN "emboldened the opponents of the laws of Congress within his command to oppose him in every way in their power, and has rendered necessary measures which otherwise may never have been necessary." Those laws are to be repealed, or they are to control reconstruction. The Democratic party will go into the election clamoring for its repeal, and insulting SHERIDAN and all the "satraps" who enforced the law. The Republican party will insist that the principle of the law, namely, the equal rights of all the citizens, shall continue to inspire reconstruction. One of the two parties will succeed. There will not be a new party, and, of course, if the Republicans repeal the law they retire from the contest. Can there be any doubt, then, that General GRANT will be the Republican candidate as the representative of the Republican policy? He will be the President elected by the principle which maintained the war to its triumphal close.

THE HORRORS OF TRAVEL.

THE frightful disaster upon the Lake Shore Road, closely following that in Vermont, reminds us of the constant and peculiar peril which surrounds travel in this country. At this season, when the extreme cold apparently affects the iron of the wheels and rails, a very different rate of speed should be enforced upon all roads. An accident which is horribly destructive when a train is flying at thirty or forty miles an hour is very sure to be comparatively unimportant when the speed is reasonable. But the public ought not to forget its own share of the responsibility. The carelessness of Railroad management strictly corresponds to a very general eagerness of railroad travelers. Only a day or two after the late great snow-storm in New York a train upon the Hudson River Railroad was proceeding toward the city at a safe rate, carefully making its way with proper regard to brittle iron; but because it was going more slowly than usual the impatience and indignation of some of the passengers were extraordinary. They seemed solely anxious to go fast, whatever would possibly occur. And could their wishes have prevailed, and the train have been thrown from the track with appalling results, how many of the unreasonable passengers would not have been the first to denounce the recklessness of the managers!

There was another instance of this apparent want of common-sense at about the same time. During the wild gale of Thursday, the 12th of December, the Staten Island ferry-boat left after dark for Tompkinsville and the pleasure. One of the boats upon that side of the island had in the morning drifted before the gale, and in the bewilderment of the snow, which was like the densest fog, down the Narrows she was floating out to sea, when a vessel was observed which the captain of the ferry-boat chanced to know lay quite below his destination, and so, turning about, recovered his course. The boat first mentioned, upon putting away from its wharf, was instantly lost in the darkness. There was no light. The poor passengers were nearly a thousand; and the confusion and peril were indescribable. After straining and struggling in the storm for two-thirds of the distance, the rudder was disabled. The other rudder was rigged, the boat was headed for the city, and at last succeeded in reaching it after various escapes from collision. It was a perilous voyage, and only one upon which no man should have lightly ventured.

At about the same hour the boat for the north shore of the island came to leave. But knowing the chances the captain declined to depart. Nor did the most stringent entreaties and remonstrances, nor the plainest-spoken indignation, budge him one inch from his wise intention. His sturdily refused to yield to those who necessarily knew less of the matter than he. The courage of such action is as unusual as it is remarkable; nor have we heard of any captain who was better entitled to receive an honorary service of plate than he. A man who dares not to act foolishly, rarely.

As the winter massacre of travelers begins, the investigation of the Dean Richmond disaster of last summer ends in the removal of the pilot of the Erie Belle as the guilty cause of the collision. But this removal should not be allowed to be the last of the matter. It is the duty of the Grand Jury to indict as many of criminal carelessness occasioned the death of one man, and of how many more we shall never know. We hear of nothing done in the case of the four men burned to death in the car in Ohio; and this last sickening and indescribable tragedy will also pass, doubtless, without serious consequences to any body except the hapless victims. Why, in the awful!" and all that kind of it. But until something is done besides exclaiming, we shall have more and more reason to exclaim.

THE LATEST COMEDY.

THE President's Message to Congress about General HANCOCK is inexpressibly comical. Few men have ever contrived to make themselves so ridiculous as the President occasionally insists on appearing. He tells a solemn communication to state that an officer of the United States army acting under the law "announces that he will make the law the rule of his conduct." Of course he does. If he did not, he would suffer for it. And what is the law which General HANCOCK condescends to make the rule of his action? The law provides that it shall be his duty to protect all persons in their rights of person and property; and to this end he may allow local tribunals to try offenders, or if he chooses he may organize military tribunals for that purpose: "and all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be void." That law which the President declares that no legal State government exists in Louisiana or Texas, which are in General HANCOCK'S district; and that, under which congress admits representatives from them, all civil governments which exist in them shall be deemed provisional only.

This is part of the law which General HANCOCK, according to the President, "announces that he will make the rule of his conduct." And for making this law the rule of his conduct General SHERIDAN was removed by the same President. The President's elaborate innuendoes of insult to GRANT and SHERIDAN are simply ludicrous. Under cover of the platitudes truths he aims blows at the noblest, most patriotic, and most law-obeying men. The President's solemnly utters the commonplace truth that "when a military soldier, with unrestricted power in his hands to oppress his fellow-men, voluntarily forgoes the chance of gratifying his selfish ambition, and devotes himself to the duty of building up the liberties and strengthening the laws of his country, he presents an example of the highest public virtue that human nature is capable of reaching." Nothing can be more obvious or true. And yet this sentence is uttered solely for the purpose of sneering at a soldier who has shown exactly the spirit of WASHINGTON. The magnanimity and moderation of WASHINGTON were certainly not more conspicuous than those of General GRANT. And those from whom the liberties and equal rights of American citizens are most in danger are not Generals GRANT, SHERMAN, THOMAS, SHERIDAN, and the other heroes of the war, but their slanderers in civil life, from the White House to the office of BRICK POMEROY'S La Crosse Democrat.

The President commends General HANCOCK for saying that "the principles of constitutional liberty are still an inheritance of this people and ever should be." The General would seem to be contemplating the kind of Fourth of July oration that used to be heard in the old Slave States. "The principles of American liberty," as interpreted in Louisiana by JOHN SEDDELL and Mayor MONROE mean the absolute and hopeless degradation of the negro population. Are those the sublime principles and practices which General HANCOCK proposes to respect and restore? Let him ask rather, what the principles of American liberty are; and he will find the very first one to be fair play for all men. That is the fundamental American principle which the law of the United States seeks to enforce and maintain; and that is the principle which he tramples under foot when he revives the practices of SEDDELL and MONROE to serve the purposes of the enemies of equal liberty.

That the President should publish so comical an insult to the Congress and army of the United States would be amazing, were not its emotion remained in regard to any of his performances. And it is no less maladroit than comical as a political measure. Its object, of course, is to nominate General HANCOCK to the Democratic party as their candidate. Now the Democratic leaders are doubtless very glad to use the President as a means to serve their political opponents. But when a President elected by these opponents, and whom, three years ago, the Democrats solemnly denounced, acts as he now does, the Democratic party, it is but a more exquisite torm of the whole comedy.

TAKING POSSESSION OF EUROPE.

FROM all accounts Americans have lately been overrunning Europe in a way to startle our foreign friends and relations and relations. A foretelling Scotchman hazards the assertion that our countrymen will succeed eventually "in improving the breed of the inferior races of the continent;" while an Englishman declares that "for one Englishman nowadays traveling through Germany or Italy you may safely reckon two Americans." And we learn, is threatened with becoming an "American colony," and in Vienna "the head-waiters speak German-English with a Yankee twang." Driven from the strong-hold of ancient time, the English are intrenching themselves in Homburg and Boulogne; but even there, with meaning open and mouth shut, we look wistfully into the future, and would be glad to take out an insurance policy against dislodgment.

The outsiders stand aghast at the reckless Americans—at their unrestricted freedom, their unbridled extravagance, their magical influence over servants. Wherever these western tourists go prices rise; supply and demand are limited to their service; a new fashion in political and domestic economy starts up, and the old landmarks go down under the surges of the Far West. We are told that we little think what we are making the Continent too dear for any body else.

If we are really bent on this sort of business we put in a modest plea that our countrymen try to bring home "value received" in some kind of definite shape, so as to improve our home-sides and not merely our hotel bills. We also ask a fearful dearth of new thoughts and schemes. A cyclone is evidently imminent, or perchance a paralysis. Statesmen are in a Newfoundland fog, and people generally are badly addled. Europe can get into terrible trouble, and in two months, Bismarck presiding, can leap out of it into the open sunshine. Again, Europe is a miracle of economy, and even other nations—such as Austria and Russia—signify experience after most wasting declarations. Women abroad understand how to be elegant at small expense, and to be thrifty without damaging their respectability. Some of these ideas and habits could be exported by imported. We can, however, without any interference at the custom-house. Unfortunately, however, these things cost nothing, and they could not afford an enormous price they would be inevitably bought.

WATER-COLOR SOCIETY.

THE first annual exhibition of the American Society of Painters in Water Colors was open on the rooms of the National Academy, and no one who is interested in art in this country will need to see it. The spirit with which the Society was formed last year, and the remarkably good works which were then exhibited, are the best augories of the success of the enterprise. Some of the finest and most famous of modern paintings are in water color; and the reader of Ruskin will remember the noble series of TURNER'S—praises which do not seem extravagant to those who have seen the works.

A WALL STREET SCENE.

REVEREND NEWMAN HALL, writing to the Christian Times, thus describes his experiences in Wall Street:

Yesterday morning I saw a strange scene. I was taken to Wall Street and the Stock Exchange. I never heard such an uproar as was caused by the valedictions of the merchants and brokers buying and selling stock. Suddenly the President struck his hammer for silence, and introduced me, alluding to the part I had taken, with others, during the war. Immediately the crowd of busy traffickers uncovered, and gathered round to listen to the few words which I was thus unexpectedly called upon to address to them. I assured them that the great mass of our nation cherished the most friendly feeling to America, and expressed my hope that the two nations might ever be united in the closest alliance. At the end of my address they cheered heartily, and sang "God save the Queen." Then the clamor recommenced, and the intense excitement in bidding for "stock" which had preceded this episode. As this, I am told, is often recorded except to their own distinguished generals, I regarded it as an additional proof—and, of course, of my more personal compliment—but of the desire for friendship between the nations, and of the deep appreciation of British sympathy in their late struggle.

PINE-TREES.

FROM a remote period in the organic history of the globe, as revealed by geological explorations, the cone-bearing trees have performed important functions. The pine is a tree of remote antiquity, and from its wide-spread distribution, carries with it the evidence of its importance in the economy of the earth's surface. By a peculiar structure the pine is able to resist tempests and storms that prostrate other trees of harder materials. Then, again, it thrives on sandy plains and elevated barren ridges where vegetation could hardly be sustained; and, finally, such is the character of pine forests that they hold a controlling influence over the quantity of water in all rivers and streamlets which have their rise near them, or on whose banks they stand. When the pine forests are cut down the quantity of running water has been ascertained to have greatly diminished in volume. Rivers once known as full and active are now small and sluggish.

But its leaves are peculiar. Differing from all others in the form of the sap slit into more than one, as it were, so that the surface exposed to the atmosphere exceeds by thousands of square inches almost all other trees. By that truly mechanical arrangement in structure high winds, rains, hail, and snows, do them no essential injury. Strip them off and the tree would die, because it could not breathe. With such leaves as it has the pine throws off an incalculable amount of oxygen for the purifying of the air, and absorbs carbon to itself from the air, which is destructive to life. These are two very curious functions. For unexplained reasons the pine is created, or even the warm-blooded land animals, the pines and coniferæ were at work gathering carbon out of the atmosphere, whereby coal-bearing rocks could be formed; and some idea may be formed of their unsurpassed activity when we reflect upon the coal-beds stored up in the bowels of the earth, which we are now using to advance civilization.

LITERARY.

"Mormonism: Its Origin, Rise, and Progress," by C. P. TUCKER; D. APPLETON & Co. Mormonism has become so tremendous a fact that, while Mormons may be entertained or not, the authentic story of its origin; of the characters of the men who were its first leaders; of the circumstances which have fostered it, which in its whole natural history, has become a very important matter of record. The work was to be done now or never. For those who knew JOSEPH SMITH before he became a prophet and religious king to hundreds of thousands of people, and who were familiar with the beginning of his public career, are very few. Mr. POMEROY TUCKER, the author of this work, happens to be one; and it is conceivable that he has told the tale, simply and clearly, although not without very strong prejudice against Prophet JOE and the whole Church Institution. He has been lived in the neighborhood of SMITH, and was personally familiar with all the incidents of finding the plates and collecting the believers. In this history, in which was a plot between SIDNEY RIGDON, a clever but unscrupulous clergyman, and JOE SMITH; and that the Mormon Bible is the work of a Rev. Mr. SPAULDING, intended by him either as an antiquarian quiz or a burlesque, which was stolen by RIGDON, who had been a workman in the office where it was to be printed. JOE SMITH Mr. TUCKER considers as a sly knave, and BRIGHAM YOUNG his worthy successor. The work is a valuable contribution to the history of religions, and is very entertaining as well as instructive.

THE PRINCE OF WALES'S PIN.

THE controversy between Colonel George Ward Nichols and Mr. George L. Brown respecting the ownership of a diamond pin given by the Prince of Wales in acknowledgment of the presentation by Colonel Nichols of a horse by Mr. Brown has been closed. Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has testified that Mr. Brown did not present the pin to the prince, but that Colonel Nichols did; and the Prince has decided, through his secretary, that he intended the pin for the gentleman who presented the picture—that is, Colonel Nichols.

THE ITALIAN CONFERENCE.

THE failure of the Conference on Italian affairs was owing to the refusal of the French Minister of Foreign State and M. Thiers in the French Corps Législatif to lend France influence at Rome to the labors of M. Thiers went further, and intimated that the pride of France would not permit her to withdraw her protection from the Pope. He added that France had been compelled to withdraw her troops from Mexico to preserve peace with the United States, to allow time for a great revolution against France and all monarchical Europe to be consummated in Germany, and to-day was talking of abandoning Italy for fear of her Prussian ally.

It is interesting and gratifying to know that the influence of the country in Mexican affairs is appreciated in Mexico as well as in France. In opening Congress on December 1 the President of Mexico referred in grateful terms to the sympathy, aid, and support received from the people of the United States.

THE FENIANS IN ENGLAND.

THE truly Hibernian method of rescuing prisoners by blowing them up with powder and nitro-glycerine is practiced in Belfast, Clerkenwell, and Kerry, in England, has inspired the British Cabinet with something of the same spirit; and Lord Derby has asked Parliament to suspend the habeas corpus in order to catch and punish the Fenians.

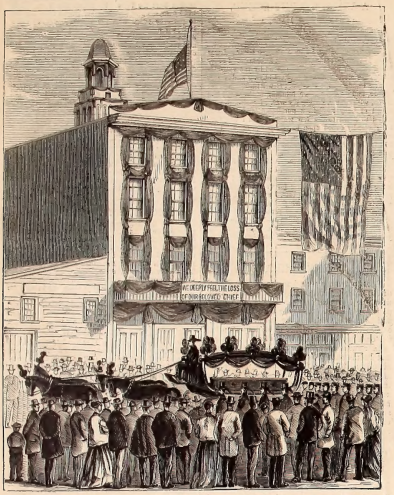
RECONSTRUCTION MEASURES.

SOME of the Southern elections threaten to fail in consequence of the provision requiring that one-half of the registered votes shall be cast before the constitutions of the Southern States are carried. Congress, apprehending the difficulties likely to grow out of this provision if adhered to, has taken steps to modify it. The House on December 18 passed a bill amendatory of the reconstruction acts, by which it is ordered that a majority only of votes shall be necessary to legalize an election on the adoption of a constitution. The same bill was referred by the Senate to its Judiciary Committee.

THE ABYSSINIAN WAR.

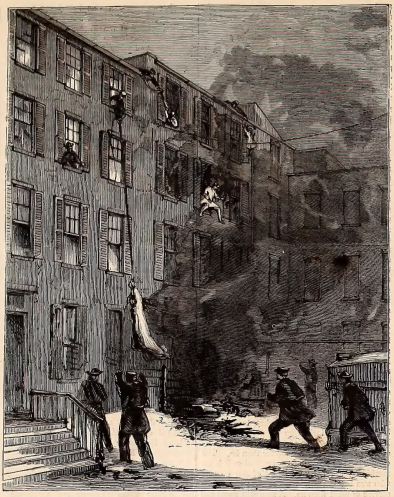
THE English expedition to Abyssinia has landed at Massowah, and has made an advance upon Antalo. As soon as King Theodore was apprized of the landing of the British troops he bestowed his capital of Debra Tabor and retreated into the mountains. In hunting for him and his darky warriors the British troops are likely to meet with something of our Indian war experience in the West.

THE PERUVIAN REBELLION SUPPRESSED.



EVEN since the election of Prado to the Presidency of Peru, which followed his successful repulse of the Spanish fleet in 1866, efforts have been made to depose him. The most formidable of these petty rebellions has just been suppressed by the victorious defeat of the rebels at Arequipa and in the north. Prado is recognized as one of the most energetic, able, and honest men who has been at the head of the Peruvian Republic for many years, and Peru has been exceedingly prosperous under his rule.

A CHAPTER OF DISASTERS.



IF is a favorite theory with many newspaper editors, and more particularly with newspaper reporters, that crime, accidents, great fires, great hurricanes, and great disasters generally, come in sorrows come—"not single spies, but in battalions"—and with a very indefinite idea of what they really mean, they frequently tell us in large type and displayed head-lines of "an epidemic of crime" or of "accidents." Of late we have not been treated to any such phrases on "disasters epidemically considered," and the writer has shown to his entire satisfaction that ever since the fashion was set in the time of NOAH, big floods have happened simultaneously in various parts of the world, as if convinced nature were determined on another deluge in spite of the rainbow. Recalling the late frequently-recurring railroad and other disasters, one is almost forced to accept the theory of the hour, and that without such sorrows and horrors do indeed come in battalions.

We are compelled in our capacity as a chronicler of news to illustrate its truth in the case of the Weekly—our first Number for the New Year—a complete chapter of disaster; and it is rendered still more melancholy from the fact that it is a continuation of similar chapters in the closing part compiled. Following hard upon the heels of the late fearful railroad tragedy in Ohio, in which four sisters were burned to death, we have now to record the terrible railroad accidents near Northfield, Vermont, and near Angola, New York, and the tenement-house fire in Mott street, New York. By these several disasters, happening within a few days of each other, seventy-five souls were hurried into eternity, and nearly as many persons maimed and otherwise injured for life!

The accident near Northfield, Vermont, on the Vermont Central Railroad on December 11, 1867, was the most destructive to life of any disaster which has ever occurred on the "Green Mountain State" since railroads were established. It occurred at what is known as the Hardwood Bridge—a structure which spans the river some three hundred feet in width. Its abutments were sixty feet in height, and its middle pier about seventy feet. This bridge was first erected on December 8, and a heavy force of laborers had been employed in erecting trestle-work for temporary use. This completed of these men, having dined at Northfield, were returning to their labors on December 11 when the terrible accident occurred. They were in a passenger car, and were being backed up to the works. By some unaccountable inattention the train—a passenger train—set at an unusual rate of speed—sometimes running it as high as thirty miles an hour. He was reminded of his strange mistake by his fireman, but not till too late to avert the terrible consequences. The car, with its freight of some ninety men, was precipitated down a perpendicular distance of sixty feet. The tender broke from the engine and instantly followed. The scene was a fearful one. Fifteen dead men, with more than as many others suffering from wounds more or less severe, lay in one heap, a mass of mangled humanity under the timbers. Of those who escaped some were saved by leaping from the car windows after they had perceived their danger.

FUNERAL OF CHIEF-ENGINEER LYLE OF PHILADELPHIA.—[SKETCHED BY FRANK S. TAFT.]

TENEMENT-HOUSE FIRE IN SECOND AVENUE, N. Y.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

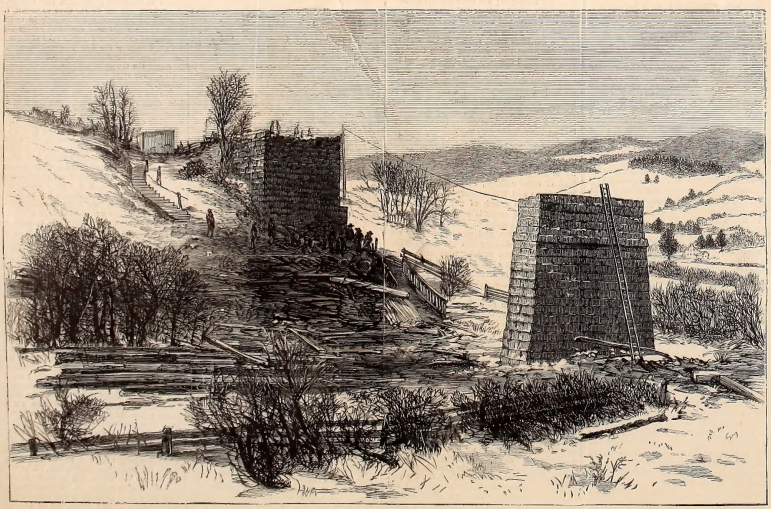
Our principal illustration on this page represents the scene of the disaster, and is from a photograph taken shortly after the accident.

The details of the still more horrible accident on the Lake Shore Railroad at Angola, New York, on December 18, represents that fifty persons were burned to death, and that as many more were wounded. The accident occurred at Big Sisters Bridge. The train was thrown from the track by the breaking of a car wheel; and the rear passenger car, in which were fifty-two passengers, went over an embankment twenty feet high. In the descent the car was shattered to pieces, and doubtless most of the passengers disabled. The stove which heated the car was overturned, and the car at once took fire from the coals thus scattered. Only two of the passengers escaped uninjured; the rest were burned to death, and all that was left of them when the fire was finally extinguished was a mass of blackened and charred, and unrecognizable remains.



The fire in Second Avenue, New York, on December 16, furnishes the subject of another illustration on this page. The building—a four-story and basement tenement-house—was occupied by seven families, comprising about thirty persons. The fire originated in the basement, and was very far advanced when discovered—so far, indeed, that all natural escape from the second, third, and fourth floors was cut off.

When the firemen and police arrived they found the narrow stairways filled with a dense volume of smoke, which was preventing the alarmed inmates of the upper floors making good their escape. A scene of the wildest terror and utter confusion then ensued among the unfortunate people up stairs, and their shrieks and cries were sufficient to appall the stoutest heart.

By the aid of the firemen most of those in danger were rescued, more or less bruised; but seven bodies were taken out with life extinct, and as many more were fatally injured.

FUNERAL OF CHIEF-ENGINEER LYLE.

We illustrate on this page the late imposing funeral at Philadelphia of DAVID M. LYLE, Chief Engineer of the Philadelphia Fire Department. There were sixty-nine fire companies represented, including several from other cities. The procession moved in six divisions, with several brass-bands which discoursed mournful music while the remains were being conveyed to the grave. The rear of the procession was brought up by thirty-five carriages, containing the Mayor, city Councils, heads of Departments, and invited guests.

RAILROAD DISASTER NEAR NORTHFIELD, VERMONT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY R. M. M'INTOSH.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.
RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

Prologue.

THE STORMING OF SERINGAPATAM (1799):
(Extracted from a Family Paper).

I.

I ADDRESS these lines—written in India—to my relatives in England.

My object is to explain the motive which has induced me to refuse the right hand of friendship to my cousin, John Herncastle. The reserve which I have hitherto maintained in this matter has been misinterpreted by members of my family whose good opinion I can not consent to forfeit. I request them to suspend their decision until they have read my narrative. And I declare, on my word of honor, that what I am now about to write is, strictly and literally, the truth.

The private difference between my cousin and me took its rise in a great public event in which we were both concerned—the storming of Seringapatam, under General Baird, on the 4th of May, 1799.

In order that the circumstances may be clearly understood, I must revert for a moment to the period before the assault, and to the stories current in our camp of the treasure in jewels and gold stored up in the Palace of Seringapatam.

II.

One of the wildest of these stories related to a Yellow Diamond—a famous gem in the native annals of India.

The earliest known traditions describe the stone as having been set in the forehead of the four-handed Indian god who typifies the Moon. Partly from its peculiar color, partly from a superstition which represented it as partaking of the nature of the deity whom it adorned, and growing and lessening in lustre with the waxing and waning of the moon, it first gained the name by which it continues to be known in India to this day—the name of THE MOONSTONE. A similar superstition was once prevalent, as I have heard, in ancient Greece and Rome; not applying, however (as in India), to a diamond devoted to the service of a god, but to a semi-transparent stone of the inferior order of gems, supposed to be affected by the lunar influences—the moon, in this latter case also, giving the name by which the stone is still known to watchmakers in our own time.

The adventures of the Yellow Diamond begin with the eleventh century of the Christian era.

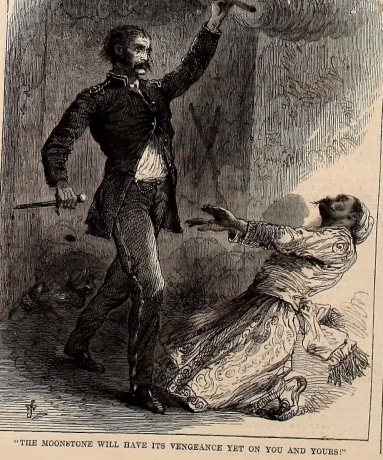
At that date the Mohammedan conqueror, Mahmood of Ghizni crossed India; seized on the holy city of Somnauth; and stripped of its treasures the famous temple which had stood for centuries—the shrine of Hindoo pilgrimage, and the wonder of the eastern world.

Of all the deities worshiped in the temple, the moon-god alone escaped the rapacity of the conquering Mohammedans. Preserved by three Brahmins, the inviolate deity, bearing the Yellow Diamond in its forehead, was removed by night, and was transported to the second of the sacred cities of India—the city of Benares.

Here, in a new shrine—in a hall inlaid with precious stones, under a roof supported by pillars of gold—the moon-god was set up and worshiped. Here, on the night when the shrine was completed, Vishnu the Preserver appeared to the three Brahmins in a dream.

The deity breathed the breath of his divinity on the Diamond in the forehead of the god. And the Brahmins knelt and hid their faces in their robes. The deity commanded that the Moonstone should be watched, from that time forth, by three priests in turn, night and day, to the end of the generations of men. And the Brahmins heard and bowed before his will. The deity predicted certain disaster to the presumptuous mortal who laid hands on the sacred gem, and to all of his house and name who received it after him. And the Brahmins caused the prophecy to be written over the gates of the shrine in letters of gold.

One age followed another—and still, generation after generation, the successors of the three Brahmins watched their priceless Moonstone, night and day. One age followed another, until the first years of the eighteenth Christian century saw the reign of Aurungzebe, Emperor of the Moguls. At his command have and rapine were let loose once more among the temples of the worship of Brahmah. The shrine of the four-handed god was polluted by the slaughter of sacred animals; the images of the deities were broken in pieces; and the Moonstone was seized by an officer of rank in the army of Aurungzebe.



Powerless to recover their lost treasure by open force, the three guardian priests followed and watched it in disguise. The generations succeeded each other; the warrior who had committed the sacrilege perished miserably; the Moonstone passed (carrying its curse with it) from one lawless Mohammedan hand to another; and still, through all chances and changes, the successors of the three guardian priests kept their watch, waiting the day when the will of Vishnu the Preserver should restore to them their sacred gem. Time rolled on from the first to the last years of the eighteenth Christian century. The Diamond fell into the possession of Tippoo, Sultan of Seringapatam, who caused it to be placed as an ornament in the handle of a dagger, and who commanded it to be kept among the choicest treasures of his armory. Even there—in the palace of the Sultan himself—the three guardian priests still watched in secret. There were three officers of Tippoo's household, strangers to the rest, who had won their master's confidence by confirming, or appearing to conform, to the Mussulman faith; and to those three men report pointed as the three priests in disguise.

III.

So, as told in our camp, ran the fanciful story of the Moonstone. It made no serious impression on any of us except my cousin—whose love of the marvelous induced him to believe it. On the night before the assault on Seringapatam he was absurdly angry with me, and with others, for treating the whole thing as a fable. A foolish wrangle followed; and Herncastle's unlucky temper got the better of him. He declared, in his boastful way, that we should see the Diamond on his finger if the English army took Seringapatam. The sally was saluted by a roar of laughter, and there, as we all thought that night, the thing ended.

Let me now take you on to the day of the assault.

My cousin and I were separated at the outset. I never saw him when we forded the river; when we planted the English flag in the first breach; when we crossed the ditch beyond; and, fighting

"THE MOONSTONE WILL HAVE ITS VENGEANCE YET ON YOU AND YOURS!"

THE BOY BECAME QUITE STIFF, AND STOOD LIKE A STATUE, LOOKING INTO THE EYE IN THE HOLLOW OF HIS HAND."

every inch of our way, entered the town. It was only at dusk, when the place was ours, and after General Baird himself had found the dead body of Tippoo under a heap of the slain, that Herncastle and I met.

We were each attached to a party sent out by the general's orders to prevent the plunder and confusion which followed our conquest. The camp-followers committed deplorable excesses; and, worse still, the soldiers found their way, by an unguarded door, into the treasury of the Palace, and loaded themselves with gold and jewels. It was in the court outside the treasury that my cousin and I met to enforce the laws of discipline on our own soldiers. Herncastle's fiery temper had been, as I could plainly see, exasperated to a kind of frenzy by the terrible slaughter through which we had passed. He was very unfit, in my opinion, to perform the duty that had been intrusted to him.

There was riot and confusion enough in the treasury, but no violence that I saw. The men (if I may use such an expression) fingered themselves good-humoredly. All sorts of rough jests and catch-words were bandied about among them; and the story of the Diamond turned up again unexpectedly, in the form of a mischievous joke. "Who's got the Moonstone?" was the rallying cry which perpetually caused the plundering at once to cease and to break out in another. While I was still vainly trying to establish order I heard a frightful yelling on the other side of the court-yard, and at once ran toward the cries, in dread of finding some new outbreak of the pillage in that direction.

I got to an open door, and saw the bodies of two Indians (by their dress, as I guessed, officers of the palace) lying across the entrance, dead.

A cry inside hurried me into a room, which appeared to serve as an armory. A third Indian, mortally wounded, was sinking at the feet of a man whose back was toward me. The man turned at the instant when I came in, and I saw John Herncastle, with a torch in one hand and a dagger dripping with blood in the other. A stone, set like a pommel, in the end of the dagger's handle, flashed in the torch-light, as he turned on me like a dream of fire. The dying Indian sank to his knees, pointed to the dagger in Herncastle's hand, and said, in his native language: "The Moonstone will have its vengeance yet on you and yours!" He spoke those words, and fell dead on the floor.

Before I could stir in the matter the men who had followed me across the court-yard crowded in. My cousin rushed to meet them, like a madman. "Clear the room!" he shouted to me, "and set a guard on the door!" The men fell back as he threw himself on them with his torch and his dagger. I put two sentinels of my own company, on whom I could rely, to keep the door. Through the remainder of the night I saw no more of my cousin.

Early in the morning, the plunder still going on, General Baird announced publicly by beat of drum that any thief detected in the fact, be he whom he might, should be hung. The provost-marshal was in attendance to prove that the general was in earnest; and in the throng that followed the proclamation Herncastle and I met again.

He held out his hand as usual, and said, "Good-morning."

I waited before I gave him my hand in return.

"Tell me first," I said, "how the Indian in the armory met his death, and what those last words meant when he pointed to the dagger in your hand."

"The Indian met his death, as I suppose, by a mortal wound," said Herncastle. "What his last words meant I know no more than you do."

I looked at him narrowly. His frenzy of the previous day had all calmed down. I determined to give him another chance.

"Is that all you have to tell me?" I asked.

He answered, "That is all."

I turned my back on him; and we have not spoken since.

IV.

I beg it to be understood that what I write here about my cousin (unless some necessity should arise for making it public) is for the information of the family only. Herncastle has said nothing that can justify me in speaking to our commanding officer. He has been taunted more than once about the Diamond, by those who recollect his angry outbreak before the assault; but, as may easily be imagined, his own remembrance of the circumstances under which I surprised him in the armory has been enough to keep him silent. It is reported that he means to exchange into another regiment, avowedly for the purpose of separating himself from me.

Whether this be true or not, I can not prevail upon myself to become his accuser—and I think with good reason. If I made the matter public, I have no evidence but moral evidence to bring forward. I have not only no proof that he killed the two men at the door; I can not even declare that he killed the third man inside—for I can not say that my own eyes saw the deed committed. It is true that I heard the dying Indian's words; but if those words were pronounced to be the ravings of delirium, how could I contradict the assertion from my own knowledge? Let our relatives, on either side, form their own opinion on what I have written, and decide for themselves whether the aversion I now feel toward this man is well or ill founded.

Although I attach no sort of credit to the fantastic Indian legend of the gem, I must acknowledge, before I conclude, that I am influenced by a certain superstition of my own in this matter. It is my conviction, or my delusion, no matter which, that crime brings its own fatality with it. I am not only persuaded of Herncastle's guilt; I am even fanciful enough to believe that he will live to regret it, if he keeps the Diamond; and that others will live to regret taking it from him, if he gives the Diamond away.

The Story

FIRST PERIOD. THE LOSS OF THE DIAMOND (1848).

The Events related by Gabriel Betteredge, house-steward in the service of Julia, Lady Verinder.

CHAPTER I.

IN the first part of Robinson Crusoe, at page one hundred and twenty-nine, you will find it thus written:

"Now I saw, though too late, the Folly of beginning a Work before we count the Cost, and before we judge rightly of our own Strength to go through with it."

Only yesterday I opened my Robinson Crusoe at that place. Only this morning (May twenty-first, eighteen hundred and fifty) came my lady's nephew, Mr. Franklin Blake, and held a short conversation with me, as follows:

"Betteredge," says Mr. Franklin, "I have been to the lawyer's about some family matters; and, among other things, we have been talking of the loss of the Indian Diamond, in my aunt's house in Yorkshire, two years since. The lawyer thinks, as I think, that the whole story ought, in the interests of truth, to be placed on record in writing—and the sooner the better."

Not perceiving his drift yet, and thinking it always desirable for the sake of peace and quietness to be on the lawyer's side, I said I thought so too. Mr. Franklin went on:

"In this matter of the Diamond," he said, "the characters of innocent people have suffered under suspicion already—as you know. The memories of innocent people may suffer, hereafter, for want of a record of the facts to which those who come after us can appeal. There can be no doubt that this strange family story of ours ought to be told. And I think, Betteredge, the lawyer and I together have hit on the right way of telling it."

Very satisfactory to both of them, no doubt. But I failed to see what I myself had to do with it, so far.

"We have certain events to relate," Mr. Franklin proceeded; "and we have certain persons concerned in those events who are capable of relating them. Starting from these plain facts, the lawyer's idea is that we should all write the story of the Moonstone in turn—as far as our own personal experience extends, and no farther. We must begin by showing how the Diamond first fell into the hands of my uncle Herncastle, when he was serving in India fifty years since. This prefatory narrative I have already got by me in the form of an old family paper, which relates the necessary particulars on the authority of an eye-witness. The next thing to do is to tell how the Diamond found its way into my aunt's house in Yorkshire, two years since, and how it came to be lost in little more than twelve hours afterward. Nobody knows as much as you do, Betteredge, about what went on in the house at that time. So you must take the pen in hand, and start the story."

In those terms I was informed of what my personal concern was with the matter of the Diamond. If you are curious to know what course I took under the circumstances, I beg to inform you that I did what you would probably have done in my place. I modestly declared myself to be quite unequal to the task imposed upon me—and I privately felt, all the time, that I was quite clever enough to perform it, if I only gave my own abilities a fair chance. Mr. Franklin, I imagine, must have seen my private sentiments in my face. He declined to believe in my modesty; and he insisted on giving my abilities a fair chance.

Two hours have passed since Mr. Franklin left me. As soon as his back was turned I went to my writing-desk to start the story. There I have sat helpless (in spite of my abilities) ever since; seeing what Robinson Crusoe saw, as quoted above—namely, the folly of beginning a work before we count the cost, and before we judge rightly of our own strength to go through with it. Please to remember, I opened the book by accident, at that bit, only the day before I rashly undertook the business now in hand; and, allow me to ask—if that isn't prophecy, what is?

I am not superstitious; I have read a heap of books in my time; I am a scholar in my own way. Though turned seventy, I possess an active memory, and legs to correspond. You are not to take it, if you please, as the saying of an ignorant man, when I express my opinion that such a book as Robinson Crusoe never was written, and never will be written again. I have tried that book for years—generally in combination with a pipe of tobacco—and I have found it my friend in need in all the necessities of this mortal life. When my spirits are bad—Robinson Crusoe. When I want advice—Robinson Crusoe. In past times, when my wife plagued me; in present times, when I have had a drop too much—Robinson Crusoe. I have worn out six stout Robinson Crusoes with hard work in my service. On my lady's last birthday she gave me a seventh. I took a drop too much on the strength of it; and Robinson Crusoe put me right again. Price four shillings and sixpence, bound in blue, with a picture into the bargain.

Still, this don't look much like starting the story of the Diamond—does it? I seem to be wandering off in search of Lord knows what, Lord knows where. We will take a new sheet of paper, if you please, and begin over again, with my best respects to you.

CHAPTER II.

I SPOKE of my lady a line or two back. Now the Diamond could never have been in our house, where it was lost, if it had not been made a present of to my lady's daughter; and my lady's daughter would never have been in existence to have the present, if it had not been for my lady who (with pain and travail) produced her into the world. Consequently, if we begin with my lady, we are pretty sure of beginning far enough back. And that, let me tell you, when you have got such a job as mine on hand, is a real comfort at starting.

If you know any thing of the fashionable world you have heard tell of the three beautiful Miss Herncastles. Miss Adelaide, Miss Caroline, and Miss Julia—this last being the youngest and the best of the three sisters, in my opinion; and I had opportunities of judging, as you shall presently see. I went into the service of the old lord, their father (thank God, we have got nothing to do with him in this business of the Diamond; he had the longest tongue and the shortest temper of any man, high or low, I ever met with)—I say, I went into the service of the old lord, as page-boy in waiting on the three honorable young ladies, at the age of fifteen years. There I lived till Miss Julia married the late Sir John Verinder. An excellent man, who only wanted somebody to manage him; and, between ourselves, he found somebody to do it; and what is more, he throve on it, and grew fat on it, and lived happy and died easy on it, dating from the day when my lady took him to church to be married to the day when she relieved him of his last breath and closed his eyes forever.

I have omitted to state that I went with the bride to the bride's husband's house and lands down here. "Sir John," she said, "I can't do without Gabriel Betteredge." "My lady," says Sir John, "I can't do without him, either." That was his way with her—and that was how I went into his service. It was all one to me where I went, so long as my mistress and I were together.

Seeing that my lady took an interest in the out-of-door work, and the farms, and such like, I took an interest in them too—with all the more reason that I was a small farmer's seventh son myself. My lady got me put under the bailiff, and I did my best, and gave satisfaction, and got promotion accordingly. Some years later, on the Monday as it might be, my lady says, "Sir John, your bailiff is a stupid old man. Pension him liberally, and let Gabriel Betteredge have his place." On the Tuesday as it might be, Sir John says, "My lady, the bailiff is pensioned liberally; and Gabriel Betteredge has got his place." You hear more than enough of married people living together miserably. Here is an example to the contrary. Let it be a warning to some of you, and an encouragement to others. In the mean time, I will go on with my story.

Well, there I was in clover you will say. Placed in a position of trust and honor, with a little cottage of my own to live in, with my rounds on the estate to occupy me in the morning and my accounts in the afternoon, and my pipe and my Robinson Crusoe in the evening—what more could I possibly want to make me happy? Remember what Adam wanted when he was alone in the Garden of Eden; and if you don't blame it in Adam, don't blame it in me.

The woman I fixed my eye on was the woman who kept house for me at my cottage. Her name was Selina Goby. I agree with the late William Cobbett about picking a wife. See that she chews her food well, and sets her foot down firmly on the ground when she walks, and you're all right. Selina Goby was all right in both these respects, which was one reason for marrying her. I had another reason, likewise, entirely of my own discovering. Selina, being a single woman, made me pay so much a week for her board and services. Selina, being my wife, couldn't charge for her board, and would have to give me her services for nothing. That was the point of view I looked at it from. Economy—with a dash of love. I put it to my mistress, as in duty bound, just as I have put it to myself.

"I have been turning Selina Goby over in my mind," I said, "and I think, my lady, it will be cheaper to marry her than to keep her."

My lady burst out laughing, and said she didn't know which to be most shocked at—my language or my principles. Some joke tickled her, I suppose, of the sort that you can't take unless you are a person of quality. Understanding nothing myself but that I was free to put it next to Selina, I went and put it accordingly. And what did Selina say? Lord! how little you must know of women, if you ask that. Of course, she said Yes.

As my time drew nearer, and there got to be talk of my having a new coat for the ceremony, my mind began to misgive me. I have compared notes with other men as to what they felt while they were in my interesting situation; and they have all acknowledged that, about a week before it happened, they privately wished themselves out of it. I went a trifle further than that myself; I actually rose up, as it were, and tried to get out of it. Not for nothing! I was too just a man to expect she would let me off for nothing. Compensation to the woman when the man gets out of it is one of the laws of England. In obedience to the laws, and after turning it over carefully in mind, I offered Selina Goby a feather-bed and fifty shillings to be off the bargain. You will hardly believe it, but it is nevertheless true—she was fool enough to refuse.

After that it was all over with me, of course. I got the new coat as cheap as I could, and I went through all the rest of it as cheap as I could. We were not a happy couple, and not a miserable couple. We were six of one, and half a dozen of the other. How it was I don't understand, but we always seemed to be getting, with the best of motives, in one another's way. When I wanted to go up stairs, there was my wife coming down; or when my wife wanted to go down, there was I coming up. That is married life, according to my experience of it.

After five years of misunderstandings on the stairs, it pleased an all-wise Providence to relieve us of each other by taking my wife. I was left with my little girl Penelope, and with no other child. Shortly afterward Sir John died, and my lady was left with her little girl Miss Rachel, and no other child. I have written to very poor purpose of my lady if you require to be told that my little Penelope was taken care of under my good mistress's own eye, and was sent to school, and taught, and made a sharp girl, and promoted, when old enough, to be Miss Rachel's own maid.

As for me, I went on with my business as bailiff year after year up to Christmas, 1847, when there came a change in my life. On that day my lady invited herself to a cup of tea alone with me in my cottage. She remarked that, reckoning from the year when I started as page-boy in the time of the old lord, I had been more than fifty years in her service, and she put into my hands a beautiful waistcoat of wool that she had worked herself, to keep me warm in the bitter winter weather.

I received this magnificent present quite at a loss to find words to thank my mistress with for the honor she had done me. To my great astonishment, it turned out, however, that the waistcoat was not an honor, but a bribe. My lady had discovered that I was getting old before I had discovered it myself, and she had come to my cottage to wheedle me (if I may use such an expression) into giving up my hard, out-of-door work as bailiff, and taking my ease for the rest of my days as steward in the house. I made as good a fight of it against the indignity of taking my ease as I could. But my mistress knew the weak side of me; she put it as a favor to herself. The dispute between us ended, after that, in my wiping my eyes, like an old fool, with my new woolen waistcoat, and saying I would think about it.

The perturbation in my mind, in regard to thinking about it, being truly dreadful after my lady had gone away, I applied the remedy which I have never yet found to fail me in cases of doubt and emergency. I smoked a pipe and took a turn at Robinson Crusoe. Before I had occupied myself with that extraordinary book five minutes I came on a comforting bit (page one hundred and fifty-eight), as follows: "To-day we love what to-morrow we hate." I saw my way clear directly. To-day I was all for continuing to be farm-bailiff; to-morrow, on the authority of Robinson Crusoe, I should be all the other way. Take myself to-morrow while in to-morrow's humor, and the thing was done. My mind being relieved in this manner, I went to sleep that night in the character of Lady Verinder's farm-bailiff, and I woke up the next morning in the character of Lady Verinder's house-steward. All quite comfortable, and all through Robinson Crusoe!

My daughter Penelope had just looked over my shoulder to see what I have done so far. She remarks that it is beautifully written, and every word of it true. But she points out one objection. She says, what I have done so far isn't in the least what I was wanted to do. I am asked to tell the story of the Diamond, and, instead of that, I have been telling the story of my own self. Curious, and quite beyond me to account for. I wonder whether the gentlemen who make a business and a living out of writing books ever find their own selves getting in the way of their subjects like me? If they do, I can feel for them. In the mean time, here is another false start, and more waste of good writing-paper. What's to be done now? Nothing that I know of, except for you to keep your temper, and for me to begin it all over again for the third time.

CHAPTER III.

THE question of how I am to start the story properly I have tried to settle in two ways. First, by scratching my head, which led to nothing. Second, by consulting my daughter Penelope, which has resulted in an entirely new idea.

Penelope's notion is that I should set down what happened regularly day by day, beginning with the day when we got the news that Mr. Franklin Blake was expected on a visit to the house. When you come to fix your memory with a date in this day, it is wonderful what your memory will pick up for you upon that compulsion. The only difficulty is to fetch out the dates, in the first place. This Penelope offers to do for me by looking into her own diary, which she was taught to keep when she was at school, and which she has gone on keeping ever since. In answer to an improvement on this notion, devised by myself, namely, that she should tell the story instead of me, out of her own diary, Penelope observes, with a fierce look and a red face, that her journal is for her own private eye, and that no living creature shall ever know what is in it but herself. When I inquire what this means, Penelope says, "Fiddlestick!" I say, Sweet-hearts.

Beginning, then, on Penelope's plan, I beg to mention that I was specially called one Wednesday morning into my lady's own sitting-room, the date being the twenty-fourth of May, eighteen hundred and forty-eight.

"Gabriel," says my lady, "here is news that will surprise you. Franklin Blake has come back from abroad. He has been staying with his father in London, and he is coming to us to-morrow to stop till next month and keep Rachel's birthday."

If I had had a hat in my hand nothing but respect would have prevented me from throwing that hat up to the ceiling. I had not seen Mr. Franklin since he was a boy, living along with us in this house. He was, out of all sight (as I remembered him), the nicest boy that ever spun a top or broke a window. Miss Rachel, who was present, and to whom I made that remark, observed, in return, that she remembered him as the most atrocious tyrant that ever tortured a doll, and the hardest driver of an exhausted little girl in string harness that England could produce. "I burn with indignation, and I ache with fatigue," was the way Miss Rachel summed it up, "when I think of Franklin Blake."

Hearing what I now tell you, you will naturally ask how it was that Mr. Franklin should have passed all the years, from the time when he was a boy to the time when he was a man, out of his own country. I answer, because his father had the misfortune to be next heir to a Dukedom, and not to be able to prove it.

In two words, this was how the thing happened:

My lady's eldest sister married the celebrated Mr. Blake—equally famous for his great riches and his great suit at law. How many years he went on worrying the tribunals of his country to turn out the Duke in possession, and to put himself in the Duke's place—how many lawyers' purses he filled to bursting, and how many otherwise harmless people he set by the ears together disputing whether he was right or wrong—is more by a great deal than I can reckon up. His wife died, and two of his three children died, before the tribunals could make up their minds to show him the door and take no more of his money. When it was all over, and the Duke in possession was left in possession, Mr. Blake discovered that the only way of being even with his country for the manner in which it had treated him was not to let his country have the honor of educating his son. "How can I trust my native institutions," was the form in which he put it, "after the way in which my native institutions have behaved to me?" Add to this that Mr. Blake disliked all boys, his own included, and you will admit that it could only end in one way. Master Franklin was taken from us in England, and was sent to institutions which his father could trust, in that superior country, Germany; Mr. Blake himself, you will observe, remaining snug in England, to improve his fellow-countrymen in the Parliament House, and to publish a statement on the subject of the Duke in possession, which has remained an unfinished statement from that day to this.

There! Thank God, that's told! Neither you nor I need trouble our heads any more about Mr. Blake, senior. Leave him to the Dukedom; and let you and I stick to the Diamond.

The Diamond takes us back to Mr. Franklin, who was the innocent means of bringing that unlucky jewel into the house.

Our nice boy didn't forget us after he went abroad. He wrote every now and then; sometimes to my lady, sometimes to Miss Rachel, and sometimes to me. We had had a transaction together before he left, which consisted of his borrowing of me a ball of string, a four-bladed knife, and seven-and-sixpence in money—the color of which last I have not seen, and never expect to see, again. His letters to me chiefly related to borrowing more. I heard, however, from my lady, how he got on abroad, as he grew in years and stature. After he had learned what the institutions of Germany could teach him, he gave the French a turn next, and the Italians a turn after that. They made him among them a sort of universal genius, as well as I could understand it. He wrote a little; he painted a little; he sang and played and composed a little—borrowing, as I suspect, in all these cases, just as he had borrowed from me. His mother's fortune (seven hundred a year) fell to him when he came of age, and ran through him as it might be through a sieve. The more money he had, the more he wanted: there was a hole in Mr. Franklin's pocket that nothing would sew up. Wherever he went the lively, easy way of him made him welcome.

He lived here, there, and every where; his address (as he used to put it himself) being "Post-office, Europe—to be left till called for." Twice over he made up his mind to come back to England and see us; and twice over (saving your presence) some unmentionable woman stood in the way and stopped him. His third attempt succeeded, as you know already from what my lady told me. On Thursday, the twenty-fifth of May, we were to see for the first time what our nice boy had grown to be as a man. He came of good blood; he had a high courage; and he was five-and-twenty years of age, by our reckoning. Now you know as much of Mr. Franklin Blake as I did—before Mr. Franklin Blake came down to our house.

The Thursday was as fine a summer's day as ever you saw; and my lady and Miss Rachel (not expecting Mr. Franklin till dinner-time) drove out to lunch with some friends in the neighborhood.

When they were gone I went and had a look at the bedroom which had been got ready for our guest, and saw that all was straight. Then, being butler in my lady's establishment, as well as steward (at my own particular request, mind, and because it vexed me to see any body but myself in possession of the key of the late Sir John's cellar)—then, I say, I fetched up some of our famous Latour claret, and set it in the warm summer air to take off the chill before dinner. Concluding to set myself in the warm summer air next—seeing that what is good for old claret is equally good for old age—I took up my bee-hive chair to go out into the back court, when I was stopped by hearing a sound like the soft beating of a drum on the terrace in front of my lady's residence.

Going round to the terrace, I found three mahogany-colored Indians, in white linen frocks and trowsers, looking up at the house.

The Indians, as I saw on looking closer, had small hand-drums slung in front of them. Behind them stood a little, delicate-looking, light-haired, English boy carrying a bag. I judged the fellows to be strolling conjurors, and the boy with the bag to be carrying the tools of their trade. One of the three, who spoke English, and who exhibited, I must own, the most elegant manners, presently informed me that my judgment was right. He requested permission to show his tricks in the presence of the lady of the house.

Now I am not a sour old man. I am generally all for amusement, and the last person in the world to distrust another person because he happens to be a few shades darker than myself. But the best of us have our weaknesses—and my weakness, when I know a family plate-basket to be out on a pantry-table, is to be instantly reminded of that basket by the sight of a strolling stranger whose manners are superior to my own. I accordingly informed the Indian that the lady of the house was out; and I warned him and his party off the premises. He made me a beautiful bow in return; and he and his party went off the premises. On my side, I returned to my bee-hive chair, and set myself down on the sunny side of the court, and fell (if the truth must be owned) not exactly into a sleep, but into the next best thing to it.

I was roused up by my daughter Penelope running out at me as if the house was on fire. What do you think she wanted? She wanted to have the three Indian jugglers instantly taken up; for this reason, namely, that they knew who was coming from London to visit us, and that they meant some mischief to Mr. Franklin Blake.

Mr. Franklin's name roused me. I opened my eyes, and made my girl explain herself.

It appeared that Penelope had just come from our lodge, where she had been having a gossip with the lodge-keeper's daughter. The two girls had seen the Indians pass out, after I had warned them off, followed by their little boy. Taking it into their heads that the boy was ill used by the foreigners—for no reason that I could discover, except that he was pretty and delicate-looking—the girls had stolen along the inner side of the hedge between us and the road, and had watched the proceedings of the foreigners on the outer side. These proceedings resulted in the performance of the following extraordinary tricks:

They first looked up the road and down the road, and made sure that they were alone. Then they all three faced about, and stared hard in the direction of our house. Then they jabbered and disputed in their own language, and looked at each other like men in doubt. Then they all turned to their little English boy, as if they expected him to help them. And then the chief Indian, who spoke English, said to the boy, "Hold out your hand."

On hearing those dreadful words, my daughter Penelope said she didn't know what prevented her heart from flying straight out of her. I thought privately that it might have been her stays. All I said, however, was, "You make my flesh creep." (Nota bene: women like these little compliments.)

Well, when the Indian said "Hold out your hand," the boy shrunk back, and shook his head, and said he didn't like it. The Indian thereupon asked him (not at all unkindly) whether he would like to be sent back to London, and left where they had found him, sleeping in an empty basket in a market—a hungry, ragged, and forsaken little boy. This, it seems, ended the difficulty. The little chap unwillingly held out his hand. Upon that the Indian took a bottle from his bosom, and poured out of it some black stuff, like ink, into the palm of the boy's hand. The Indian—first touching the boy's head, and making signs over it in the air—then said, "Look." The boy became quite stiff, and stood like a statue, looking into the ink in the hollow of his hand.

(So far, it seemed to me to be juggling, accompanied by a foolish waste of ink. I was beginning to feel sleepy again, when Penelope's next words stirred me up.)

The Indians looked up the road and down the road once more—and then the chief Indian said these words to the boy: "See the English gentleman from foreign parts."

The boy said, "I see him."

The Indian said, "Is it on the road to this house, and on no other, that the English gentleman will pass by us to-day?"

The boy said, "It is on the road to this house, and on no other, that the English gentleman will pass by you to-day."

The Indian put a second question—after waiting a little first. He said: "Has the English gentleman got It about him?"

The boy answered—also, after waiting a little first—"Yes."

The Indian put a third and last question: "Will the English gentleman come here, as he has promised to come, at the close of day?"

The boy said, "I can't tell."

The Indian asked why.

The boy said, "I am tired. The mist rises in my head, and puzzles me. I can see no more to-day."

With that the catechism ended. The chief Indian said something in his own language to the other two, pointing to the boy, and pointing toward the town, in which (as we afterward discovered) they were lodged. He then, after making more signs on the boy's head, blew on his forehead, and so woke him up with a start. After that they all went on their way toward the town, and the girls saw them no more.

Most things, they say, have a moral, if you only look for it. What was the moral of this?

The moral was, as I thought: First, that the chief juggler had heard Mr. Franklin's arrival talked of among the servants out-of-doors, and saw his way to making a little money by it. Second, that he and his men and boy (with a view to making the said money) meant to hang about till they saw my lady drive home, and then to come back, and foretell Mr. Franklin's arrival by magic. Third, that Penelope had heard them rehearsing their hocus-pocus, like actors rehearsing a play. Fourth, that I should do well to have an eye, that evening, on the plate-basket. Fifth, that Penelope would do well to cool down, and leave me, her father, to doze off again in the sun.

That appeared to me to be the sensible view. If you know any thing of the ways of young women, you won't be surprised to hear that Penelope wouldn't take it. The moral of the thing was serious, according to my daughter. She particularly reminded me of the Indian's third question. Has the English gentleman got It about him? "Oh, Father!" says Penelope, clasping her hands, "don't joke about this! What does 'It' mean?"

"We'll ask Mr. Franklin, my dear," I said, "if you can wait till Mr. Franklin comes." I winked to show I meant that in joke. Penelope took it quite seriously. My girl's earnestness tickled me. "What on earth should Mr. Franklin know about it?" I inquired. "Ask him," says Penelope. "And see whether he thinks it a laughing matter, too." With that parting shot my daughter left me.

I settled it with myself, when she was gone, that I really would ask Mr. Franklin—mainly to set Penelope's mind at rest. What was said between us, when I did ask him, later on that same day, you will find set out fully in its proper place. But as I don't wish to raise your expectations and then disappoint them, I will take leave to warn you here—before we go any further—that you won't find the ghost of a joke in our conversation on the subject of the jugglers. To my great surprise, Mr. Franklin, like Penelope, took the thing seriously. How seriously, you will understand, when I tell you that, in his opinion, "It" meant the Moonstone.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The storm—the beautiful, inconvenient, direful, delightful, drifting snow-storm! What would some poor, brainless people do if the ever-changing weather did not afford them a fruitful topic of conversation? And such an appropriate topic too! It is always suitable for Mr. Smalltalk, in an evening call upon Miss Littlesay, to remark that "we have had a terrible storm," or that "it is fearfully cold," or that "the wind blows shockingly," provided the storm, or the cold, or the wind are any ways in season. Fifteen minutes' intense thought on the part of Mr. Smalltalk—after he has tied his cravat in the latest style, and brushed his hair preparatory to the evening call—will enable him to decide with tolerable correctness what feature in the weather is most prominent, and to prepare himself to introduce the subject in a natural and graceful manner, after having made his bow, said "Good-evening," and deposited himself languidly in the softest easy-chair. Sudden atmospheric changes are an especial blessing to Mr. Smalltalk; it stirs and shakes up his mental faculties—as the earthquakes have shaken St. Thomas—and he sometimes ventures an original remark, which he has had a fair chance to do during the last week or two.

There are two great pictures which may be seen in New York city after a heavy snow-storm, such as came so early this winter. Merry children coasting and snow-balling; merry people, in elegant sleighs, with dashing horses, flying through the Park, through Harlem Lane, on the Bloomingdale Road, through Broadway and Fifth Avenue—this is one. Men shoveling snow from the car tracks; snow banks four feet high in the street; cars packed with living people as densely as if they were pickled fish, drivers cross, conductors cross, every body cross, horses struggling; weary men and women, late from their work, standing vainly at the corners of the streets in the hope of obtaining a place in some coming car; mails delayed, and business obstructed generally—this is the other. The snow brings a good deal of pleasure to New Yorkers; but it is a very expensive luxury, and costs New York city a deal of money and trouble.

Yet New York does not worry its head about money or trouble, especially during the holidays; and good, smooth sleighing is a great delight to the numerous callers on New-Year's Day. May wind and weather be favorable to the New-Year's greetings, and 1868 bring gladness and blessings!

A daring robbery was recently committed in Wall Street, in broad daylight, at one of the busiest hours of the day, and when the street was crowded with people. A bank clerk was returning from the Clearing-House with a black leather bag, containing $3,600,000 worth of checks, and $500 in bank notes, when he received a blow on the head which staggered him, but did not knock him down. The unknown assailant seized the bag, but the clerk clung to it with a desperate grasp. The robber stepped into a sleigh, and two other occupants set the horse attached to it in rapid motion. The clerk still clung to the valuable satchel which had been intrusted to him, and was dragged through the snow a distance of over a block, the sleigh actually passing the bank door before the robber had succeeded in compelling the determined clerk, by means of blows on the hands and face, to release his hold of the satchel. The robbers made their escape, for no policeman saw the attempt, and so rapidly was it done that the other witnesses did not realize what was the matter. The various banks whose checks had been stolen were notified and payment stopped. There have been several similar attempts at robbery within a couple of years; and doubtless there is a gang of villains who lie in wait for messengers who carry money through the streets. The practice of intrusting large sums of money to an unguarded and single individual is really an invitation to thieves.

A frightful calamity occurred in Second Avenue last week. About two o'clock in the morning a fire broke out in a four-story tenement-house. The firemen and police promptly arrived; but the flames had made such progress that it was evident they had been smouldering some time. Dense volumes of smoke filled the narrow stairways, and a scene of the wildest terror and confusion ensued. Every effort was made to assist the inmates of the upper floors to escape, but seven persons were found dead from suffocation. Several others were seriously injured, and two have since died. The passages and staircases of the house were all narrow, and built of wood. It is also stated that there was no fire-escape on the premises, and the fact that the scuttle-ladder broke beneath the weight of the persons attempting to ascend it reveals the character of the modes of egress. Several tragedies of a similar kind have occurred within the past two or three years.

What a careless people we Americans are! Statistics show that not less than a million letters were mailed, during the year covered by the Report of the Postmaster-General, without signatures and misdirected, or so badly directed that the address was totally unintelligible. In addition to these, more than a million and a half were restored to the writers by the care of the Dead-Letter Office. And yet we think we are always very careful in addressing the letters we individually send, and usually lay all the blame of lost letters upon the mails—the postmaster, the clerks, the carriers, or somebody besides our very careful selves has done the mischief. In general the address is written on the envelope in haste; we want to send the letter to be mailed, and it is all ready but directing it, and we seize a pen, dash off the name and place, and often never look to see if it is correctly written. Yet we know business-men of large correspondence who always make it a point to write within the letter the full address of the one to whom it is sent, and give special thought to the legible and careful direction of the envelope. And some of these say they have never known of a letter of theirs being lost.

The following advice is given in the Journal of Health to skaters who suffer during their recreation from cold feet: "Before starting for the ice, bathe your feet in cold water, dry them perfectly, and give them a good rubbing with a crash towel, put on a pair of woolen or heavy cotton stockings, and your feet will remain comfortably warm for three or four hours in the coldest weather."

It is not always safe to rely upon the current items of the newspapers, often hastily collected, and inserted without examination as facts. Not long ago a certain city paper contained, on a Monday morning, a carefully-prepared report of a sermon, stated to have been preached the day before by a well-known clerical gentleman at his church in this city. The clergyman in question was at the time thousands of miles away, across the ocean. We do not, therefore, altogether believe a statement that is going the rounds of the papers to the effect that in a town (which shall be unmentioned) in Connecticut, not a pastor has had a cent added to his pay since the war began, while the cost of living has more than doubled, and that the highest salary paid to a pastor there is $1000. But if by any means any other town has been unmindful of its pastors, New-Year's Day is a favorable opportunity to turn over a new leaf.

It is said—and how very pleasant is the knowledge!—that an oyster's heart beats perceptibly half an hour after it is swallowed. This is, so far as our information extends, equally true of oysters stewed or raw, broiled or fried; at least, no exceptions or qualifications are made in the statement from which we gather this interesting fact.

This cold winter weather has stirred up the young ladies of Mount Holyoke Seminary—so well known as an institution based on Christian principles and thorough instruction—to raise such a sum of money as will supply the means of more perfectly heating the building. The main halls are inadequately warmed, and as this institution has no fund for extra expenses, some of the energy which inspired its benevolent founder, Mary Lyon, seems to have fallen upon the pupils. They have earnestly commenced their work in combination with the alumni and friends of the Seminary, and will doubtless accomplish their object; for sensible and enthusiastic women seldom fail in what they undertake. The friends of this institution scattered throughout the country will wish them success; and many, doubtless, will show their interest in a tangible way.

A lecturer in England recently undertook to cure the undergraduates of Cambridge of smoking by discoursing to them on the evils of this practice. When the time for the lecture arrived he was somewhat surprised to find some four hundred students in attendance, each with a pipe surcharged with tobacco.

Weston's walking feat is thrown quite into the shade by some developments in regard to a Norwegian named Ernst, who was born in 1799, and commenced his career as a pedestrian in England when about 20 years of age. After some successful practice he agreed to walk from Paris to Moscow in 15 days, a bet of $20,000 having been made, of which, in case of success, he was to receive only $800. At noon on the 11th of June, 1822, he started from Place Vendôme, Paris, and on the morning of the 25th of June stood before the Kremlin, in Moscow, accomplishing the distance of 1600 English miles in 13½, instead of 15 days, or at an average of 107 miles a day. At another time Ernst walked 117 miles a day for 14 days consecutively. At other times he made 85 miles a day for 21 days running, and 82 miles per day during 60 days. These statements are said to be capable of the fullest and most satisfactory proof.

A good story is told of an old Dutch farmer, who, having just arrived at the dignity of justice of the peace, undertook to marry a couple who came to him for that purpose.

"Vell, you vants to be marrit, do you?" said he. "Vell, you loves dis woman so goot as any you ever see?"

"Yes," answered the man.

Then to the woman,

"Vell, do you love dis man so better as no man you never see?"

Lady hesitated, and he repeated,

"Vell, vell, do you likes him so well as to be his wife?"

"Oh, certainly," she answered, with a kind of titter.

"Vell, dat is all any reasonable man can expect. So you are marrit. I pronounce you man and wife."

The man then asked the justice what was to pay.

"Oh, nothing at all—nothing at all—you are welcome to it if it will do you any good."

One of the most remarkable surgical operations on record was performed some weeks ago upon a young gentleman residing at Tarrytown. He was thrown out of a wagon and injured so severely that his recovery was considered hopeless. It seems that his neck was dislocated—a circumstance that would without doubt have resulted fatally had it not been for the opportune arrival of a surgeon, who by a rapid and expert movement adjusted the broken atlas of the vertebræ. Since then the neck of the patient has been kept in a stationary position by means of instruments, which has resulted in his being pronounced out of danger.

Munich boasts of having the largest bronze statue in the world. This colossal figure represents the protectress of Bavaria with a huge lion standing at her side. In her right hand is a sword, and the left hand holds upward a wreath of flowers. The entire figure is in the most beautiful proportions, and is 65 feet high, weighing 230,000 pounds. It stands upon a granite pedestal 30 feet in height, through which a circular stairway leads to the head of the figure, where seats are provided for eight persons.

A resident in Père la Chaise, Paris, ordered, previous to his death, that a copy of La Patrie should be placed on his tombstone every morning. This eccentric request is duly carried out, and there on the grave can be seen a heap of musty old papers.

Men do get fearfully hardened and callous to the exhibition of tender and sensitive feeling in woman! They rough it in the outside world, and often their occupation quite blunts their perceptions! In proof of which statement is the case of a scientific man, who was devoted to the study of chemistry. His wife made some request of him one day which he refused to grant. Her heart was set on it, and she burst into a flood of tears. But the chemist bent over his acids, and powders, and bottles immovable as a rock. "Tears are useless, my dear," said he. "I have analyzed them; they contain a little phosphate of lime, some chlorid of sodium, and water!"

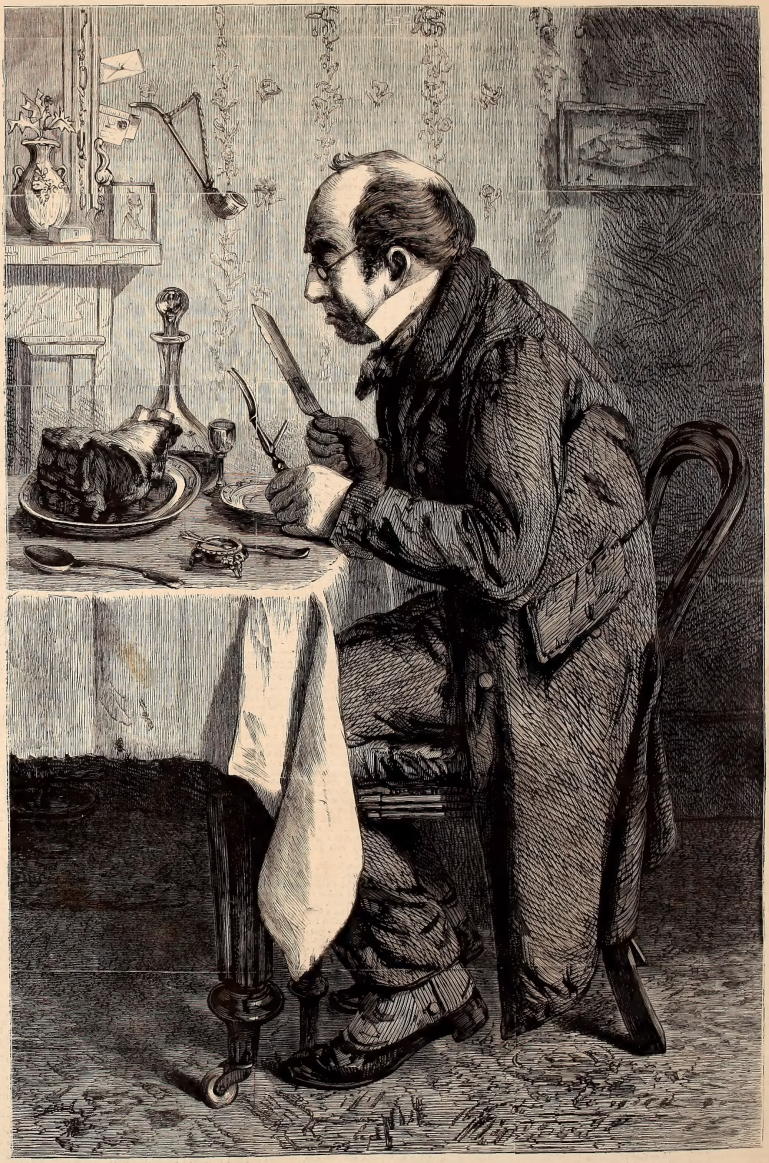
It is said that many persons have found by experiment that the light of coal-oil lamps is greatly improved by adding to the oil one-fourth its weight of common salt. It is reported to make the light much more brilliant and clear, to keep the wick clean, and prevent smoking. If this is really true, it would be a great comfort to many families, both in the city and in the country, who are dependent upon kerosene for light. The smoke of this oil is most disagreeable, and if the remedy could be introduced into the city cars, it would be an improvement.

"NOT FOR US."

Overhead the stars shine bright
  In the clear, cold winter sky;
And the windows, all alight,
  Shine upon the passers-by,
Moving on, a living tide,
  Through the busy, crowded street,
Where the walks on either side
  Echo with the tread of feet.

Keen and frosty is the air
  Of the chill December night,
Now the year that was so fair
  From the gray earth takes its flight;
And, as swiftly pass the days,
  Hearths grow warm with festal cheer;
And each heart with kindness glows
  Now the Christmas time is near.

Children in their snowy beds
  Dream of Santa Claus by night;
Older hearts and wiser heads
  Share with them their young delight;
Faces that, at other times,
  Darken with the shade of care,
Lay aside their anxious looks,
  And the smiles of gladness wear.



See what wonders here are met
  In this mammoth window, deep:
Dolls with flaxen curls and jet,
  Barking dogs and woolly sheep;
Some Aladdin's palace this,
  Reared by a magician's hand,
At whose portals, filled with light,
  Dazzled gazers, wondering, stand.

"Not for us the gifts within;
  Only these the sick may buy,"
Speaks the mother, pale and thin,
  To the child, whose wistful eye
Looks with longing on the toys
  Heaped in gay profusion there—
Painted harlequin and doll
  Glittering in the gaslight's glare.

"Not for us," ah! sharp the thorn
  In those words to her young heart;
Sad the bitter meaning born,
  Causing silent tears to start.
Is she all too young to know,
  Gazing on that window there,
Better gifts there are than those Waiting for us all—somewhere?

"NOT FOR US."—DRAWN BY W. S. L. JEWETT.—[SEE THE POEM, PAGE 7.]

THE BACHELOR'S CHRISTMAS DINNER.—[SEE PAGE 10.]

A BACHELOR'S DINNER.

IF there is any thing dismal in this bright world of ours it is a dinner—no matter how good—eaten alone; and for the good and sufficient cause that there can be no feast of reason where there is no flow of soul. An American restaurant, where each man dines alone in the midst of the crowded company, though relieved somewhat by the noise and confusion necessary to that manner of feeding by wholesale, is still a dull place, to which no sane man resorts except under the compulsion of business or haste. The dullest of all toasts—that which is "drank standing and in silence"—is only relieved from positive stupidity by the usual sentiment of respect and honor which accompanies it. But of all the dull meals that can possibly be conceived is that of a dinner on a great festal occasion eaten in solitude. As, for instance, a friendless bachelor's dinner on Christmas, such as we illustrate on page 9. To the poor old fellow who sits down to his solitary fare there is nothing cheering in the roast beef, nothing inspiring in the decanter of sherry, and only satire and reproach in the only mated articles in the room—the knife and fork. The dull condition of the room, the doleful aspect of the dinner-table, and the dismal expression of the bachelor's face are well delineated by the artist; and we shall expect that every sensible bachelor—if such things exist—will rise from the serious contemplation of this picture fully resolved to "go and sin no more" or longer by remaining a bachelor and taking his next Christmas dinner in silence and alone.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES.

By MISS ANNIE THOMAS,

Author of "Denis Donne," "Walter Goring," "Played Out," etc.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

HESITATION.

THE accident, which might have been fatal to the child—the dread she had labored under for a few moments of Frank being blamed for that accident—the remark of the little girl's grandmother—or something, she could not quite decide what, preyed painfully on Mrs. Bathurst's spirits as she rode home that day.

"It's all right, my darling. What makes you so sad now?" Frank said, rather reproachfully, coming close, and laying his hand on the pommel; "I can't bear to see you looking so cut up."

She tried hard to smile at him. She knew that this gloom, which would assert its sway over her, was a poor compliment to the man who had married her, and was bright and happy in his love for her, and who was kept in ignorance of the cause of such gloom. But she could not help herself. The smile was a very poor performance, and they both felt it to be so.

"My dear Trixy," he said, very seriously for Frank—"my dear Trixy, are you not well?"

"Yes, I am quite well, Frank," she said.

"Then are you not happy?" he asked, quickly.

"Very happy with you, Frank; do believe that."

"Then what are you not happy about? Trixy, it's no use. I seem to be very light and careless and unobservant, and all that sort of thing; but where I love I am not these things, and I love you; tell me, darling; I have a right to share your sorrow, if you have one."

"I was a little shocked just now, that was all," she said, falteringly; "the poor little child looked so helpless, and the mother seemed so hurt and grieved about it, and the grandmother seemed so hard and callous; it upset me a little."

"Yes, the old woman had an eye to the main chance," he said, contemptuously; "she thought to make an appeal to the pity and the purse-strings of the young married lady by being pitiless to that poor thing her daughter."

"And she only woke all my pity for the poor little child," Beatrix said, sadly—"the poor little innocent child, who does not know yet how much it is to be pitied."

"They never do feel it much in that class," he said, carelessly; "they have no traditions—"

"Frank, don't speak in that way," she said, imploringly; "I can't bear it—I can't, indeed!"

"But, my dear child, simply they have not."

"They have the traditions of virtue and purity just as much as we—as gentlepeople have."

"Yes, but they don't fall from such a height into such an abyss of shame as we do if any thing of the sort befalls us," he said, energetically; "it's a living thing in our order, that family pride which we may feel in looking back through generations and saying, with truth, that all the men were brave, and all the women spotless; it's a living thing, a power in the land; a—surely you agree with me, Trixy?"

"I do; indeed I do."

"Why, on earth, then, do you look as though I were advancing frightfully heterodox or startlingly-new opinions?" Then, after a minute's pause, he added, "It's not worth our while to argue on the subject the poor little child introduced, though. Let us get down to the cliffs, dear; the sea-breeze will bring back the color the fright banished. I will make you decide on a subject for me. I want to take a view on the coast, and you shall tell me which to take. Glorious all this is, to be sure! This time of year down here is like a poem of Keats's."

"What will have happened to us, I wonder, before

'Autumn bold,
With universal tinge of sober gold,'

be all about us?" Trixy said, as they turned into a narrow lane, in which the very spirit of spring seemed to have been embodied. The sloping banks of the high hedges were thickly covered with pale primroses and large, intensely violet dog-violets; forcing their way up among these, the young curly fronds of the hart's-tongue and royal male fern advanced their beautiful claim to consideration. Honey-suckle, in thick, full clusters, wreathed itself about the hedge-tops. The dark-green leaves and purely-blue flowers of the periwinkle went along in sinuous curves, and a few large-eyed daisies starred the way-side garden, which no culture could have improved. There were such depths of velvety moss—such imperial clumps of golden fern—such darkly-shaded nooks, wherein water trickled and hardy young cresses grew in delicious profusion—such dazzling masses of red-gold king-cups—such long, feathery grasses—such a wreath of verdure and color, in fact, that one grew to fear that nature had been too prodigal of her gifts in that lane, and that she must, of strong necessity, fall short of her favors as soon as she got out of it. But (and here is the wonder) in this lavish western land nature enriches every spot alike. Even her cliffs are covered with a daintily-colored carpeting of moss and lichen. Her rocks have shades of red and purple over them; her sands glitter with crushed crystals; her caves sparkle with stalactites. Her pastures and commons are green with a greenness on which the eye rests lingeringly, lovingly, to which it longs to return. Her moors are magnificent mosaics; for thereon red mosses and purple heather, yellow gorse and wild white flowers, forget-me-nots and pimpernel, bluebells and wild thyme are mingled by a faultless Artist's hand. And her lofty hills draw the clouds, and her dense woods shelter the land, so her beauty is never sun-burnt, but is always fresh as from a recent bath.

Mrs. Bathurst's thoughts were very far from the beauties of the land when they came out of the lane and got upon a wide down, at the extreme end of which the sea tumbled and roared over and amidst rocks that were limpet and weed covered. She had worked herself up into such a miserable state of mind that no external object could appeal to her. As she dwelt more and more in bitter secrecy upon this deep, terrible truth, which Marian had made known to her to-day, she could not clear her brow and give the smiles that he sought to the husband who had just asked for her hearty coincidence in his belief that it was a living thing in their order, that "pride in being able to look back through generations and avow that all the men were brave and all the women spotless."

She was very miserable—pitiably miserable—and there was no acting blood in poor Trixy. She could not seem to be more bright and light-hearted than she really was, though she knew that her depression would give rise to suspicions which she could not satisfactorily allay; moreover, she was one of those women on whom mental suffering has a speedy physical ill effect. Her side began to ache, and her head to feel heavy, and she could not at all enjoy the glorious burst of sea-view which Frank had told himself "must surely rouse her."

"I don't believe you care for the country a bit, Trixy," he said, disappointedly, when they had stood for about five minutes contemplating the surging waves in silence.

"What, Frank?—indeed I do!"

"Any way you don't care for this. You look bored. You will be happier when we get up to town, and you can go out and pace about in the Row."

"I wish we were not going to town," she said, energetically; "I do, Frank; I like being here far better; I am happier here."

"My dear child, you'll give some of your old friends rather a queer notion of your happiness if you look as you do now when you go back to the world; I confess I don't understand women." Frank spoke as if he were both hurt and offended.

"But Frank," she began.

"Oh, don't trouble yourself to explain any thing that you would rather leave unexplained, Beatrix," he interrupted, rather stiffly.

"You don't understand me," she said, almost piteously. And then she was going on to tell him that, as far as he was concerned, she was very happy, and perfectly well satisfied, and that he must not imagine she was sad or regretful whenever a shade of thought crept over her face. But he would scarcely listen to this, being nominally anxious to get "along the coast," and in reality being pained out of all power of listening.

"Frank," she said, when they had ridden some way in silence, "be a little lenient to a woman's foolish nervousness; I was very silly to suffer myself to be upset, that I admit. You won't be gloomy to me any longer?"

"Is it to me that the charge of gloominess this day applies?" Mr. Bathurst replied, carelessly. "I should not have thought so if I had been called upon to decide; however, it doesn't matter, gloom or sunshine, we evidently are not always to have honey-moon weather."

"Don't say that," she muttered, giving him a glance of yearning, pleading affection at the same time: "we have always had it till to-day, Frank, and to-day the gloom has come—"

"Heaven knows how!" he interrupted; "I don't, at least. I'm delighted to hear that it was a mere passing cloud; sadness and darkness don't agree with me. Dull looks irritate me, Trixy. If you have any thing to be dull about, tell me, and the mere speaking of it will exorcise the demon: if you sit and brood over things, and make yourself look old and ill, I shall be a good deal more annoyed than you will care to annoy me, I fancy."

"I am not in the habit of brooding over things."

"Yes, you are. All women are. No, I don't think Blanche would brood over any thing; I believe she would have it out and have done with it, whatever the consequences."

Trixy's heart began to beat painfully, as her husband spoke. It seemed to her that Frank must have an inkling of the truth, otherwise, why should he press on her the duty and propriety of confiding in him, and so extol Blanche for an honesty and truthfulness which she had not been called upon to practice? "If I told him, nothing could be gained, and a great deal would be lost," she repeated, to herself; "he would never be quite happy if he had the knowledge that his wife was basely born; and if he were unhappy about me, I should never know a peaceful hour." Then she fell to thinking the subject over again in all its bearings, and no amount of thought made it more manageable or less terrible, while it did, on the other hand, make her dull, sad, and silent again.

"It's rather unfortunate that we should be going to spend this evening alone, Trixy," Frank said, when they were riding home. "A third person would have broken this monotony, which is becoming oppressive to you."

"Now you know I am never so happy as when I am alone with you, Frank," she said, looking at him with tears in her eyes.

"You are very good to say so," he replied, laughing; "and as there is no one but Mrs. Lyon to be got to relieve us of ourselves, I wish I could believe you. It's that letter from your sister, Mrs. Sutton, has done it, I feel pretty sure. I suppose she has narrated one of her creditable escapades to you, and you're disgusted or 'wounded,' as women call it, at being connected with her. Now have I not hit the right nail on the head at last, Trixy?"

"No, indeed, no," she said, wishing heartily the while that her connection with Marian had been a far better authenticated thing than it was.

"Then I give you up for this evening," he said, laughing, "and shall fall back upon my original idea of asking Mrs. Lyon to come and dine with us. She will talk to me and smile at me, and you know I must be talked to and smiled at. Shall we stop in the village and ask her?"

"Yes," Trixy said, eagerly. She foresaw in Mrs. Lyon's presence a guard against further questioning and remark for that evening at least. Accordingly they stopped at Mrs. Lyon's cottage and asked her if she would be ready, as usual, if they sent down the carriage for her, and she acquiesced in the arrangement, and so Trixy had no great strain on her powers of concealment when she met her husband at dinner. That is to say, there was no positive and actual present strain on her powers of concealment; but, after all, it was but a brief respite, and so widely different in its resting power to a total cessation of dread. By-and-by, in one of the many long hours her husband and she must of necessity spend with each other without the saving presence of a third person, his mind would surely revert to Marian's letter and the way his wife had received it. And then, when his mind did so revert to the disturbing cause, in what way was she to set it at rest again? How was she ever to satisfy and reassure the man whom she had deceived, whom she had been compelled against her better judgment to deceive, because of the sins of others.

CHAPTER XXXV. (AND LAST).

TOLD!

THE end of May saw the Bathursts settled in town for the season and (Mrs. Bathurst, at least) satiated with society. The pretty, well-placed, newly-married woman was horribly unhappy, and her unhappiness was patent to her husband, and the cause of it was a sealed book. Very much to the surprise of the two or three who had known Beatrix best in her unmarried days, her tastes and feelings in the matter of friends and acquaintances appeared to have undergone a complete change. She shunned Blanche and sought Marian, and this was a change that did not commend itself to Frank Bathurst; for in spite of all the toleration shown and precautions taken by Mark Sutton, hard things were said of his wife. The presence of Ellen Bowden no longer gave a coloring of respectability to the intimacy with Mr. Eldale, for Ellen had gone home.

Ellen Bowden had gone home sorely discomfited and very sad. For several months she had seen bright visions and dreamed fair dreams, and now at last she was compelled to awake to a dingy reality. She had been dazzled and delighted into a feeling of something almost resembling affection for this pretty aunt, who was to her the tangible representative of the fabled world of fashion. It was hard on Ellen, therefore, to have that feeling dashed to pieces after months of cultivation by the discovery that she had been a cat's-paw in the fair hands of Mrs. Sutton. The dream of marrying Mr. Eldale had been a joyous one. The waking to the knowledge that she had been deceived only by her own vanity and Marian's vicious deceit (the man himself had thought too little of her even to try to deceive her) was a cruel one.

So she had gone home humbled and heart-stricken—gone home to wake to other truths which were equally hard and cruel. The old love of her childhood, which she had slighted and scorned, and foolishly tested, had snapped. She could have turned back to John Wilmot now and have loved him as well as ever. As well? she could have loved him better, for she had learned to appreciate his possession of certain qualities, from having found that others lacked them. But it was too late. He could not love her again; he could not trust her again. It had been a terrible wrench to his heart when she first forced it from her; but though the smarting was not over now, the hand that had wounded was powerless to heal. John Wilmot had buried his dead and could be friendly with her, but his love was gone from her, and the sole comfort she had was in the assertion his mother made that it would never centre on any one else. Theirs had been a brief romance; but after all, perhaps, the blight did not come to them sooner than it does to the great majority of the solitary men and women who live and die alone and apparently unloved.

After Miss Bowden's departure people talked in the way people will talk about Mr. Eldale's attentions to Mrs. Sutton. Marian had long ceased to desire him to marry her husband's niece. She liked to keep his adulation and his presents to herself; and after a time her vanity grew, and she became more reckless, even to the extent of boasting of these things, and then people talked.

"Whether there's harm in it or not, they know best themselves," Frank Bathurst said, angrily, to Beatrix one morning; "all I know is I won't have my wife mixed up with it. You shall not be driving about with Mrs. Sutton in a bonnet and burnous that Eldale has given her."

"What can I say to her when she asks me?"

"Say what you like; the truth is best. Say I won't let you. She'll hardly urge you to dispute your husband's authority, I suppose. If she wants a reason for my disliking it I will give it to her."

"Oh! pray don't, Frank," Trixy pleaded. She was in thrall to Marian, she knew, although they had never spoken of that secret which gave Marian the power.

"Then you must keep clear of her."

"I can't forbid my sister my house," Trixy said, proudly; "if you like to do it you will, but I can not."

"I don't want you to forbid her your house; let her come, but for Heaven's sake let her come respectably, and not bring that fellow Eldale. She goes to the theatre alone with him, and parades his devotion as none but a mad or a bad woman would."

"Oh dear, I'm miserably placed," Trixy said, sadly; "it will make a quarrel with Marian, but I will tell her if you like."

"Make a quarrel—who cares?" Frank replied. "For my own part, I so thoroughly dislike and despise Marian that I can't bear her to come in contact with my wife. Make a quarrel—the sooner the better—with such a combination of deceit and frivolity as Mrs. Sutton."

"Then I am to tell her—" Beatrix began, but Frank interrupted her.

"Tell her what you like, dear, only for my sake don't be seen so much with Marian. She tells her husband she is 'coming here' or she's 'going out with Trixy,' and he thinks it's all right, not supposing that Eldale is at her side always."

"I will try to see less of her," Trixy said, quietly.

"You don't mean to tell me that you approve of Marian's conduct?" Frank asked, quickly.

She would tell the truth where she dared.

"No, I do not; no, certainly I do not," she said, emphatically.

"Then why aid and abet and encourage her? My dear Trixy, you are inconsistent."

"I dare say I am," she replied; "every one is more or less inconsistent, apparently, to those who do not understand or care."

"When you tell me I don't understand you, you state a fact; that is your own fault, not mine. When you say I don't 'care' for you, Trixy, you tell an untruth. Marian's atmosphere has been more fatal to you than I feared even."

He left the room saying that, and Trixy was left to chew the cud of most bitter meditation alone. Here she was, through "no fault of her own," she told herself, "getting wrong with her husband in these early months of their married life, which ought to have been their happiest time." Through no fault of hers, and certainly through no fault of his, for Frank had not spoken until he had received great provocation. Mrs. Sutton was carrying on a flagrant flirtation with Mr. Eldale—a flirtation that apparently justified the hardest things that were said about her, and the things said were very hard. It was no wonder that Frank desired his wife to keep herself aloof from the contamination there is in such an example as Mrs. Sutton offered.

But how was she to keep herself aloof from it? Through the thin veil of affection and sympathy for her which Marian draped herself in, Trixy saw the utter, calculating selfishness of the woman. It was not love for her sister, and longing for wholesome female companionship which prompted Mrs. Sutton to seek Mrs. Bathurst and display herself as much as possible in Mrs. Bathurst's society. It was simply that she wanted the protection of Mrs. Bathurst's mantle of respectability to be shed over her. While her husband confided in, and the Bathursts countenanced her, the world had no right and no reason to talk, she said.

But this countenance and support from the Bathursts was to be withdrawn, and Trixy knew that Marian would bitterly resent such withdrawal. What form her resentment would take was a sad mystery still to Mrs. Bathurst; but that it would fall upon her heavily she did not doubt for one moment.

Marian came to her as usual that day just after luncheon—came with an earnest request that "Trixy would help her with a little difficulty. Mark had wanted her to go to Lionel's house with him that evening, and she had refused, pleading a previous engagement with Trixy. If Mark should chance to ask Trixy about it at any time, would she be careful?"

"Yes, I will be careful, Marian," Trixy replied; "that is, I will not say you had no engagement with me. I can't tell a story for you; besides, why won't you go to Lionel and Blanche?"

"Because I hate Blanche for one reason," Marian burst out, vehemently; "and because I have something better to do for another. You are scrupulous enough about deceiving my husband —how about deceiving your own?"

"At any rate, my deception toward Frank is not practiced to his discredit in any way; it is because I regard his feelings and his happiness so highly that I keep my secret."

"And I keep mine for the same reason," Marian laughed. "Murk would not be happier any more than Frank if his wife confided in him."

"How can you speak so lightly?"

"How can you ask such feeble questions? Will you do it, I ask you, Trixy?—or do you mean to force me to be conscientious and tell Frank? It will be less painful to me to endure his fine sensibilities now than it would have been some time since; for he has been cool to me lately. If he is as just, and kind, and loving as you declare him to be, he will not blame you."

"He will now," Trixy said, in a dejected tone. "Oh! Marian, how could I have been such a fool as to have trusted to your generosity? How can you take pleasure in the prospect of making us miserable?"

"I don't—it's the principle of self-preservation at work within me," Marian replied, carelessly. "Besides, I like to see romantic sentimental beasts proved the windy things they are. You wearied me with your vaunts of Frank's disinterested affection: 'his love is hardly worth the name' you give it, if it fails you for such a trifle."

"I have made it more than it was although I can't suffer it to grow weightier by concealment any longer," Trixy said, suddenly. "I will tell him myself."

Mrs. Sutton got up from her chair and went nearer to her sister, holding down her face to kiss Trixy's cheek.

"Don't be rash because I was cross and unkind for a minute," she said, in her sweetest, softest tones; "and you, poor reckless child, will risk your life's happiness in that way; you would break your heart if Frank grew cold to you; and" (she continued, in a sneer) "it would wound his pride he will grow cold to you, for your husband is so hero, Trixy—believe me."

"I had better risk my happiness myself than let you wreck it."

"But I will keep your secret still," Marian said, contemptuously. "You will not have a word to keep me, but I will hold my tongue to aid you."

"But, Marian, you do not want my help for any good," Trixy said, earnestly. "Frank was saying to-day that—that—"

"That what?" Marian asked, sharply.

"That people are talking about your flirtation with Mr. Eldale."

Blanche has been at him," Mrs. Sutton said, with her face burning with blushes. "Blanche and Lionel believe the worst of me, and they will make Edgar believe it, do the same."

"We rarely see Blanche and Lionel; they work hard and we are idlers; our hours don't agree."

"You may not see Blanche very often—but Frank does."

"Marian!"

"Curb your indignation: he does, I tell you; he was there yesterday morning, for Mark happened to call."

"And why should he not be there?" Trixy asked, impatiently. "My own brother—surely my husband may go to see him?"

"And his old love, your brother's wife; 'those who live in glass houses,' you remember? Frank had better not make any more remarks about Arthur Eldale and me. We are coming to luncheon with you to-morrow."

"Indeed! you must not, Marian; indeed it is not right; while such reports are circulated I will not receive Mr. Eldale and you alone."

Marian laughed.

"How grateful you are to me for respecting your secrets—it is not much I ask you in return."

"It is too much, Marian; you know it is too much; it would be a bad return indeed if I encouraged you."

"In what?"

"In your mad course: where can it end? do you ever ask yourself that question? do you ever tell yourself that flirtation is shame and wickedness in the way in which you try to make that man love you?"

"Try? I have not to try very much."

"And you can boast of it! Oh! Marian how can it end?"

"Perhaps"—well—better than you think," Marian replied, in confusion. "At any rate, understand that you won't improve the case by thwarting me and proving obstacles to my love; let us be friends, Trixy," she added, suddenly holding out her hand; "help me and I'll help you."

"I can not enter into such a compact; you are misled by a wild, wicked hope—help you, indeed. Marian. 'Help you' in such a matter—how can you ask me to do it?"

She put her hands pleadingly and lovingly on Mrs. Sutton's shoulders. "Give up this man and his flatteries," she whispered; "save yourself—that is all you do that!"

But Mrs. Sutton put the hands and the plea aside, and went away in anger, leaving Trixy feeling very sorrowful and uncertain about many things.

It was true, as she had said, that they saw very little of Lionel and Blanche. London distances are great obstacles to intercourse between people whose ways of life differ as widely as did those of the Butherists and Lionel Talbots. These latter had but little time for other recreation than each other's society in their intervals of work. It was a wearing business for them to get from their inaccessible suburb to Frank Bathurst's house in Belgravia; and when they did get there the probability was that Trixy was out, and nothing was left for them to do but to get home again by the same bewildering line of omnibuses which had brought them. It is true that they went to dinner parties and dances at the Bathursts, but then Trixy was as inaccessible to the individual as their suburb. Often, too, Mrs. Bathurst and her husband would ride or drive out to see Lionel and Blanche; but the former would be in his studio, and the latter writing in the room above him, and the visitors could not help the depressing idea that they were full interruptions to their host and hostess taking possession of them. Altogether the quadrilateral seemed a failure, and an amiable understanding on the subject, which Blanche worded as follows:

"While we are poor and busy, Trixy, we can't regard social claims in the daytime; we shall never fancy you neglect us or any nonsense of that sort; and when you are rich enough not to think that we are more absorbed in our occupation than we are obliged to be, I really believe that the less we are disturbed the better."

"But I don't like the idea of your not coming to see us at all, Lionel," Trixy said.

"And I should like the idea of coming often immensely, if it didn't involve so much trouble; if, when I got home from my brain aching and my imagination worn out, I could refresh both by getting on horseback, or into a comfortable carriage, I should like it very well, Trixy; but I can't do that; I have to walk out and take an omnibus, and then get in with all sorts of unpleasant people, and get dirty, and wearied in a state I hate; by the time I reach your house I'm worn out and not good company for you. Now don't be hurt; I should stay at home and make myself agreeable to my husband?"

"Well, certainly it is," Trixy said; "but I shall be very glad when you're not poor and busy any longer."

"So shall we," Blanche said, hesitatingly. "meantime we won't misunderstand each other."

This conversation had taken place some time before that one which has been recorded between Beatrix and Blanche on the subject of Mr. Eldale. It did, therefore, appear very strange to the young wife that her husband should have seen the Lionel Talbots without mentioning the fact to her. She brooded over the strangeness of it in solitude for a long time after Marian left her, and at last she resolved, for safety's sake, to make confession of going to see if Blanche would tell her of Frank's visit, and be altogether open.

Before she left the house Frank called and spoke to her.

"Marian has been here, I find," he said, standing in the doorway of Trixy's dressing-room in his hands.

"Yes, she has," Trixy said, hesitatingly.

"Have you any objection to my asking her questioned, rather mesmerizly, Beatrix thought.

"Nothing," she replied, coldly; then she looked at Frank, and recollected herself in the coldness, and went over to him and put her arms round his neck.

"Yes, Frank—I spoke to her about Mr. Eldale. I hurt her, I fear—at any rate I annoyed her."

"You made her understand that you would not lend yourself to that unhealthiness? for it is moral unhealthiness; you made her clearly understand that?"

"I did—and she was very much annoyed."

"And is that all you have to tell me, Trixy?" he said, holding her off and looking at her very fondly and very fixedly.

"Why do you ask?" she said, nervously.

"Why do I ask anything," he said, laying his hands, and turning away. "Good-by, dear—you're going out, I see. I won't question you again."

He closed the door as he said that, and she stood still for a minute wondering, and feeling a little frightened. "He is angry," she said; "but he would not question her again?" Had he a doubt—a suspicion? and if he had, by whom could they have been implanted?

She turned back to her glass and finished her dressing, feeling in a fury—feeling how futile that fury was—how feeble! and with the mortality and feebleness of it, how much the reverse of womanly it was! Futile and feeble! does not every woman feel? Futile and feeble is the strongest time or other of her life, echo the Egyptian queen's craving for masculine stature: "Had I thy inches thou should'st know there was a queen in Egypt!"

Some one had implanted a doubt and a suspicion in her husband's breast. There was a sting in her in their; and she was in a mood to sting in the dread she had that Blanche had done it—Blanche, that cousin whom her husband had loved once, and who took this means to secure her heart, that "being married" did not mean independent bliss by any means.

Blanche was at home when Mrs. Bathurst inquired; but Blanche was "very busy," she said, as she came forward into the room and held out her face to kiss her sister-in-law—"very busy finishing a little story that I have been asked to write for a new magazine," she continued, in explanation; "and I am not to be late with copy, you see, Trixy; they could do without me very well, and they would let me be quiet if I were not prompt in supplying their demand."

"You never have time for morning visitors, Blanche?" Trixy said.

"No, never. I really never have time to spare to them."

"Yet you sacrifice yourself sometimes to special friends and favorites?"

"Well, very rarely, Trixy. You're a special friend and favorite, and I am not going to sacrifice myself to you this morning, for instance. I am going to ask you to go and talk to Lionel, and to exercise me; I must write."

"Absurd affectation!" Mrs. Bathurst muttered to herself as Mrs. Lionel Talbot ushered her up to Lionel's studio; "the first writers of the day would not give themselves such airs about sparing a little time from their literary labors." After the manner of outsiders, she forgot that the first writers of the day can place their productions where and when they please, while those whose feet are still on the lowest round of the ladder are compelled to be actively grateful whenever an opportunity of serial publication is offered to them.

Lionel was putting the finishing strokes to a picture in which he had immortalized the (to him) surpassing beauty and charms of his wife in a subject that illustrated his idea of these words:

"Heavens! how desperately do I adore
Thy whining graces; to be thy defender
I hurl my darts at Caliban—
A very rest-cross knight—a stout Leander,
Might I be loved by thee like these of yore.
Light feet, dark-violet eyes, and parted hair,
Soft, dimpled hands, neck, neck, and heaving breast,
Are things on which the dazzled senses rest.
Till the fond fixed eyes forget they stare."

It was a lovely realization of Keats's glorious ideal, and Trixy felt more kindly toward Blanche as she stood gazing on these pictured charms.

"I believe you do desperately adore Blanche, Lionel," she said, after looking at it for a few moments.

"I should rather think I do," he replied. "Blanche is worth every one else in the world."

Blanche might be contented with your admiration now, I should think," his sister said, quickly. "You are not, and merely feel that she felt for help and sympathy overcame all her little, unworthy, jealous dreads, and she exclaimed, "'Tell me, Lal, why you are not yesterday?'"

"Yes," Lionel said, gravely, "he was here, Trixy. You are not unhappier for his having been here, and for what Blanche told him, are you?"

"What Blanche told him!—what do you mean?" Mrs. Bathurst asked, nervously. "Everybody seems to have something to tell my husband. First Marian threatens me, and now Blanche—"

Has rendered Marian's threat of no avail, happily," Mrs. Lionel Talbot interrupted, coming into the room, followed by Frank Bathurst, and then there was a little scene of explanation and reconciliation.

It appeared that Marian's secret respecting her sister's birth had become known to Mark Sutton also, and he had confided it to Blanche. The latter, for all her own press of work and "busy"ness generally, had found time to see and regret that constant companionship between Mrs. Sutton and Mr. Eldale was so offensive to Frank. Blanche understood how two sisters-in-law, and, understanding them, she felt assured that there was some other cause than compatibility at the bottom of the intimacy that was working ill for Trixy. After some talk with Frank, Blanche had felt the uneasiness on the receipt of Marian's letter was mentioned, Mrs. Lionel Talbot came to the conclusion that Mrs. Sutton was exerting undue influence over her sister. Then Mark Sutton, remembering his old promise of being "a friend," should a chance of being one to her ever be offered to him, came and gave counsel to Blanche on the subject. "Poor Trixy has been very ill," he said, "but she will never be happy till Frank knows all she does about herself. You see I can't speak to Frank myself without hurting Marian, and no man shall ever hear me blame my wife, Mrs. Talbot; but he ought to know it, indeed he ought; no good comes of a wretched deceiving her husband in even so small a thing."

"What would you have me do? I might be blamed for interfering."

"Risk that blame. You're a brave woman, and this stake of Beatrix's happiness is worth playing boldly for." He had said Marian Sutton must more than you can help—will you?" he added, wistfully.

"No, I will not," Blanche had said, with tears in her eyes; "and we will set Trixy straight with Frank, and he shall feel that your share in it counterbalances his and all your sister's."

"Thank you," Mark Sutton said. "I can't bear any one to think hardly of Marian, though she doesn't deserve it; Trixy does—I feel," he added, attempting to smile, and breaking down in the attempt.

So Blanche had written to Frank, and Frank had come at her request; and then she, being "brave enough to play boldly for the stake of Trixy's happiness," had told him the secret which had been so terrible to Beatrix. And he, quite satisfied with the strength and purity of the Bathurst family name, and with the fact that, dedicated to be shocked, or sorry, or shamed by the announcement of his wife's right to the bar-sinister. "But the dear Trixy sees of Mrs. Sutton the better, however hard my decision may seem to dear old Mark," he said, in conclusion.

So peace and understanding was restored to the principal members of the family, whose fortunes I have traced through a period of adversity. After a while prosperity dawned on them again, for Edgar, though he did not make a fortune, always lived within his income, and the money he had lost for him, and so the days came sooner than Blanche had anticipated when they were neither "too busy nor too poor" to see their friends and fulfill social claims.

Their peace was marred in a measure by a step which Mrs. Sutton took. She eloped with Mr. Eldale, and explained her reasons for doing so in a cleverly-worded letter of attempted vindication to Beatrix. "My aspirations were baffled by my family when I was a girl," she wrote; "I was forced into an uncongenial marriage; I shall realize them when I regain my freedom through a divorce; then Arthur Eldale will marry me at once."

She regained her freedom, for Mark Sutton died of what doctors called "heart complaint" before the divorce could be procured. But the high stakes for which the pretty widow had played with wicked skill and daring she lost after all. Directly she became attainable she had ceased to be interesting to Mr. Eldale. Accordingly, he left the path of evil, at the middle of a pretty girl of eighteen, who had called him "a dear charmer" before she met with Mrs. Sutton, and who mentioned that he was "so wicked" always, as if it were an additional charm. He believed that it was her "youth and innocence" which made her utterly regardless of his well-known disinclination from respectability; and as he was happy in that belief, she did not undeceive him until after they were married.

THE END.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Tom pompous epitaph of a close-fisted citizen closed with the following passage of Scripture: "He that hoppeth to lend, lendeth to the Lord." "Did any body," soliloquized Sandy, "but when that man died do Lord dotes' owe him a red cent?"

"AIN'T said old Mrs. Donnebury, "turning in a great dining." I've often felt the need of it! But would you believe it, I'm now sixty years old, and only know the names of three months in the year and them's spring, fall, and autumn! I larnt the names of them when I was a little child of a girl!"

A PASSAGE OF ARMS.

HARD-HEADED. "Hale's very dry, Sir?"

SOFT-HEADED. "Hasn't been wet much, I think."

HARD-HEADED (after a while, again advancing to the attack). "Hiem's very scurfy, Sir!"

UNFORTUNATE (still mistakenly cheerful). "Ya-as, I prefer it scurfy."

Assailant gives in defeated. Can not call hay hairwater this time.

THE SONG OF THE HORSE.

A poor old stage-horse, lank and thin,
With much else than bones within,
A jog along, week out, week in,
Dull-eyed, dull-pated, and morally fed,
Jammed in the side and jerked by the head—
And the thing I can't do with make out
Is, what on earth it's all about.

Why was I made to toil and tug
For full odd inside hours a day,
Two-legged, dumpy as a pug,
Who ads aside my life to flatter,
Or why was he made, for that matter?
For, if I needs must be a horse,
Why is it that I was not fated
To prance and curvet, head erect, mated,
Silver harnessed, sleek and fat,
With groom and blanket, and all that?

Here I go, day after day,
Rumbling and slipping down Broadway,
Dragging these curious biped things,
With flat-cage gown, and yet no wings—
Where they all go to I don't know,
Nor why in such a hurry so,
Nor what good are Heaven puts them to!

It wasn't my fault, you see, at all,
That my joints grew big, and my muscles small,
And so I missed of a rich man's stall.
But there, crooked, stupid, and lame as I,
Yet the meanest horse in a horse, you know,
And he rife can kick, and bite, and kick or blow,
As well as the gloss'est mare that go.
Ah! Lord, how holy will they see me at,
And when may the equine spirit go
Where glorified horses stand in a row,
Switching their bright tails to and fro,
Careless of other wheel or chain—
Where oats are always sprapos,
And flies don't grow—
Ah! me!

THE LATEST CURIOSITIES.

A fence made from the teeth of a scolding wife.

A plate of butter from the "cream of a joke."

The wish of a lover? "the chains of his heart."

The original brush used in painting "the signs of the times."

The latest contract with the "Trade Winds."

The child in which the dimples are.

A garment for the naked eye.

The hammer which is struck by the meeting.

Buckle to fasten a laughing-stock.

The animal that drew the lozenge.

Egg from a nest of thieves.

A basket of sewing by "Alls well."

A man down Dearborn once reproved for following a useless and demoralizing business, said: "You know, Doctor, that I must live." The latter did hate of every thing mean and hateful coolly replied that he did not "see the least necessity for that."

THE FACULTY OF ADVOCATES—Speech.

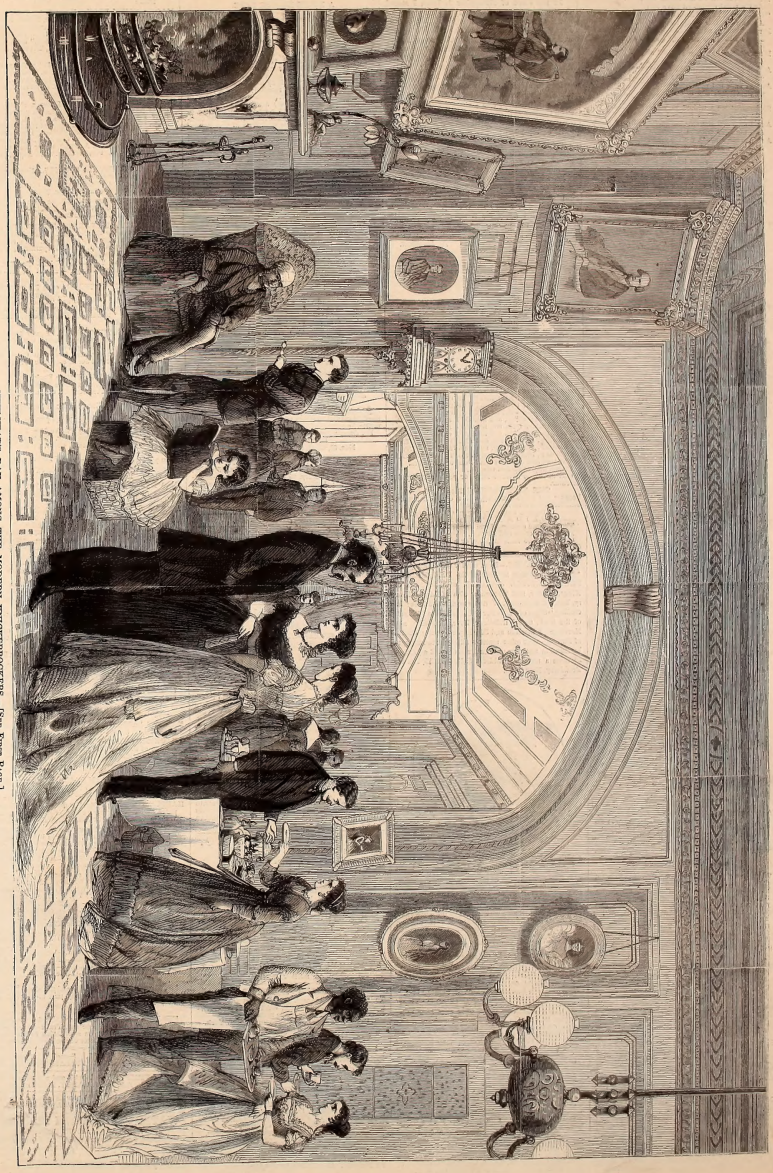
DON'T BE TOO ANXIOUS TO SOLVE A CONUNDRUM.—We know a man who got two black eyes in endeavoring to find out "the difference between a man and a woman fighting in the street."

When a person well replenishes a fire how does it feel? Comfortable.

A little four-year-old girl attended church in Bridgeport, Connecticut, recently, and upon returning home her mother asked her if she remembered the text. "Oh yes, mother," she said, "it was this: The Sunday Society will meet at Mrs. So-and-so's house on Monday next."

GIVE HIM HIS DUE.—It is altogether too absurd to say that "Man is not perfect"—who is there who has not met with many who were perfect strangers, some who were perfect rascals, and not a few who were perfect fools?

A HOUSE (MARRIED)—The Walpus.



"Tell me, ye angelic hosts, ye messengers of love, shall swindled printers hence below have no redress above?" The editor sighing as he replied, "Go to the knowledge given delinquents on the printer's books can never enter heaven."

A United States Judge is credited with the authorship of the following joke. He was recently trying a case of alleged infringement of patent. A long-boring machine was brought into the courtroom and for five hours might see it at work. The Judge looked at it a moment or two and then remarked: "I hope counsel will not be guilty of throwing dust in the eyes of the jury with this machine."

What resemblance is there between a fallen man and a fallen wave?—Both are crest-fallen.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY AMONG THE ANCIENT KNICKERBOCKERS.—Drawn by J. W. Ehninger.—[See First Page.]

NEW-YEAR'S DAY AMONG THE MODERN KNICKERBOCKERS.—[See First Page.]

BY COMMAND.

My king sat out on his castle wall,
And a royal command gave he;
"Come hither, come hither, ye people all,
And a fairy tale bring me.
For of grammar, and grammar, and orthodox hammer,
I have had quite enough," quoth he.

His majesty's kingdom is small as yet,
And his subjects are only two,
And it sometimes happens my liege will fret,
"Why, dear, I have only you?"
And in such sad case it becomes my place
The sovereign will to do.

So I perched me a willow, so white, so white,
The wand that the fairies love;
And I gathered the meadow-sweet, soft and light,
And the cowslips above.
And I made a couch for the first stray sprite
With the down of a silver dove.

Fairy, come home,
Fairy, come home,
Where hast thou wandered to?
Where dost thou roam?
Here is thy dwelling,
Here, by place;
Fairy king, fairy king,
Show me thy face.

Three times round the meadow
The little song did go,
Then there come a peal of bells
Chiming sad low.

"Coming, coming, coming,
No one need to wait,
Wearily beseeching,
At the fairy gate.
For the fairies, like the mortals,
Love to be loved,
And the fairy palace portals
Lightly are removed."

Then a rain of footsteps
Sounded on the sward,
And a page came kneeling—
"What wills my lord?"

"I will a tournament," said he,
"Where no one shall be killed,
Where all shall join the victory,
And be supremely skilled."

Up rode a fairy paladin
With cost of peacocks' mail,
Before the glistening green and gold
Sure not meant quail.

"I see no foe," the king complained.
"But wait," the page implored,
And then the fairy paladin
Drew out a strong sword;

He cut and thrust all round about,
At neither sight nor sound,
Until a dandy knight they saw
Lie dead upon the ground.

"The pledge is broken," cried the king:
"Not so," the knight replied,
"It was my meaner self I slew,
I live, though it has died."

Again the paladin rode forth,
And this time covered to seek
Some traitor that eluded him—
The little king spoke again,
"Where is the foe, sir knight, on whom
You would your vengeance wreak?"

"It was a falsehood," said the knight,
"That whispered of my friend;
I tracked it down, and hunted it,
And like the dolt end."

Once more the paladin rode forth
Beneath his horse's feet
There seemed to be no enemy
That he was loth to meet;
"Can you fear any thing, sir knight?"
His mail he did and sweet.

"It was a cruel injury,
An unforgiven pain,
But there it lies tranquilly,
It will not rise again."

Then lightly sprigs me the little king,
And seemed he sings,
"I toy will be a maiden,
And fight with evil things."

A most suitable holiday present to a smoker is undoubtedly a meerschaum pipe, which Messrs. Polman & Son sell at manufacturers' prices at their stores, 97 John St., near Nassau, and 607 Broadway, near Fourth St., N. Y. Also repairing, boiling, and amber work done. Send for circular to letter-box 3686.

Wertheim the Weiss Sewing Machine has been introduced as a competitor for public favor, it has almost infallibly won off the palm of victory. Within the past year it has taken more first-class premiums than any other; while recommendations from the very highest sources have been given unsolicited, testifying to its great value and declaring it the most perfected Sewing Machine of the world. The Independent says: "It is a very simple machine, and richly deserves the gratifying success it is receiving."
Office, 651 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHARLES DICKENS

In Photography by J. GURNEY & SON,
Nos. 707 and 709 Broadway, New York.

Messrs. GURNEY & SON have the pleasure to announce to the literary world and the admirers of Charles Dickens that they have secured the only photographic sittings that he has been or will be made of him during his visit to the United States, which the following letter will attest:

WESTMINSTER HOTEL,
NEW YORK, Dec. 10, 1867.

MY DEAR SIR,—I am have no hesitation in complying with your request that I will guarantee your service (Messrs. of Mr. Charles Dickens to be the only portraits for which he has sat or will sit in the United States. I do this with the knowledge and sanction of Mr. Dickens.

Yours, faith fully, GEORGE DOLBY.

N.B.—The pictures published are of three sizes—Cabinet, Boz, and Imperial, sent post paid, on receipt of price. The trade supplied at the usual discount.

No. 25 Maiden Lane, }
New York, Dec. 14, 1867. }

In my Card of November 1, 1865, I stated that "for the purpose of more fully supplying the wants of the public, and in order to prevent unscrupulous dealers from palming off inferior and worthless goods as the Morton Gold Pens, I shall hereafter sell no goods at wholesale except only to duly appointed and authorized Agents." To do this plan I have since strictly adhered.

In accordance with the agency system I have exercised to appoint these where I, by long-continued fair dealing, have acquired a reputation for honesty, responsibility, and promptness to whom the word the public have learned to place confidence. These agents have agreed to keep a full assortment of my goods on hand and to sell them at my published prices. Thus the public are supplied by them with just such pens as they want, either as to writing or price, and get a full equivalent for the money paid.

No agent is appointed to travel from place to place, or canvass the country,—that all who want a Morton Gold Pen must get it from the Local Agent or from headquarters.

None should apply for the Agency except in conformity to the above, the liberal discount "To Clubs" being sufficient inducement to all others. A. MORTON.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED.
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED.
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED.
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
The best and cheapest Gold Pens in the world.
Prices, fifty cents and upward.
Call at No. 25 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.

THE BEST HOLIDAY PRESENT,
because the most enduring, and the most elegant numerical character of the giver.

THE USEFUL, DURABLE, AND BEAUTIFUL
HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
The well-known Morton Gold Pens in the world.
Prices, fifty cents and upward.
Call at No. 25 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.

A NEW VOLUME.—Look out for the January Pictorial double number of the ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, with portraits of Kings, Queens, and Emperors; also of Patrick Henry, Edward Everett, F. W. Robertson, and others: including Origins of Character; Races of Men; Science of the Soul; Social Relations, Love, Courtship, and Marriage; Education and Self-Improvement; Choice of Pursuits, with other matters all ought to know, to be found in no other publication. Only 25 cents, or 30 cents a number. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE
of the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, New York, are now supplying families throughout the country with TEAS, warranted to be strictly pure, as they are imported, at cargo prices, thus saving to them five or six profits, which are usually added to average from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound. Clubs can be formed in any city or town, by any person, male or female, and to such we will take the trouble we will furnish them Teas and Coffees for their own use free of charge, to the amount of five per cent. on each order they send us. On application we will send, by mail, circular containing price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms for Agents to clubs.

We forward all goods, collect on delivery, by the Express Company and members of our Club can divide the Express charges equally among themselves.

PRICE LIST.

Colong (black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Mixed (green and black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Young Hyson (green), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 25.
Imperial (green), 70, $1 00, $1 25.
English Breakfast (black), 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20.
Japan, 80, $1, $1 25.
Gunpowder, $1 25, $1 50.
We import a very superior quality of Kiangsi Colong and Moyune Young Hyson Teas, put up in original Chinese packages, which we sell at $1 40 per lb. the Colong and $1 60 the Young Hyson, per package.
Roasted Coffees, 30c., 35c., 40c. per pound. Best Old Government Java, ground, 40c.
All good prices by us here are made much, and no others are genuine. Address all orders to GRAND CENTRAL DEPOT, Warehouses of
P. O. Box 574. T. Y. KELLEY & CO., 39 Vesey Street, New York.

Watches Superseded. The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, in handsome case, with glass shade, steel and metal works, white enamelled dial, keeping watch with second hand, and compass to find the precise correct time, and keep in order for two years. Sent by express to any part of the country. Price, $10 00. Trade supplied at the usual discount. Post free for $1 by W. Holt & Co., Watchmakers, cor. Gold Street and Fulton Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Important to Farmers.

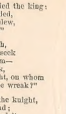
A HORSE DOCTOR FREE.

The attention of farmers, and of all owners of horses and Cattle, is called to the fact that the old established weekly newspaper, "WILKES' SPIRIT OF THE TIMES," employs upon its columns a celebrated veterinary Professor, whose duty it is to answer all questions relating to sick or injured horses and cattle that may be sent to the paper. Subscribers to copies of the Paper or to these questions appear in the next number of the paper, and are always given a prompt answer to question, thus enabling every body to receive all his medical treatment, and be kept informed of the remedy. These answers and prescriptions are given free to whoever may ask for them, whether subscribers to the paper or not: so that the whole cost of the prescription is the postage on a letter asking the complaint and the price of the next copy of the paper. Many remarkable cures of valuable animals have been made through the medium of the department. Owners of horses or cattle are therefore advised to go to any news-stand and buy a copy of the paper, turn to the veterinary department, and learn the features for themselves. The subscription price of "The Spirit" which is a high-class sporting journal of forty years' standing, is $5 a year. Address
EDITOR WILKES' SPIRIT,
201 William Street, New York.

THE STANDARD
AMERICAN BRILLIANT TABLE.
This is the best and only reliable Dining Table manufactured. It has been approved and is in daily use by the great majority of players, both amateur and professional.
Besides having en band Tables of all styles and finish, together with Balls, Cloth, Cues, and every article appertaining to billiards proper, we are manufacturing

TABLE FOR THE HOME CIRCLE,

Combining the Library Table, the Dining Table, and the Billiard Table, either of which can, with a minute's notice, be converted into its appropriate use.
For description and price address
PHELAN & COLLENDER,
Nos. 63, 65, 67, and 69 Crosby St., New York.



WINTER EVENING AMUSEMENTS. Parlor Fire Fireworks, 25 cents; Magic Purse, 25 cents; The Egyptian Mystery, 25 cents; Magic Cigar-Light-er, 25 cents; Book of Surprises, 25 cents; The Oriental Mystery, 25 cents; The Parlor Pistol, 65 cents; Chinese Parlor Sports, 25 cents; Explosive Soldiers, 25 cents; Magic Cards, 20 cents; The Magic Die, $1. and Game of All Kinds, 25 cents. Sent free to U. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau Street, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimens of Type, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
79 Courtlandt Street, New York.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIOIDE WATCH FACTORY.

Oroide case, a newly discovered combination, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and is well finished as the finest gold cases. These watches are made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled, and well finished, with a view to the strength required to wear and keep time for a number of years, and time, they have never been equaled by watches costing five times their price. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time, or we will present each purchaser with a new one. The first quality: Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For the small sum we may confer a watch of excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $50. Our Second quality watches as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent by express to be paid for at office of delivery, privilege of paying at Express Co. C. E. COLLINS & CO., 542 and 544 Nassau St., (up stairs), New York City.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

ARE PURCHASING AT AUCTION, and from every other source where IMMEDIATE CASH will COMMAND LOW PRICES,
SILKS, DRESS GOODS,
LACES, EMBROIDERIES, RIBBONS, HOSIERY, GLOVES, GENTLEMEN'S, LADIES', and CHILDREN'S UNDERCLOTHING.

HOUSE-FURNISHING MATERIALS

IN EVERY VARIETY,
Cloths, Clankings, Cassimeres, &c., &c., which they will continue to offer during this month at the present
EXTREMELY ATTRACTIVE PRICES.
BROADWAY, FOURTH STREET.

AGENTS WANTED.
To sell a new, elegant, perfumed STATIONERY PACKAGE, ENGRAVINGS, WATCHES, and JEWELRY. Great chance to make money.
HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman St., New York.

GOLD MEDAL PERFUMERY.

NAPOLEON III. awarded the Prize Medal, at the Paris Exposition, 1867, to R. & G. A. Wright, for their Best Toilet Soaps, Extracts, and Perfumeries. For sale by all the principal Druggists.

DESIRABLE PRESENTS. SPECTACLES AND EYE-GLASSES, Lorgnette, &c., with the celebrated BRAZILIAN PEBBLES, manufactured by SEMMONS, Oculist Optician, 609½ and 1193 Broadway.

OPERA, FIELD, and MARINE GLASSES of immense power and new designs. Thermometers, Barometers, Microscopes, Telescopes, Compasses, suitable for Presents. SEMMONS, Oculist Optician, 609½ and 1193 Broadway.

JUVENILE BOOKS for the HOLIDAYS. Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York:

MAC'S FAIRY BOOK. Home Fairy Tales (Contes de Fées Chez-Soi). By PAUL MACÉ. Author of "The Servants of the Stomach," &c. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH, Translator of "Martin's History of France," "Laboulaye's Fairy Book," &c. Handsomely Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

LABOULAYE'S FAIRY BOOK. Fairy Tales of All Nations. By EDOUARD LABOULAYE, Member of the Institute of France. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $2 50.

HOMES OF THE LAND: Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principles of Construction. By Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History," &c. With over 140 Illustrations, drawn on Wood by G. Pearson, from Original Designs made by F. W. Keyl and A. A. Smith, under Author's Superintendence. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50; Roan, $5 00.

ABBOTT'S FRANCONIA STORIES. Numerous Illustrations. Complete in 10 vols., 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents each. The volumes may be obtained separately or, complete in neat case, $9 00.
Malleville. Mary Bell. Agnes Fen.—Wallace.—Beechnut.—Stuyvesant.—Agnes.—Mary Erskine.—Rodolphus.—Caleb Kendall.

ABBOTT'S LITTLE LEARNER SERIES. Harper's Picture Books for the Nursery. Beautifully Illustrated. In 8 volumes, 90 cents each. The volumes complete in themselves, and sold separately; or, the set complete in neat case, $7 20.

Learning to Talk.—To Think.—To Read.—About Common Things.—About Right and Wrong.

READING WITHOUT TEARS; or, A Pleasant Mode of Learning to Read. By the Author of "Streaks of Light," "More about Jesus," "Lives Left Out," &c. PART SECOND. With Engravings. Square 4to, Uniform with the Reading Without Tears, Part I. Cloth, Gilt, $1 25.

CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS. Square 4to, about 100 pages each, beautifully printed on tinted paper, with many illustrations by Weir, Steinle, Overbeck, Veit, Schnorr, Ramberg, &c. Cloth, Gilt, $1 50 a volume; or, the Series complete in neat case, $7 20.

The Children's Bible Picture Book.
The Children's Picture Fable Book.
The Children's Picture Book of Quadrupeds and other Mammalia.
The Children's Picture Book of the Sagacity of Animals.
The Children's Picture Book of Birds.

FAIRY BOOKS: Containing Twelve New Stories, expressly Invented for the Little Folks, and Illustrated by Engravings by Adams. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 75.

MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The Best Popular Fairy Stories Retold and Rendered anew. Engravings. 16mo, $1 50.

MISS MULOCK'S OUR YEAR: A Child's Book in Prose and Verse. Illustrated by Gilbert Dalziel. 16mo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 00.

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES. Illustrated with numerous Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00 per volume. The volumes may be obtained separately; or, the set complete in box, $33 60.

Cyrus the Great.—Darius the Great.—Xerxes.—Alexander the Great.—Hannibal.—Julius Cæsar.—Cleopatra.—Nero.—Alfred the Great.—William the Conqueror.—Richard I.—Richard III.—Mary, Queen of Scots.—Queen Elizabeth.—Josephine.—Maria Antoinette.—Mary Queen of Scots.—Maria Antoinette.—Madame Roland.—Mary, Queen of Scots.—Marie Antoinette.—Peter the Great.—Genghis Khan.—Haig Philip.—Hernando Cortez.

ABBOTT'S MARCO PAUL'S Voyages and Travels in the Pursuit of Knowledge. Illustrated. Complete in 6 vols. 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents each. The volumes may be obtained separately; or, complete in neat case for $5 40.

In New York.—On the Erie Canal.—In the Forests of Maine.—In Vermont.—In the Country at the Springfield Armory.

ABBOTT'S STORIES OF RAINBOW AND LUCKY. Beautifully Illustrated. 5 vols, 16mo, Cloth, 90 cents per volume. The volumes may be obtained separately; or, complete in neat case, $4 50.

Handie.—Rainbow's Journey.—Selling Lucky.—Up the River.—The Three Pines.

HARPER'S LADDER TO LEARNING. With 250 Illustrations. Square 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

THACKERAY'S ROSE AND THE RING: or, The History of Prince Giglio and Prince Bulbo. A Fireside Pantomime for Great and Small Children. By MR. M. A. TITMARSH. Numerous Illustrations. Small 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

MRS. WIND AND MADAM RAIN. By PAUL DU MORTIER. Translated by EMILY MARSHALL. Illustrated by Charles Bennett. Square 4to, Cloth, 75 cents.

HARPER'S STORY BOOKS. Narrative and Descriptive, and Tales for the Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. With many fine and beautiful Engravings.

"HARPER'S STORY BOOKS" can be obtained complete in Twenty Volumes, bound in blue, each one containing Three Stories of the Price of $1 00, or in Thirty-two Volumes, bound in crimson, each containing One Story of the price of 75 cents. The Volumes sold separately.

Uncle Lucas.—Willie and the Mortgage.—The Straight Gate. Vol. II. The Little Louvre.—Frank.—Emma.—Vol. III. Rollo's Museum and Lucy Gray.—Timboo and Fanny. Vol. IV. The Harper Establishment.—Rollo's Museum. Vol. V. Rollo's Story of Ancient History.—The Story of English History.—The Story of American History. Vol. VI. John True.—Elfred.—The Museum. Vol. VII. The Sightseer.—Rollo's Museum. Vol. VIII. The Three Gold Dollars. Vol. VIII. The Gibraltar Gallery.—The Adventures of Ned Wilson. Vol. IX. Great Rim.—Aunt Margaret.—Vernon. Vol. X. Carl and Lina.—Lapidary.—Lucy Gray. Vol. XI. Baker. Vol. XI. Judge Justin.—Mingo.—Jasper. Vol. XII. Uncle Lucas. Vol. XII. Rollo's Travels.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ For a full list of Books suitable for presentation, see Harper's Catalogue and Trade-List, which may be had gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally or by letter enclosing five cents.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

EMPLOYMENT! $10 A DAY and EXPENSES PAID. Circulars Free. C. F. GAREY, Bridgeport, Ct.

$225 A MONTH! 12 new articles for Agents. Address H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

WATERS'S PREMIUM PIANOS,

WITH AGRAFFE TREBLE.
Melodeons, Parlor, Church, and Cabinet Organs, the best manufactured, warranted for six years. Second-hand Pianos, $50 to $75. Melodeons, $25 and upwards. Monthly installments received from one to two years. Illustrated circulars mailed. Warerooms, 481 Broadway, N. Y. HORACE WATERS & CO.

546 Broadway.

"Is the hours of our Happiness and Prosperity let us remember the Unfortunate and Disabled Soldiers who saved us a Country and a Nationality."—LINCOLN.

GRAND POPULAR MOVEMENT

TO ERECT THE

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM

FOR INVALID SOLDIERS,

UNDER A SPECIAL CHARTER FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, PASSED MARCH 6, 1867.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

The object of this Association is to provide, by public exercise, a NATIONAL HOME for our disabled Soldiers, to erect an asylum for those who, in their patriotism have served their Country at the expense of their health and happiness; who, in the battle for the Nation's life were maimed, and are now incapable of working for their own maintenance. France has her Hotel Des Invalides where rest the ashes of the great Napoleon; England her Greenwich and Chelsea Hospitals, the former being one of the finest architectural structures ever devoted to charity. Russia, Prussia, and in fact, nearly all European Countries have their recent retreats for the unfortunate Soldiers. Monarchies provide for the alleviation of the suffering caused by war, but free, prosperous, REPUBLICAN America has no place for her crippled and sick Soldiers but the county poor-house, or the sidewalks of her crowded cities. These noble patriots left happy homes to save our common country in the hour of her deep distress. We pledged to them our lasting gratitude, and now those who are dependent look to us in their utter need to redeem these pledges. They have performed their part—we enjoy the result of their sacrifices: we must not be recreant to our obligations. Let us each devote but a single dollar to this purpose, and the Gettysburg Asylum will afford the Soldiers a Home, and our Country will be honored by the noble Institution.

THE LAND HAS BEEN PURCHASED

By this Association, and Ten Thousand Dollars have already been paid toward the preservation of the Battle-Ground: about thirty acres (adjoining the site of General Meade's Headquarters) have been set apart for the uses of the Asylum.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Whereas, the Supervisors of the Gettysburg Asylum for Disabled Soldiers have made due application to John H. Diehl, Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Collection District of the State of Pennsylvania, for permission to hold a Gift Festival, and presented to him satisfactory evidence that the proceeds of said Gift Festival will be devoted to charitable use;

Permission is hereby granted to the said Supervisors to hold such Gift Festival, exempt from all charges whether from special tax or other duty in respect to said Gift Festival. E. A. ROLLINS Commissioner.

LETTER FROM A SOLDIER, NEW YORK, October 26th, 1867.

Having labored for three years to erect a Home for our Crippled Veterans, and having passed a bill for that purpose in the New York Legislature incorporating some one hundred of our best citizens as directors—but one thing was wanting—money. Had we been left to do this—and knowing the great and crying necessity under which we labored—we have been left to do this—and knowing the great and crying necessity under which we labored—we have been left to do this—and knowing the great and crying necessity under which we labored, we would have all the aid we required. But, alas, we have been disappointed. Your enterprise, and it alone, will have all the aid we require. Very truly yours,

Fully sympathizing with your great object, I tender you, gratuitously, the services of my Full Orchestra on the occasion of your Festival at Irving Hall. THEODORE THOMAS.

From the Postmaster General of the United States.

I recommend to all Postmasters that they shall aid this truly benevolent and patriotic enterprise.
A. W. RANDALL.

Having perfect confidence in the integrity of your enterprise, and heartily indorsing your noble object, it affords me pleasure to tender you gratuitously the use of my show-window for the display of your donations.
JOHN N. GENIN, 633 Broadway.

We hereby certify that we have examined the Diamond Goods, Pearls, Emeralds, Rubies, and other precious Stones, as described in the list, and find them all genuine.
HENRY BOSS, Diamond Importers, 36 Maiden Lane, New York.
J. HENRY SCHULTZ, Diamond Setter, 194 Broome Street, New York.

In order to promote public confidence in the highest degree, and for the furtherance of this great object, the Association has decided to place the gift of the Work of Diamonds on public exhibition in the show-window of the large Fur and Hat Establishment of John N. Genin, No. 513 Broadway, (under the St. Nicholas Hotel), N. Y. The world-renowned Yacht Henrietta has also been purchased, and will be moored in the harbor of Sullivan County, N. Y., and is one of the finest Stock Farms in the State; has a splendid Mansion, and is complete in every particular.

There will be 1,250,000 tickets issued at one dollar each, admitting the holders to both of the

GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVALS:

One at IRVING HALL, New York, Saturday evening, February 8, 1868, and one at HORTICULTURAL HALL, Philadelphia, Monday, February 24, 1868, at which latter occasion a Committee of prominent citizens will be selected to associate with the Management in making the distribution, to commence on Monday, February 24th, at 9 o'clock, A.M., at Horticultural Hall.

$641,950 in Valuable Presents

will be distributed among the Ticket-Holders, in accordance with the Charter and the following

SCHEDULE OF AWARDS.

1	1 Grand Cash Award	$100,000	84	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	$1,500
2	1 Splendid Farm (600 acres)	50,000	85	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	1,500
3	1 Yacht, the famous "Henrietta"	50,000	86	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	1,500
4	1 Diamond Necklace, 48 Brilliants	25,000	87	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
5	1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings (all large diamonds)	25,000	88	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	1,500
6	1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings (all large diamonds)	25,000	89	1 Camel's Hair Shawl	1,500
7	1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings	15,000	90	1 Check Enamel Stud	1,500
8	1 Diamond Necklace, 28 Brilliants, Star Setting	8,000	91	1 Single Stone Ring	1,500
9	1 Diamond Necklace, 29 Brilliants	7,000	92	1 Single Stone Ring	1,500
10	1 Diamond Cross, set in Silver (large diamonds)	7,000	93	1 Cluster Brooch	1,500
11	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	6,000	94	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
12	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	6,000	95	1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-Rings	800
13	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	6,000	96	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	800
14	1 Diamond and Pearl Cameo Bracelet, Brooch, and Ear-rings	5,000	97	1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring	800
15	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	4,000	98	1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring, and Pin	800
16	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	99	1 Camel's Hair Shawl	800
17	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	100	1 Diamond and Ruby Three Stone Ring	800
18	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	101	1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring	800
19	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000	102	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	800
20	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000	103	1 Pair Diamond Cluster Ear-rings	800
21	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch and Ear-rings	4,000	104	1 Gent's Gold Watch and Heavy Chain	600
22	1 Diamond Single Stone Scarf Pin	4,000	105	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring, Star setting	600
23	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	106	1 Diamond Garnet Cluster Ring	600
24	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	107	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	600
25	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	3,000	108	1 Emerald Knob	600
26	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	3,000	109	1 Pair Diamond Single Ear-Rings	600
27	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch and Ear-rings	3,000	110	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	600
28	1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Brooch	3,000	111	1 Diamond and Emerald Stone Pin	600
29	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	3,000	112	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	500
30	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	3,000	113	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	500
31	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000	114	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	500
32	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000	115	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	500
33	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000	116	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	500
34	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	3,000	117	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	500
35	1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-rings	2,500	118	1 Diamond and Opal Ring	350
36	1 Diamond Cross	2,500	119	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	350
37	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	2,000	120	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	350
38	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	2,000	121	1 Diamond Three Stone Ring	350
39	1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-rings	2,000	122	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	350
40	1 Diamond Cluster Pin	2,000	123	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	350
41	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	2,000	124	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	350
42	1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Studs	2,000	125	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	350
43	1 Diamond Brooch (in Silver)	2,000	126	1 Gent's Diamond and Amethyst Ring	150
44	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	2,000	127	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	150
45	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,000	128	1 Cameo & Pearl Brooch and Ear-Rings	100
46	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	2,000	129	1 Diamond Ring	100
47	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	2,000	130	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	100
48	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	2,000	131	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	100
49	1 Diamond and Emerald Brooch	2,000	132	1 Ladies' Gold Watch	100
50	1 Diamond Ring and Pin	2,000	133	1 Pair Coral Brooch and Ear-Rings	100
51	1 Pearl Breast-Pin, Ear-Rings, and Head Ornament	2,000	134	1 Pair Garnet Sleeve Buttons	100
52	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,000	135	1 Pair Coral Scarf Pin	100
53	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,000	136	1 Emerald Scarf Pin	50
54	1 Diamond Cross	2,000	137	1 Diamond Scarf Pin	50
55	1 Diamond and Emerald Ornament	2,000	138—1194.	1056 Copies of the splendidly illustrated Presentation Work entitled the "Tribute-Book," at $20 each	20,080
56	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,000	1195—2194.	Elegant Gold Hunting Cases, Jewelled in Jewels	5,000
57	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500		Also 1200 Gold Cash Presents, at each	120,000
58	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500		Making a total aggregate 121,194 Presents, varied at	$641,950
59	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
60	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
61	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
62	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
63	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
64	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
65	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
66	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
67	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet, Ear-Rings, and Pin	1,500
68	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	1,500
69	1 Camel's Hair Shawl	1,000
70	1 Diamond and Ruby Three Stone Ring	800
71	1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring	800
72	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	800
73	1 Pair Diamond Cluster Ear-rings	800
74	1 Gent's Gold Watch and Heavy Chain	600
75	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring, Star setting	600
76	1 Diamond Garnet Cluster Ring	600
77	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	600
78	1 Emerald Knob	600
79	1 Pair Diamond Single Ear-Rings	600
80	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	600
81	1 Diamond and Emerald Stone Pin	600
82	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	500
83	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	350

HOW TO OBTAIN TICKETS.

Orders may be sent to us in registered letters or post-office orders, in sums from $1 to $25 at our risk. Larger amounts should be sent in Drafts or by Express at the following Club Rates:

10	Tickets to one address	$ 4 50	40	Tickets to one address	$35 00
20	"	9 00	50	"	43 50
30	"	17 50	100	"	85 00

Address all orders and communications to

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM ASSOCIATION,
841 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, or
PHILADELPHIA OFFICE, 1124 CHESTNUT STREET.

The Great AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 p lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 p lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 p lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 p lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 p lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 50c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 p lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 20, best $1 50 p lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in time by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 20c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in any circular we issue. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name of each party with the coin, so there will be no confusion in their distribution—each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending their orders to the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or unfounded. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

UNION PACIFIC R. R. CO.

NOTICE. The Coupons of the FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS of the UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, due July 1st, 1868, will be paid on and after that date IN GOLD COIN, free of Government Tax, at the Company's Office, No. 20 Nassau St., N. Y.
JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer.

Holiday Presents.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
are now offering

Parisian Cloaks and Sacques,
ELEGANT INDIA SHAWLS (LONG and SQUARE),
Richly Embroidered Silk and Velvet Robes,
REAL THREAD LACE POINTES,
EMBROIDERED HANDKERCHIEFS,
Alexandre's Unrivaled Kid Gloves,
IN ALL SHADES AND SIZES,
RUSSIA and HUDSON'S BAY SABLE, MINK, AND ERMINE MUFFS, COLLARS, TIPPETS, &c., SUITABLE FOR CHRISTMAS and NEW YEAR'S GIFTS,
AT EXCEEDINGLY LOW PRICES.
BROADWAY and TENTH STREET.

BAKER'S CHOCOLATE AND COCOA

PARIS EXPOSITION, 1867.

W. BAKER & CO'S
American, French,
Homœopathic
and
VANILLA CHOCOLATE
PREPARED COCOA,
BROMA,

Cocoa Paste, Homœopathic Cocoa, Cocoa Shells, Cracked Cocoa, etc.

Leaf, Flower and Fruit of the Cocoa with a pod opened.

THESE Manufactures, to which FIRST PREMIUMS have been awarded by the CHIEF INSTITUTES and FAIRS of the UNION, and at the PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1867, are recommended by physicians, invalids and others in health, only because of the previous excellent attestations of their merits, and because they are recommended by the most eminent physicians.

For sale by the principal Grocers in the United States.

WALTER BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

The "STECK" Pianos,

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT,

Possessing all the qualities necessary to make the most excellent instrument, acknowledged by all artists as unsurpassed.

Purchasers will find it to their advantage to call and examine these Pianos at the

WAREROOMS, STECK'S HALL,
141 Eighth St., between Broadway and Fourth Av.

BARD & BROTHERS.

GOLD PENS,

PEN AND PENCIL CASES, SILVER, RUBBER, and GOLD-PLATED PELICAN PEN-CASES, TOOTH-PICKS, &c., &c.
JAMES R. BARD, Agent,
No. 22 Maiden Lane, New York.

THE EGYPTIAN MYSTERY. Wonderful and curious. Sent on receipt of 25 cents. By O. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau Street, New York.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

JANUARY, 1868.

In the present Number is commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by Miss MELVILLE CRAIG, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 will be commenced the issue of "The Monastery," a Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Curb and Crone," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $2 00 per Volume, by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, each containing the Numbers for Three Months, furnished for $2 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

Back Numbers of the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable in advance, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Remittances to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY, 1868.

MADAM TURKEY and the rest of the family expect, as usual, to receive more calls than any body else.

C. G. Gunther & Sons,
Fur Dealers and Furriers,
502 and 504 BROADWAY.
NOVELTIES
For the Season, comprising:
BROWN FUR SEAL SACQUES,
BLACK PERSIAN LAMB SACQUES,
GRAY PERSIAN LAMB SACQUES,
BLACK ASTRAKAN LAMB SACQUES,
GRAY KRIMMER LAMB SACQUES,
FUR BASQUES AND VESTS,
LADIES' FUR TURBANS,
FUR TRIMMINGS, &c., &c.

FURS! FURS!
F. W. LASAK'S SON,
(ESTABLISHED 1824)
Russian American and Hudson's Bay Co. Furs.
Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description on hand and to order. All goods of our own manufacture, and warranted of superior quality and workmanship. F. W. LASAK'S SON, 103 Broadway.

ANEW CURE
Tobacco Antidote.
RECIPE FREE.
REMOVES FOREVER ALL DESIRE for Tobacco. Restores sufferers from its deadly effects to robust health in a few days. Has cured thousands, and received the highest testimonials from orators, statesmen, and the Press. This remedy is safe, simple and permanent. Sent GRATIS to any address.
Address T. R. FOSTER,
Jersey City, New Jersey.

Our Entire Stock
IS NOW OFFERED AT
REDUCED PRICES,
In view of our REMOVAL up town in the Spring.
WHITE CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 140 pieces, $20.
PLATED WARE FROM ROGERS, SMITH & CO.
GOLD-EDGE TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $31.
DECORATED TEA SETS, $12.
DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 470 Broadway.
4 doors below Broome Street.

Popular Goods
at Popular Prices
FOR BOYS AND MISSES.
BALMORAL AND ROB ROY STOCKINGS.
CLOTH AND FANCY KNIT GAITERS.
MERINO UNDER VESTS AND DRAWERS.
CLOTH, KID, AND BEAVER GLOVES.
FANCY GLOVES AND INFANTEES.
COMFORTERS, SCARFS, HOODS.
GARIBALDI AND CARDIGAN JACKETS.
A LARGE VARIETY OF ELEGANT GOODS AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway.

T. R. McALLISTER'S
HOUSEHOLD MICROSCOPE.
A miniature model of the first-class scientific microscopes. A necessity to every family, and a most acceptable holiday present. Four magnifying powers, for investigating the minutiæ of animal and vegetable life. Price $5. T. R. McALLISTER, Optician, 47 Nassau Street, New York.

HOLIDAY GIFTS.
A nice set of PATENT STAIR RODS that require no cleaning, with a new fastening which prevents slipping—it boon to every housekeeper. Manufactured only by W. T. & J. MERSEREAU,
No. 62 Duane Street.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.—Kaldenberg & Son, who received the Prize at Paris, and highest prize at the American Institute, 1867, offer the FINEST stock of Meerschaum Pipes and Holders at REDUCED PRICES. Repairing, Boiling, &c., Monogram, Portraits, &c., cut to order. Send for circulars. 640 Broadway, up stairs, and 25 Wall Street, cor. Broad. Patrons up town, No. 717 Broadway (N. Y. Hotel).
N.B. Every article warranted genuine and to color.

BOSTON YACHT CLUB
REVERSIBLE STITCH
BUY And TRY The PATENT REVERSIBLE STITCH LINEN FACE
Paper Collars
Showing the Stitch on both sides alike.
Patented Feb. 7, 1865
Manufactured by the Reversible Collar Co., Boston.
MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO.,
Agents, Winthrop Square, Boston, Mass.
Send for Price List.

USEFUL HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
W. H. LEE & CO.
WARE ROOMS
199 Fulton Street,
N. Y.
Parlor Suites, Turkish Chairs and Lounges, Inlaid Work Tables, and Bouquet Stands, Library and Chamber Suites.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA,
AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.
Its Effects are Magical.
TURNER'S TIC DOULOUREUX OR Universal Neuralgia PILL.
Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cts.; two do., $2.00, postage 12 cts.; twelve do., $10.00, postage free.
TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. 18kin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

ALL WANTING FARMS.
Good soil, mild climate, thirty-four miles south of Philadelphia. Price only twenty-five dollars per acre. Best of grain and grass land. Also improved farms. Healthy setting. Information sent free. Address C. E. LANDIS, Proprietor, Vineland, New Jersey.

SECURE PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.
The Central Pacific Railroad
FIRST MORTGAGE THIRTY YEAR SIX PER CENT. COUPON BONDS,
Principal and Interest Payable in Gold Coin,
Represent the preferred claim upon one of the MOST IMPORTANT LINES OF COMMUNICATION IN THE WORLD, as it is the sole link between the Pacific Coast and the Great Interior Basin, over which the immense overland travel must pass, and the Main Trunk Line across the Continent.
The Road is now nearly completed from Sacramento to the Richest Mining Regions in the Salt Lake Basin, and is being rapidly carried forward by the largest force of laborers ever employed by any Railroad Company on this continent.
The natural, legitimate, commercial business of the road surpasses all previous expectation, and is profitable beyond parallel, even among the oldest roads in existence. The Earnings and Expenses for the quarter ending October 31 were as follows, to GOLD:

GROSS EARNINGS.	OPERATING EXPENSES	NET EARNINGS.
$593,847 92	$102,088 61	$491,759 31

This result, however, would have been far greater but for the inability of wagon teams to forward the freight and passengers from the temporary terminus in the mountains.
The United States Government and the State and Cities of California have so aided and fostered the Great Enterprise that the Company will assume very light annual Interest Obligations, and will have the following ample Resources at command for the Construction:

DONATIONS to Lands, Bonds, Concessions, &c. (without lien)	$12,800,000
CAPITAL STOCK, Net Earnings, &c. (no lien)	11,000,000
LOANS (subordinate lien)	15,000,000
U. S. SUBSIDY BONDS, 726 miles (subordinate lien)	25,917,000
FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS	25,917,000
Resources, first 726 miles	$74,834,000

The FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS are in sums of $1000 each, with semi-annual gold coupons attached, and are offered for sale, for the present, at 95 per cent. and accrued interest from July 1st, in currency, at which rate they yield nearly NINE PER CENT. UPON THE INVESTMENT.
These Bonds, authorized by the Pacific Railroad Acts of Congress, are issued only as the work progresses, and to the same extent only as the Bonds granted by the Government, and are the prior lien upon the whole valuable property furnished by the above Resources. They possess special assurances and advantages over other Corporate Securities, and are destined to rank among THE BEST INVESTMENTS IN THE WORLD, from their unusual attractions of safety, soundness, and profit.
Conversions of Government Securities into Central Pacific First Mortgage Bonds now realize for the holders from 12 to 18 per cent. ADVANTAGE, with the same rate of interest.
Bonds can be obtained through the subscribers directly, or through responsible Banking Agencies.
Descriptive Pamphlets, Maps, and information can be had at the Office of the C. P. R. R. Co., No. 54 William Street, New York, and of FISK & HATCH,
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities, and Financial Agents of the C. P. R. R. Co.,
No. 5 Nassau Street, New York.

GUFFROY'S IMP'L MED. COUNCIL ST. PETERSBURG RARE COD LIVER MARK IMPERIAL MEDICAL PARIS ACIDES
DRAGÉES
Now in use in St. Luke's, Bellevue, Bureau of Medicine and Out-door Relief, Eclectic Medical College and Dispensary, Homœopathic Dispensary, &c., &c.
PRICES: BOX OF 60 DRAGÉES, EQUAL TO ONE AND A HALF PINTS OF THE OIL, 75 CENTS; BOX OF 120 DRAGÉES, $1 25; BOX OF 240 DRAGÉES, $2 00.
SENT FREE BY MAIL ON RECEIPT OF PRICE.
Sugar-Coated Pills of Cod Liver Extract, (Not Oil,)
Not objectionable to the most Delicate Stomach.
MORE ECONOMICAL AND EFFICACIOUS THAN COD LIVER OIL.
Most Valuable Remedy in Secondary Syphilitic Affections, Scrofula, Chronic Rheumatism, Nervous Affections, Neuralgia, Sciatica, Lumbago, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, Scrofulous Affections of the Eye, Ear, Glands, Joints, Bones, Skin, Ulcers, Tumors, Female Complaints, Rickets, Marasmus, Wasting of Children, Loss of Appetite, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Habitual Constipation, Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Cholera Infantum, Cholera Morbus, Nausea, Vomiting, Sick Headache, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Hysteria, Hypochondria, Melancholy, Mental Depression, Loss of Memory, Premature Decay, Want of Nervous Energy, Vital Exhaustion, Impotency, Sterility, Involuntary Seminal Losses, Spermatorrhœa, Impoverished Blood, Anæmia, Chlorosis, Green Sickness, Poverty of Milk, Abscesses, Boils, Carbuncles, Erysipelas, Eruptions, Itch, Ringworm, Impurities of the Skin, Tumors, Cancerous Humors, Ulcerations, Mercurial Affections, Syphilis, Gout, Dropsy, Gravel, Calculous Affections, Kidney Affections, Urinary Deposits, Retention, Incontinence, Bladder Complaints, Female Irregularities, Uterine Affections, Displacements, Leucorrhœa, Sexual Debility, Impotency, Sterility, Premature Decline, Masturbation, Venereal Affections, Specific Diseases, Mercurial Diseases, Affections of the Throat, Nose, Skin, Bones, Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, Bladder, Womb, Rectum, Constitutional Debility, Blood Diseases, Female Weakness, Impurities of the Blood, Fevers, Inflammatory Diseases, Organic Weakness, Diseases of the Digestive Organs, Constitutional and Local Infirmities, Debility, Lassitude, Universal Prostration of the System, Paralysis, Neuralgia, Hysteria, Dyspepsia, Headache, Diseases of the Brain, Spinal Affections, Nervous Irritability, Epilepsy, Nervous Prostration, Nervous Debility, Diseases of the Generative Organs of either Sex, however Induced, and whether existing in Male or Female, from whatever cause originating, and however long standing, are within the curative power of this Great Restorative.
Prepared by Sole Proprietors, WILLIAM V. MOORE, Wholesale Druggist, Chicago, Ill.
Sold by Druggists everywhere.

STEREOPTICONS
AND MAGIC LANTERNS
Of every description, from $1 to $400, and with the improved Lime Lights, Magnesium Lights, &c., &c., and suitable for public exhibitions and parlor entertainments. A priced and illustrated catalogue and over 4000 views for the same sent on application.
WILLIAM V. McALLISTER,
728 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

NOTICE.
TO
"ALL MEN WHO USE PLANE IRONS."
We hereby authorize all "HARDWARE DEALERS" to allow their customers to try our "CLOVER-LEAF PLANE IRONS," and, if not PERFECTLY SUITED, take them back, refund price paid, and charge irons over to us.
WE WANT MECHANICS AND DEALERS TO RUN NO RISK IN BUYING OUR PLANE IRONS.
See that our TRADE MARK is on each Iron.
REYNOLDS, BARBER & CO.,
STEEL TEMPERING WORKS,
AUBURN, N. Y.

Chickering & Sons' American Pianos.

THE FIRST GRAND PRIZE, THE HIGHEST AWARD, THE LEGION OF HONOR, FOR THE CHICKERING PIANO.
MAKING SIXTY-THREE FIRST PREMIUMS DURING THE LAST FORTY-FOUR YEARS.
WAREROOMS:
652 Broadway, New York;
246 Washington St., Boston.

GOLD PENS.
Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Repointing at 50 cents each by mail. Manufactory 16 Maiden Lane. E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

Established 1832. E. W. BURR, Established 1832.
MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
791 Broadway,
OPPOSITE GRACE CHURCH,
Will offer during the Holidays the finest assortment of DIAMONDS AND OTHER G. MS,
STONE CAMEOS,
and every description of
The Finest Jewelry and Watches,
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

JUST PUBLISHED.
RIMMEL'S
Perfumed Almanac
FOR 1868,
Illustrated with SEVEN AGES OF MAN, Beautifully Illustrated.
Post free for 25 cts.
Edward Greey & Co.,
34 Vesey St., NEW YORK.

PRINCE & COS AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use.
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

℞ We should not suffer from a Cough, which a few doses of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL will cure. Time, comfort, health, are all saved by it.

TWELVE YEARS AGO White Pine Compound was first introduced to the public. It has daily grown in favor with the people, at the present time there is hardly a family who has not tested it for Coughs, Colds, Consumptions, and Kidney Affections. Large numbers of physicians use it in their daily practice.

Our Young Folks
Is the best and most attractive juvenile magazine now published. It is filled with capital Stories, Tales of Adventure, Sketches, Historical and Scientific Articles, Charming Poems—all profusely and tastefully illustrated. The volume for 1868 promises to be unusually attractive, and should be ordered at once. Send 20 cents for Specimen Number containing Prospectus. TERMS: $2 a year. Liberal discount to Clubs.
TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United tates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, Broadway.

J. C. HULL'S SON, New York.
HULL'S TRADE MARK
BAY RUM SOAP
Over 100 Styles Toilet Soaps, NONE BETTER IMPORTED.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 576.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE PIONEER.—DRAWN BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE PIONEER.

AMERICA'S "peculiar and appropriate sons," not, however, absolutely unknown, as Scott boasted England's yeomen were, to all other lands, are the Pioneers. They are the true and natural children of the Pilgrims, and pioneer and pilgrim have grown to be, in fact and meaning, almost synonymous. The love of religious freedom impelled the Pilgrims to settle the bleak coasts of New England; the love of personal liberty leads the pioneer to penetrate the dismal forest or embark, as it were, on the boundless prairies of the West. The one has settled New England, the other is settling America; and the same principles which were sown by the Pilgrim are being actively broadcast throughout the continent by the pioneers.

The popular idea of the pioneer is expressed in our Western Illustration on the opposite page. Here the settler in the Far West is seeing momentarily from his work in felling the sturdy forest trees to make room for the delicate wheat-stem or corn-stalk, and quaffs, not a "cup of suck," but wholesome and pure water from the neighboring spring, smiling his thanks on the boy who has been his cup-bearer. In the distance is the hut—settlers' huts are always temporary-looking affairs, as if the occupants meant to be up and further away the moment the coming of another family gave the neighborhood the unwelcome appearance of being "too thickly settled"—and near by the wife is engaged in washing. But the pioneer-life is not, as is popularly conceived, the only pioneer-life in America. There is to be found in every branch of business and in every profession. Even on a small scale preceded our soldiers in the occupation of Alaska, and the American fur trade has already been commenced there. Fishermen are already prospecting in St. Thomas; pioneer engineers have toiled up the Sierra Nevadas, and leaped across the prairies of Nebraska and Colorado to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. There is pioneering every where, and the van-guard—the pioneers of civilization—are animated and inspired by the principles which have made American free and glorious.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1868.

THE TRAGEDY OF TRAVEL.

THE daily frightful massacres of travelers, and the incessant accidents, make it a very serious thing for any one to leave home even upon the shortest journeys. And except the monotonous experience it would be amusing that nothing is done about it. But every body shudders and secretly hopes that he shall escape, and cherishes a vain superstition that so many horrible things have happened, the chance is that they will come to an end, and that he may, as it were, run between the drops of rain as he does. Frost will touch and snap iron next year as it did last, and when the car goes over the trestle-work of the bridge the axle will still burn, and horrors be piled upon horrors.

The Yankee genius is paralyzed the moment it opens with the comfort and safety of travel. For more than twenty years we all submitted to the old cars, with a roof just above your head, forcing the foul air into your lungs, and there we patiently sat, slowly breathing typhus and death. Somebody then said, "Let the roof and panels holes at the side," and for the first time there were tolerably ventilated cars. But you will still be sure to find somewhere in the car who insists upon having all the holes at the top closed, and who glowers at you as if you were the devil if you open it. If you insist that they shall not be closed. Jump into a full car that has just stopped at a way-station, and reflect that there are people who have been inhaling that air for more than an hour, and who persist in inhaling it for six hours! Of course they will do nothing to prevent railroad murders. Why should they? They are doing what they can to multiply them.

Then there is the stove in the car. The very world is startled after the late sickening event at Angola. We state the fact plainly here that every railroad traveler and manager may fully understand it. The car was thrown from the bridge and fell down into the ravine, and there stood on end. All the passengers were hurled to the lower end, and piled upon the other end, and the stove at the other end of course fell upon them. Every car full of passengers that leaves the city of New York at this season, at every hour of the day, is liable to precisely the same fate. Why, then, do not the regular daily commuters upon all the roads from New York demand that the experiment shall be tried of heating the cars by steam or hot water? One plain peril would at least be removed.

Among the worst accidents upon record are the burning of the steamer in Ohio a few weeks ago, and the destruction at Angola. Fire was the fearful fact of both disasters. If the use of steam or water pipes should make the cars a little cooler than at present, so much the better. If the system will not answer, the agitation and constant experiment will soon develop something that will. To prevent the constant draught of cold air about the feet and legs, there can be double doors at each end of every car.

Let railroad companies offer large and tempting premiums for remedial inventions of every kind. And let all travelers take care that every accident known to them is made known to the public. At present we hear of but very few of the many accidents by rail. If the result is loss of life, or if there chance to be some "newspaper man" upon the train—the newspaper man who writes and not who sells—some account appears. But many a private traveler has knowledge of many a more escape and mishap which, if published, would compel the public to demand some action upon the subject.

There are railroads in Europe upon which there have never occurred any serious accidents. Upon the great Russian Government road from St. Petersburg to Moscow the speed is limited to twenty miles an hour. We have no wish that Government should manage our roads. But the fact seems to be in process of demonstration that private companies are not equal to their management with proper regard to the safety of travelers. Nor will any body who has had experience prefer the system of the American to that of the German roads. It is our business in this country to do every thing better than in other countries. Danger and dirt and inconvenience are intolerable, except in a base and unjust sense of the word; and until the details of life can be as carefully considered as they are in Europe, life to the highest civilization will be unfounded.

THE GREAT WORK AT THE SOUTH.

WHILE the papers that call themselves Conservative are striving by the most elaborate misrepresentation of the freedmen, and by the industrious appeal to prejudice, to perplex and postpone the reorganization of the Union, it is useful to see occasionally what the freedmen are really doing. If any colored man says a foolish thing any where he is instantly seized by "Conservatives" of the impending repetition of "the horrors of St. Domingo." But no same person are ever careful never to publish any of the significant facts of the real advances made by the freedmen in every good direction. Meanwhile we have yet to see recorded a failing from the line of the highest requirements so atrocious as were constantly dropping from those of the political leaders of the late rebellion, or from those of North-ern "Conservatives" at home.

General SWAYNE, Assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau in Alabama, says in his recent report of operations in his Department, that the school-year among the freedmen is divided with 68 teachers and 3100 pupils, and closes with 120 teachers instructing 9800 pupils. The General says, quietly: "There is a desire in natural capacity or interest is observed between these pupils and those of any schools known to the writer in this country." The odds that the remarkable interest of the freedmen in education is apparently widening. They make great efforts to support their children while in school, and the parents lay aside property for where to be studied by themselves during the intervals of labor. The freedmen also interest themselves in the exercises of school-houses, of which many have been built with money from the Bureau, and the kind hostility against them which was at first apparent has almost wholly disappeared. The Middle Tennessee had have expressed a wish to co-operate in extending their schools among the colored people; and the Commissioner reports evidence of preparation for a comprehensive system of State free schools.

The result of the system of voluntary co-operation is that the expenses of these free schools to the Government has been but 61¼ cents per month for each scholar in actual daily attendance, and the entire expenditure for school purposes has been $45,237; and the increased ability of the parents enables them to pay the salaries of the teachers.

In regard to the Freedmen Bills General SWAYNE says that "a general amendment in the treatment of the freedmen" followed their passage. "The sense of coming power brought immediate respect." The freedmen themselves promptly took new heart at the improvement in their prospects. Laboring with as much industry as ever, they seemed to have more zeal, to have new confidence in trying to improve. Already they have been admitted to the jury-box, and some of them are employed in the lower branches of the public service, so that they have little need to fear injustice in the future.

The incessant cry, "Down with the negger!" is hardly likely to result in a more truly "Conservative" policy than is indicated in this report. What is wanted in the Southern States, in which general suffrage has been established as the essential safeguard of civil freedom, is hearty co-operation in the elevation of the whole population, white and colored, by a comprehensive system of education. It is in this most vital work that the American Freedman's Commission in the city of New York is so strenuous and successful a power; and as it feels the general depression, and its influence may be consequently seriously lessened, no gift can be more truly given to the Lord and to the country than money sent to them, to the order of FRANCIS GEORGE SHAW, 30 Vesey Street.

THE SEQUEL OF THE REPEAL OF THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

THE bill to organize the Territory called Nebraska, introduced into the Senate in December, 1853, by Mr. DODGE of IOWA, was similar to the act which came near passing at the previous session, and embraced the district of country extending from the 37th parallel of north latitude to the British possessions at latitude 49°. It was to this vast Territory, treated as one in the bill, that the Missouri amendment repealing the Missouri Compromise line of 36° 30′ applied. The district is unsuited to slavery, and it can not therefore be supposed that the repeal was seriously intended. On the contrary, the inference drawn by us in a late article is more reasonable, that it was offered to embarrass Mr. DOUGLAS, Chairman of the Committee on Territories, in his Presidential aspirations.

Mr. JONES, then Senator from Tennessee, who was, as we have shown, the real author of the Missouri amendment, and Mr. DIXON, both Whigs, and opposed to Mr. DOUGLAS'S elevation to the Presidency. Mr. DIXON was doubtless elected for the mischievous service of offering the amendment, on his successor to the Senate had been appointed by Kentucky, and he had but little to lose by throwing this firebrand into the midst of the then dominant party. The amendment, however, instantly received the utmost attention not only among Southern members, who felt that they might be placed in a position to vote for it without voting for a repeal, but also among Presidential aspirants from the North who looked to Southern support. The amendment, for such it had become, was immediately considered in the Committee on Territories in many of its important aspects; and in a few days—through what outside pressure we need not say—with a view to new combinations may readily be inferred—the two and now more congenious measures—the repeal of the Missouri line and the organization of Kansas as a new Territory (formed out of Nebraska from the 37th to the 40th parallels of latitude) were reported to the Senate. Kansas was then by far the best known of the country, and after various modifications the two measures were passed into a law.

The motive for dividing the Territory in a manner available to both repeal—placing Nebraska behind Iowa, and Minnesota and Kansas immediately west of Missouri, a slave State from the first—was obvious. Slaves were immediately taken into Kansas and held as such during her territorial existence; but it was not until the attempt in the session of 1857–58 to make Kansas a slave State under the Lecompton Constitution, after Mr. BUCHANAN had become firmly seated in the Presidency, that the effort to establish slavery there as a permanent policy was seriously undertaken. Those who claim that the repeal of the compromise was intended or accepted as a mere compliment to the section which was to be injured it is a strange, and was passed with no view to the establishment of equality as far as possible in the Senate, knew that the persistent efforts to accomplish this object, or, in case of failure, some other equally potent, which the master minds of the South diligently kept in view. Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS and his political colleagues, was in the Cabinet of General PIERCE when repeal was carried, and men of similar purpose were in that of Mr. BUCHANAN when its fruits were sought to be gathered.

Mr. DOUGLAS, in the discussion in 1854, which followed the introduction of his bill—in which he displayed power as a debater far beyond what he was supposed to possess—said that Kansas could be only temporarily a slave State, as the mission quite as full as could be expected from a Democratic Senator; but after he had lost the nomination for the Presidency at Cincinnati in 1856, due to unavailability at the North, testified to the support of these two measures, he became more decisive. In the discussion at Ottawa, in Illinois, between Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. LINCOLN, which State they canvassed with a view to the Senatorial contest, Mr. DOUGLAS sought to make himself acceptable to the South by showing the relative and, as he supposed, opposing positions of the two candidates on the question of admitting new States. "I ask the gentleman," said he, addressing Mr. LINCOLN, who was then on the platform—"how would you vote if a State were to apply for admission with a clause admitting slavery? I pause for a reply." Then, after waiting, he added: "Fellow-citizens, he does not answer. I will screw it out of him."

It needed no more than Mr. DOUGLAS'S expressed willingness to vote to admit such a State, made on the stump in the North, to turn the sympathies of the South toward him in this great national discussion; but later, in 1860, he was not considered by the South available for the Presidency, as a new Southern policy had been determined upon, arising mainly from the conviction that the political balance between the two sections could not be maintained on a basis of safety for slavery, and of assured success in their enjoyment of national power. The country was confronted with the result of Mr. DIXON'S amendment, the struggle to introduce slavery north of the repealed line. The two systems of liberty and slavery were thus brought directly into conflict, and the result was the war.

If General PIERCE had been categorical in the support of repeal by his cabinet and Mr. DOUGLAS against his original determination to oppose it, Mr. BUCHANAN was driven from his original position on the subject of the KANSAS Constitution in a manner equally discreditable to his sagacity and patriotism. Mr. BUCHANAN had been Minister at the Court of St. James during the pendency of these distracting questions, and was so free from the complications which they created, that he was selected at Cincinnati as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, and was elected against FILLMORE and FREMONT, although their united vote proved that a majority of the people was then adverse to Democratic rule. His first error was in stating in his Inaugural that the will of a majority of the people of Kansas should be expressed and given effect in the adoption of their Constitution. He appointed ROBERT J. WALKER Governor of the Territory, whose Message corresponded with the tone of the President's Inaugural, and who went to Kansas assured of the President's support in all measures of justice and right.

But GOVERNOR WALKER soon found that the Secretary of the Interior, JACOB THOMPSON, of Mississippi, was thwarting his efforts, and through Mr. CALHOUN the Surveyor-General of Kansas, appointed by THOMPSON, was intriguing to wield the Constitutional Convention of Lecompton, of which Mr. CALHOUN was President, in behalf of SLAVERY; so that only the question whether slavery should be further admitted might be voted on by the people, that is, really as to the extent already prevailing untouched and established, and compelling acquiescence in the remaining provisions of the Constitution however objectionable they were. The people of Kansas stood aloof from this juggle, and the pro-Slavery Constitution was adopted and sent by Mr. BUCHANAN with favor to Congress, where it was strangled in the House of Representatives. The agent who went from Mr. THOMPSON, the Secretary of the Interior, to Kansas to complete this scheme of partial submission, was named MARTIN. He promptly accomplished his object, and Mr. WALKER, GOVERNOR, and Mr. STANTON, Secretary of Kansas, were compelled to leave the Territory thus subjected to the perfidy of the President and his advisers.

On forming his Cabinet, Mr. BUCHANAN was cautioned against the danger of reliance upon General CASS alone as his main Northern adviser by the most reliable secretary of JEFF DAVIS in the Senate, and COBB and THOMPSON in the Cabinet, from the South. He was informed of an incident with regard to General CASS which General CASS himself related. General JACKSON said to Governor MARCY, that when President he (JACKSON) had not only to be President but the Secretary of War, because General CASS, who occupied that post, would decide nothing, which General JACKSON attributed to the fact that General CASS had been for many years Governor of the Northwest Territory: "a position which had no politics, and that he had become a round man—i. e., had no decisive points or qualities."

In the Cabinet of Mr. BUCHANAN, the inefficiency of his Chief was apparent, for the country was upon the very verge of civil war before it was recognized by General CASS of the peril. Had there been an effective adviser from the North in those Cabinets, the danger resulting from the adoption of the Missouri Compromise, or of the false policy, might have been avoided, and in either event, perhaps, the country saved from civil war.

THE POPE AS KING.

THE "Italian question" is neither settled nor likely to be settled for a long time yet. The French army remains at Civita Vecchia, the port of Rome; Tuscany is a camp with an army of fifty thousand Italians; MENABREA and his ministry are denounced and despised; the cities received and buried their dead citizens from the late battle-fields with the most touching and universal respect; and the party of action feel that they have lost the King, with all the advantage that he was to them. The Pope remains at Rome, virtually guarded by France. But while the feeling of the people is profoundly excited, there seems to be no leader who can wield Italy with agility and power. There is all the familiar rhetoric of revolution and reform; but the Papal throne still stands, and while it stands Italy can not be free for herself."

The difficulty is not simple. It would be so if it were a question of politics merely. In that case nothing could be more preposterous than France summoning a European Congress to settle the Government of Italy. But it is a combined political and religious question. It is a question of the political status of the head of the Roman Church, and the Italian statesmen are traditionally Romanists, while the Italian people are actually so. They are at once ig norant and superstitious, and it is impossible for them to regard the question as political merely. It is, indeed, often so regarded elsewhere. Intelligent Journals ask why, in the name of justice, PIUS THE NINTH should be King of Rome if the Romans do not want him as King? But they forget that the King of Rome is the father of the French and Austrian and Spanish and Italian faithful, and that the Governments of all those countries do not wish to alienate the priesthood which directs the faithful, and must, therefore, incline toward the policy which is agreeable to the priests. Now, the priests feel that a certain visible royalty is very essential to the due impression of the supreme Pontiff upon the minds of the faithful; and those minds, therefore, regard a movement against the temporal sovereignty of the Pope as irreligious and wicked.

That there are many enlightened Romanists even among the Italians who believe that a separation of Church and State would be better for both is very possible. But that is the result of sound political thought and study, and how could they prove it to the mass of the people against the influence of the priests? The Pope, therefore, remains upon his throne not because his own hundred thousand subjects wish him to remain, but because Romish Europe is unwilling that he should become in external position what a bishop or archbishop is. And not only is there this ecclesiastical reason for his remaining, but his abdication or removal would be so momentous a step out of the traditional and established order that none of the existing Romish governments wish to take the initiative. It would be opening the gates, and what foe may be without who can tell?

The proposition which is sometimes gravely made that the question shall be put to a vote of the Roman people is, under the circumstances, very much like a suggestion that the people of the District of Columbia should decide whether the President should continue to reside in Washington, or Congress to make the local laws. These are national not District questions. And with a similar conviction European statesmen feel that the temporal position of the Papacy is not a question for the seven hundred thousand of Romanists in Rome, but for the millions and millions of Romanists all over the world.

Whatever LOUIS NAPOLEON'S theory or motive may be, FRANCE has lost Italy as an ally. The Francaise are becoming as hated as the Tedeschi were. LOUIS NAPOLEON has outraged the party of action, insulted the Government, and attached himself solely to the extreme reactionists; the ultra Tories; the children of the Holy Alliance. In the quarrel between FRANCE and Italy BISMARCK remains passive, for he at least appreciates the force of the religious view, and has no wish to precipitate a religious war.

THE MOVEMENT FOR GENERAL GRANT.

THE meeting at Cooper Institute which nominated General GRANT for the Legislature has appointed a Committee to take proper measures to secure his election. This Committee is composed of the best citizens of both parties, and they have held a preliminary meeting under the chairmanship of MR. ALEXANDER T. STEWART to complete their arrangements.

The object of the Committee is very simple. It is to procure the co-operation of all persons in the country who feel such confidence in General GRANT, founded upon his character and sentiments as proved by his public career, that they are willing to see him President. They feel that in the present situation of the country the intelligence and patriotism at the head of the Government is sagacity combined with honorable principle. They ask for a President whose career shows the judgment and common-sense which are the political qualities of statesmanship; and whose name is not associated with party conflicts, and is not of itself, therefore, a bar to political harmony.

The Committee expressly avoid all connection with politicians as such. We do not understand them to deny that in every free Government great results are achieved by parties only, but as men of experience and sagacity they know also how readily mere politicians can baffle the popular will, and how large and perilous are the dangers lurking in a popular system. The National Convention springs from the State Convention; that in turn from the Local Convention; that from the Primary Meeting, and the Primary Meeting is managed by JONES and JENKINS, who are the agents of SMITH and THOMPSON who do not appear. A few men in a parlor make "a State." They take care of the Primaries, they pack the Convention; they control the nominations; and the people do not vote for the candidates whom they prefer, but for those whom the gentlemen in the parlor select.

The GRANT movement thus undertaken is an attempt to allow the people to be heard. The Committee, we presume, are not forgetful that the mass of the people belong to one of the two great parties. They do not expect those parties to abandon their organization. They do not aim to create a third party. But they expect, by showing that the intelligent, loyal sentiment of the country, which justified and sustained the war, now demands General GRANT as a candidate, to persuade the political managers that it is not wise to resist that demand.

Indeed, many of the leaders and most influential organs of the Republican party, and several Republican State Conventions, have already recognized the fact of which the present movement is the striking proof, that the people expect and require General GRANT to be the President by whose wise and temperate touch the national wounds are to be healed. This is the deepening, universal conviction: a conviction all the more satisfactory because the general sense sees in GRANT the same simple, plain man of the people, with the sturdy and steady distinctive Americanism which made ABRAHAM LINCOLN so pre-eminently dear to the national heart.

OTHER MAN AND WOMAN TRAPS.

WHILE public attention is turned to avoiding disasters upon railroads, it is useful to reflect also upon the traps called theatres. It seems ungracious at this holy season to ask the question; but how many places of amusement in the city of New York are provided with proper means of escape in case of a sudden alarm? Niblo's Theatre is said to be the most secure in this respect, but a panic there would cause a frightful loss of life; and panic is produced in such a place by the consciousness of the restricted escape. There would be very little confusion in most of the churches because of the general knowledge of them. It is really very little danger that every body could not readily get out of the building.

"HER MAJESTY'S" theatre, in London, where Miss KEMBLE has been triumphing, was nearly burned just after the close of the performance. There were but four persons in it at the time, and they escaped with difficulty. "What," asks a letter-writer in the Times, "would have been the fate of an audience of 2500? The house was built about 1790, and was from top to bottom like a tinder-box. Escape would have been utterly impossible, for in twenty minutes from the up-burst of the flames the whole interior was a roaring furnace. Of course, library, scenery, costumes, all perished." We commend this passage to the consideration of those who frequent the New York theatres and also the attention of architects. The safety of building is not a matter to be left exclusively to private enterprise. Private enterprise would take the risk of burning up a thousand people for the chance of killing a few hundred more. The people, therefore, ought, as it were, to say grace over the whole barrel. They wish to see good acting, and sometimes very bad—they also wish to hear good singing and to be nodded with the moral ballet, and they certainly do not wish to settle the details of personal safety every night before the performance, by refraining from going in at any doubtful door. Let them, therefore, by proper laws and proper officers, insist that all places of great public resort shall be provided with means of escape, that a panic from an alarm of fire may be virtually impossible. Let them be warned by the terrible results of private enterprise in the building of tenement houses.

If any suggestive reader should allude to existing laws upon the subject we should laugh him to scorn by pointing to every theatre in the city. If he replied that the public did not care enough about their own safety to see that proper laws were made and executed, we should still insist that private enterprise has no right to fools, and that it is no excuse for allowing a man to jump off a train at lightning speed that he was willing to do it. Nor would the fact that old Norwalk accident upon the New Haven railroad fifteen years ago, the State of Connecticut required that every train upon every road in the State should not exceed a brisk walk as it should come to a full stop before crossing; and that judicious action has put a full stop to that kind of carelessness in Connecticut. There were plenty of fools willing to take the risk; you may sometimes meet one of them now who swears at the train for stopping, and who sneers at the regulation as a "Connecticut blue-law."

A little care and resolution would remedy these risks. If but a spark of the zeal which is devoted to securing the passage of a railroad charter, or the passage of a bridge bill, were spent in making them safe, we should go abroad almost as securely as we stay at home. But the terrible news reflects only a shadow of that his wife and children are gone to enjoy themselves at a play; and before leaving by the train he makes his will and takes a final farewell.

MR. WHIPPLE'S EULOGY OF GOVERNOR ANDREW.

THE discourse before the authorities of Boston upon the late JOHN A. ANDREW, by EDWIN P. WHIPPLE, is remarkable among all such orations for moderation and wisdom. Its brief and clear analysis of character, its estimate of the power of the man and of his relation to his work and time, are so unique and satisfactory that every friend of the Government must feel a personal obligation to MR. WHIPPLE. The discourse is the ripe result of the most appreciative affection, and of a rich and careful-trained mind.

"THE MOONSTONE."

OUR readers will probably agree with us that the opening of "THE MOONSTONE," the new Novel by WILKIE COLLINS, in our last Number, is in the very best manner of the author. The spell begins at once; mystery and superstition; the expect and require General GRANT to be the romance and vivid contrast of ancient India and modern England; the working out in the events of common life to-day of the traditional powers of a yellow diamond—all these are precisely the material for the curiously analytical genius and vivid pictorial talent of COLLINS, and promise us one of the most original and exciting of recent stories. The scenes and characters in the first Number are admirably managed. Gabriel Betteredge, the house-steward of Lady Verinder, tells the inmost secret of himself in telling the family history; and the appearance of the three Hindoos upon the warm terrace of the English country house, softly beating their drums and carefully looking about, is a master-touch. Like all WILKIE COLLINS'S stories, the "Moonstone" is written to be published serially, and should so be read. It began last week, and will continue regularly every week to the end of the work.

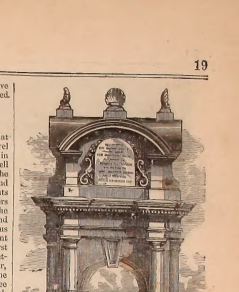
MISS MULOCH'S NEW NOVEL.

IN the January Number of Harper's Magazine, among many good things, is the beginning of "The Woman's Kingdom," by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," a story which she promises us shall be "a thorough love story." Indeed, she declares that she does not pretend to make it any thing else. "There are other things in life besides love," says our delightful author, telling the reader in every word; "but every body who has lived at all knows that love is the very heart of life, the pivot upon which its whole machinery revolves, without which no human existence can be complete; and with which, however broken and worn in part, it can still go on working anyhow, and working to a comparative useful and cheerful end." Fully penetrated with this truth, the author of "A Noble Life" has here begun a story of the most charming prose idyl of domestic life, and with all the great versatility of her accomplished hand. The scenes will every reader make himself acquainted with. Edna and Letty without resolving to follow their fortunes to the end.

LITERARY.

A SPEECH by J. K. H. WILLCOX before the Universal Franchise Association of Washington, "Suffrage a Right, not a Privilege," is a thoughtful and sensible discussion of the subject. Professor WILCOX is the editor of the Social Science Review, and treats his topic from the latest possible point of view. He says that the human right, in the opinion of our author, has no other limits than the laws of individual existence, the right of one limited by the power of the individual. Suffrage is not necessarily a violation of any of these. Indeed, he says, there is no alternative which involves so little wrong in government as universal suffrage. He says well of votes that "they only register the effects of public opinion. It is the thought of the people in the widest sense that governs their action; the ballot only expresses and carries out the results to which they have arrived." We can, of course, merely mention here the evident careful political reflection of this speech and pamphlet, which is issued by the Association in Washington.

THE FENIAN MOVEMENTS.



ON English friends laughed at us a good deal during the early years of the rebellion, for our dread of mixed batteries and gunboats: they are now having a more ridiculous panic over the warlike demonstrations of the Fenians. Their newspapers are considering to blow up the gas-works of Glasgow and Warrington, and what have been using the postal system and officials to circulate torpedoes which have exploded on the opening of the envelopes containing them. In the meantime the Fenians are not less intense than comical, and on Christmas last the citizens of Monaghan, Ireland, were startled by a notice on the Englishi Cathedral and the water-works, to prevent the destruction of property. The Parliament, Queen of the New Dominion, which adjourned on December 23, passed several bills for protection from Fenian invasions from the United States.

THE ROMAN QUESTION.

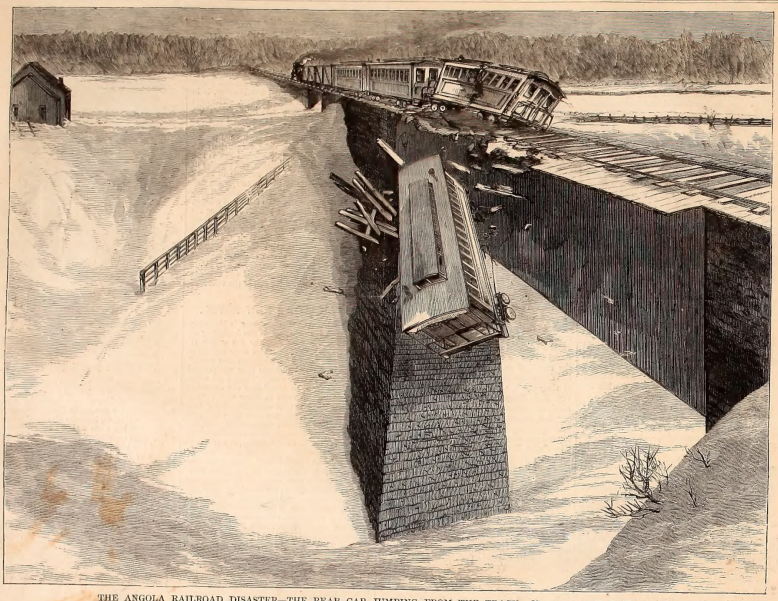
WHAT is to be done with or for the Pope is very much disturbing the quiet of both France and Italy. The debate between the Chambers and a dissolution of the Italian Cabinet have resulted from the effort to settle the issues growing out of the late attempt on Rome. So strong was the feeling against France in the Italian Parliament, that it was said by the premier that General Menabrea, the Premier, a conservative and friendly to France, was compelled to resign. VICTOR EMANUEL is also consulting public opinion and the counsel of a majority of his Cabinet, relative to the withdrawal of French troops, and will refer a new Cabinet friendly to France. A dissolution of the Italian Parliament was also contemplated, on December 26, in order to place the issues distinctly before the people.

PROGRESS OF LIBERALISM.

AUSTRIA on December 21 promulgated her new Constitution, and on December 24 her Parliament passed the bill emancipating the Jews from many of their social and religious disabilities. The past year was remarkable for the general reorganization and reconstruction movements among all nations of the world. New constitutions of a very liberal character have been adopted by or granted to Prussia, Austria, and Hungary, and the Southern States have taken the most important steps in the same direction. Slavery has been abolished in Brazil and Cuba, and two more ports of Japan are soon to be thrown open to foreign trade.

PLYMOUTH ROCK MONUMENT.

In our last volume we gave an illustration of Plymouth Rock as it appeared at that time. Since the photograph from which we made that engraving was taken, a monument has been completed on the site, and we herewith give an illustration of it. The last stone was laid on December 21, 1867. The complete structure is 15 feet square and 36 feet high. The corner-stone was laid on the 1st of August, 1859, with appropriate ceremonies, and it is expected that the coming summer will witness its dedication. In connection with the deposit of the cap-stone, on December 7, an interesting event occurred. The Pilgrim bones, which were exhumed on Cole's Hill in 1856, during the construction of the water-works, and afterward deposited in a brick vault on the Burying Hill, were again removed to the newly resting-place, and carefully inclosed in tubes filled with lead were placed in the open chamber in the attic between the cap-stone and the roof. The following inscription on the outside of the box containing the remains is an authentic record:



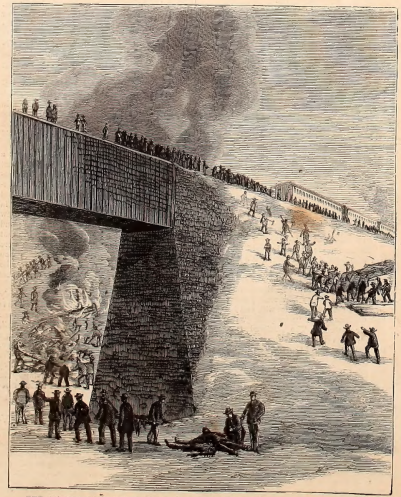
About fifty of the Pilgrims died during the winter of 1620 and 1621, and were buried on Cole's Hill. This number included Governor JOHN CARVER, WILLIAM WHITE, ELIZABETH WINSLOW, wife of Governor EDWARD WINSLOW, ELIZABETH BRADFORD, wife of Captain MILES STANDISH, and MARY ALLERTON, wife of ISAAC ALLERTON. On the 21st of May, 1850, workmen, while excavating a trench for the pipes of the Plymouth Water-Works, built during that year, on Cole's Hill, a little south of Middle Street, nearly all the bones belonging to three skeletons. The skulls were submitted to DR. JOHN C. WARREN and DR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES of Boston, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were skulls of white persons or Indians. Their decision that the skulls were those of white persons made it certain that they were those of some of the Pilgrims who died in 1620 and 1621. The bones were soon after placed carefully in a vault on the Burying Hill, prepared for the purpose, and were exhumed and placed in the canopy over the Rock where the Pilgrims landed, on the 30th day of November, 1867, the day of the completion of the canopy.

THE ANGOLA DISASTER.

WE gave in a previous Number a brief account of the terrible accident on the Lake Shore and Buffalo Railroad, near Angola, New York, by which fifty persons were crushed and burned to death; we give on the next page three illustrations of the same horrible accident.

It appears from the account of our special artist, who was dispatched to the scene soon after the accident was known, that the cause of the disaster was the first to leave the track. It bounded along the rails for some distance until it came to the bridge, when the vibration of the structure caused it to careen to one side, and the coupling which attached it to the preceding car snapping, it was thrown down the bank, a long distance of forty or fifty feet. The next car proceeding it crossed the bridge in safety, but only to leap from the track soon after reaching the solid ground. The rear car fell to the left; the other to the right or south side of the bridge. Our first illustration shows the car on the down-slope track; the others show the position of both after the disaster had occurred. It is impossible to describe the horrible consequences of such a disaster to the inmates of the rear car. The cider car, it should be remembered, was not much injured, and did not take fire; and those who landed the passengers were more or less disabled, their injuries were not compared with the rest of the passengers in the burned car. The seventy sixty passengers in this car; only two of them were taken out alive; the rest were burned with most fast recognition.

It is impossible to conceive an idea of the scene in words. Our artist has done his best to be the incidents which occurred as related by eye-witnesses, and has forwarded them to us. One of the young women who had been in the rear least damaged, but who had been badly injured insisted while her wounds were being dressed on nursing a babe rescued from the burning car, and taken from the breast of its mother who had been killed by the fall. A little boy was heard entreating each passer-by to tell him if his mother would get well. "Will my mother get well?"



THE ANGOLA RAILROAD DISASTER—THE REAR CAR JUMPING FROM THE TRACK.—[SKETCHED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

was his agonizing cry. His mother was alive, but no one could have recognized a semblance to the human countenance in her bruised and mangled features. But the boy knew his mother, and knelt by her side, kissing her black and bleeding lips, entreating her most piteously to "get well quick." A man, stupefied from the shock, continually asked for his wife—"Where is she? Shall I never see her again?" Fortunately she escaped with slight injuries, but in the hurry and excitement of removing the bodies the two had been carried to different houses. Her first inquiry was after her husband, and one of the uninjured passengers, discovering the relationship, carried her news of his safety, and took back "her love" to her husband. Both recovered from their wounds.

Our third illustration on this page shows the wreck of the second car, with the burning one in the distance under the bridge. The three in their natural order and connection fully explain and illustrate the disaster. We are indebted for one of our sketches to MR. ERASMUS W. SMITH, the well-known engineer.

THE ANGOLA DISASTER—THE BURNING CAR.—[SKETCHED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

THE ANGOLA DISASTER—WRECKS OF THE CARS.—[SKETCHED BY ERASMUS W. SMITH.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER IV.

I AM truly sorry to detain you over me and my bee-hive chair. A sleepy old man, in a sunny back-yard, is not an interesting object, I am well aware. But things must be put down in their places, as things actually happened—and you must please to jog on a little while longer with me, in expectation of Mr. Franklin Blake's arrival later in the day.

Before I had time to doze off again, after my daughter Penelope had left me, I was disturbed by a rattling of plates and dishes in the servants' hall, which meant that dinner was ready. Taking my own meals in my own sitting-room, I had nothing to do with the servants' dinner, except to wish them a good stomach to it all round, previous to composing myself once more in my chair. I was just stretching my legs, when out bounced another woman on me. Not my daughter again; only Nancy, the kitchen-maid, this time. I was straight in her way out; and I observed, as she asked me to let her by, that she had a sulky face —a thing which, as head of the servants, I never allow, on principle, to pass me without inquiry.

"What are you turning your back on your dinner for?" I asked. "What's wrong now, Nancy?"

Nancy tried to push by without answering; upon which I rose up, and took her by the ear. She is a nice, plump young lass, and it is customary with me to adopt that manner of showing that I personally approve of a girl.

"What's wrong now?" I said, once more.

"Rosanna's late again for dinner," says Nancy. "And I'm sent to fetch her in. All the hard work falls on my shoulders in this house. Let me alone, Mr. Betteredge!"

The person here mentioned as Rosanna was our second house-maid. Having a kind of pity for our second house-maid (why, you shall presently know), and seeing in Nancy's face that she would fetch her fellow-servant in with more hard words than might be needful under the circumstances, it struck me that I had nothing particular to do, and that I might as well fetch Rosanna myself; giving her a hint to be punctual in future, which I knew she would take kindly from me.

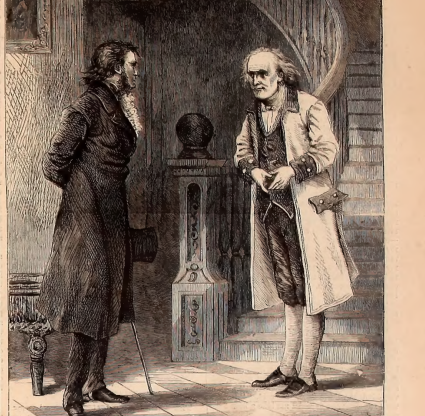
"Where is Rosanna?" I inquired.

"At the sands, of course," says Nancy, with a toss of her head. "She had another of her fainting fits this morning, and she asked to go out and get a breath of fresh air. I have no patience with her."

"Go back to your dinner, my girl," I said. "I have patience with her, and I'll fetch her in."

Nancy (who has a fine appetite) looked pleased. When she looks pleased she looks nice. When she looks nice, I chuck her under the chin. It isn't immorality—it's only habit.

Well, I took my stick, and set off for the sands.



No! it won't do to set off yet. I am sorry again to detain you; but you really must hear the story of the sands, and the story of Rosanna —for this reason, that the matter of the Diamond touches them both nearly. How hard I try to get on with my statement without stopping by the way, and how badly I succeed! But, there! —Persons and Things do turn up so vexatiously in this life, and will in a manner insist on being noticed. Let us take it easy, and let us take it short; we shall be in the thick of the mystery soon, I promise you!

Rosanna (to put the Person before the Thing, which is but common politeness) was the only new servant in our house. About four months before the time I am writing of my lady had been in London, and had gone over a Reformatory, intended to save forlorn women from drifting back into bad ways, after they had got released from prison. The matron, seeing my lady took an interest in the place, pointed out a girl to her, named Rosanna Spearman, and told her a most miserable story, which I haven't the heart to repeat here: for I don't like to be made wretched without any use, and no more do you. The upshot of it was, that Rosanna Spearman had been a thief, and not being of the sort that get up Companies in the City, and rob from thousands, instead of only robbing from one, the law laid hold of her, and the prison and the reformatory followed the lead of the law. The matron's opinion of Rosanna was (in spite of what she had done) that the girl was one in a thousand, and that she only wanted a chance to prove herself worthy of any Christian woman's interest in her. My lady (being a Christian woman, if ever there was one yet) said to the matron upon that, "Rosanna Spearman shall have her chance in my service." In a week afterward Rosanna Spearman entered this establishment as our second house-maid.

Not a soul was told the girl's story excepting Miss Rachel and me. My lady, doing me the honor to consult me about most things, consulted me about Rosanna. Having fallen a good deal latterly into the late Sir John's way of always agreeing with my lady, I agreed with her heartily about Rosanna Spearman.

A fairer chance no girl could have had than was given to this poor girl of ours. None of the servants could cast her past life in her teeth, for none of the servants knew what it had been. She had her wages and her privileges, like the rest of them; and every now and then a friendly word from my lady, in private, to encourage her. In return she showed herself, I am bound to say, well worthy of the kind treatment bestowed upon her. Though far from strong, and troubled occasionally with those fainting fits already mentioned, she went about her work modestly and uncomplainingly, doing it carefully and doing it well. But somehow she failed to make friends among the other women-servants, excepting my daughter Penelope, who was always kind to Rosanna, though never intimate with her.

I hardly know what the girl did to offend them. There was certainly no beauty about her to make the others envious; she was the plainest woman in the house, with the additional misfortune of having one shoulder bigger than the other. What the servants chiefly resented, I think, was her silent tongue and her solitary ways. She read or worked in leisure hours when the rest gossiped. And when it came to her turn to go out, nine times out of ten she quietly put on her bonnet, and had her turn by herself. She never quarreled, she never took offense: she only kept a certain distance, obstinately and civilly, between the rest of them and herself. Add to this that, plain as she was, there was just a dash of something that wasn't like a house-maid, and that was like a lady, about her. It might have been in her voice, or it might have been in her face. All I can say is that the other women pounced on it like lightning the first day she came into the house; and said (which was most unjust) that Rosanna Spearman gave herself airs.

"MY LADY AND MISS RACHEL REGRET THAT THEY ARE ENGAGED, COLONEL."

Having now told the story of Rosanna, I have only to notice one out of the many queer ways of this strange girl to get on next to the story of the sands.

"THERE SHE WAS, ALL ALONE, LOOKING OUT ON THE QUICKSAND AND THE SEA."

Our house is high up on the Yorkshire coast, and close by the sea. We have got beautiful walks all round us, in every direction but one. That one I acknowledge to be a horrid walk. It leads, for a quarter of a mile, through a dismal tract of fir plantation, and brings you out between low cliffs on the loneliest and ugliest little bay on all our coast.

The sand-hills here run down to the sea, and end in two spits of rock jutting out opposite each other, till you lose sight of them in the mist. One is called the North Spit, and one the South. Between the two, shifting backward and forward at certain seasons of the year, lies the most horrible quicksand on the shores of Yorkshire. At the turn of the tide something goes on in the unknown deeps below, which sets the whole face of the quicksand quivering and trembling in a manner most remarkable to see, and which has given to it, among the people in our parts, the name of The Shivering Sand. A great bank, half a mile out, nigh the mouth of the bay, breaks the force of the main ocean coming in from the offing. Winter and summer, when the tide flows over the quicksand, the sea seems to leave the waves behind it on the bank, and rolls its waters in smoothly with a heave, and covers the sand in silence. A lonesome and a horrid retreat, I can tell you! No boat ever ventures into this bay. No children from our fishing-village, called Cobb's Hole, ever come here to play. The very birds of the air, as it seems to me, give the Shivering Sand a wide berth. That a young woman, with dozens of nice walks to choose from, and company to go with her, if she only said "Come!" should prefer this place, and should sit and work or read in it, all alone, when it's her turn out, I grant you, passes belief. It's true, nevertheless, account for it as you may, that this was Rosanna Spearman's favorite walk, except when she went once or twice to Cobb's Hole, to see the only friend she had in our neighborhood—of whom more anon. It's also true that I was now setting out for this same place, to fetch the girl in to dinner, which brings us round happily to our former point, and starts us fair again on our way to the sands.

I saw two signs of the girl in the plantation. When I got out, through the sand-hills, on to the beach, there she was, in her little straw bonnet, and her plain gray cloak that she always wore to hide her deformed shoulder as much as might be —there she was, all alone, looking out on the quicksand and the sea.

She started when I came up with her, and turned her head away from me. Not looking me in the face being another of the proceedings which, as head of the servants, I never allow, on principle, to pass without inquiry—I turned her round my way, and saw that she was crying. My bandana handkerchief—one of six beauties given to me by my lady—was handy in my pocket. I took it out, and I said to Rosanna, "Come and sit down, my dear, on the slope of the beach along with me. I'll dry your eyes for you first, and then I'll make so bold as to ask what you have been crying about."

When you come to my age you will find sitting down on the slope of a beach a much longer job than you think it now. By the time I was settled, Rosanna had dried her own eyes with a very inferior handkerchief to mine—a cheap cambric. She looked very quiet, and very wretched; but she sat down by me like a good girl, when I told her. When you want to comfort a woman by the shortest way take her on your knee. I thought of the golden rule. But there! Rosanna wasn't Nancy, and that's the truth of it!

"Now tell me, my dear," I said, "what are you crying about?"

"About the years that are gone, Mr. Betteredge," says Rosanna, quietly. "My past life still comes back to me sometimes."

"Come, come, my girl," I said, "your past life is all sponged out. Why can't you forget it?"

She took me by one of the lappets of my coat. I am a slovenly old man, and a good deal of my meat and drink gets splashed about on my clothes. Sometimes one of the women, and sometimes another, cleans me of my grease. The day before Rosanna had taken out a spot for me on the lappet of my coat with a new composition warranted to remove any thing. The grease was gone, but there was a little dull place left on the nap of the cloth where the grease had been. The girl pointed to that place and shook her head.

"The stain is taken off," she said. "But the place shows, Mr. Betteredge—the place shows!"

A remark which takes a man unawares by means of his own coat is not an easy remark to answer. Something in the girl herself, too, made me particularly sorry for her just then. She had nice brown eyes, plain as she was in other ways—and she looked at me with a sort of respect for my happy old age and my good character, as things forever out of her own reach, which made my heart heavy for our second house-maid. Not feeling myself able to comfort her, there was only one other thing to do. That thing was—to take her in to dinner.

"Help me up," I said. "You're late for dinner, Rosanna—and I have come to fetch you in."

"You, Mr. Betteredge!" says she.

"They told Nancy to fetch you," I said. "But I thought you might like your scolding better, my dear, if it came from me."

Instead of helping me up, the poor thing stole her hand into mine, and gave it a little squeeze. She tried hard to keep from crying again, and succeeded—for which I respected her. "You're very kind, Mr. Betteredge," she said. "I don't want any dinner to-day—let me bide a little longer here."

"What makes you like to be here?" I asked. "What is it that brings you everlastingly to this miserable place?"

"Something draws me to it," says the girl, making images with her finger in the sand. "I try to keep away from it, and I can't. Sometimes," says she, in a low voice, as if she was frightened at her own fancy, "sometimes, Mr. Betteredge, I think that my grave is waiting for me here."

"There's roast mutton and suet pudding waiting for you!" says I. "Go in to dinner directly. This is what comes, Rosanna, of thinking on an empty stomach!" I spoke severely, being naturally indignant (at my time of life) to hear a young woman of five-and-twenty talking about her latter end!"

She didn't seem to hear me: she put her hand on my shoulder, and kept me where I was, sitting by her side.

"I think the place has laid a spell on me," she said. "I dream of it night after night; I think of it when I sit stitching at my work. You know I am grateful, Mr. Betteredge—you know I try to deserve your kindness, and my lady's confidence in me. But I wonder sometimes whether the life here is too quiet and too good for such a woman as I am, after all I have gone through, Mr. Betteredge—after all I have gone through. It's more lonely to me to be among the other servants, knowing I am not what they are, than it is to be here. My lady doesn't know, the matron at the reformatory doesn't know, what a dreadful reproach honest people are in themselves to a woman like me. Don't scold me, there's a dear good man. I do my work, don't I? Please not to tell my lady I am discontented—I am not. My mind's unquiet, sometimes, that's all. She snatched her hand off my shoulder, and suddenly pointed down to the quicksand. "Look!" she said. "Isn't it wonderful? isn't it terrible? I have seen it dozens of times, and it's always as new to me as if I had never seen it before!"

I looked where she pointed. The tide was on the turn, and the horrid sand began to shiver. The broad brown face of it heaved slowly, and then dimpled and quivered all over. "Do you know what it looks like to me?" says Rosanna, catching me by the shoulder again. "It looks as if it had hundreds of suffocating people under it—all struggling to get to the surface, and all sinking lower and lower in the dreadful deeps! Throw a stone in, Mr. Betteredge! Throw a stone in, and let's see the sand suck it down!"

Here was unwholesome talk! Here was an empty stomach feeding on an unquiet mind! My answer—a pretty sharp one, in the poor girl's own interests, I promise you!—was at my tongue's end, when it was snapped short off on a sudden by a voice among the sand-hills shouting for me by my name. "Betteredge!" cries the voice, "where are you?" "Here!" I shouted out in return, without a notion in my head who it was. Rosanna started to her feet, and stood looking toward the voice. I was just thinking of getting on my own legs next, when I was staggered by a sudden change in the girl's face.

Her complexion turned of a beautiful red, which I had never seen in it before; she brightened all over with a kind of speechless and breathless surprise. "Who is it?" I asked. Rosanna gave me back my own question. "Oh! who is it?" she said, softly, more to herself than to me. I twisted round on the sand, and looked behind me. There, coming out on us from among the hills, was a bright-eyed young gentleman, dressed in a beautiful fawn-colored suit, with gloves and hat to match, with a rose in his button-hole, and a smile on his face that might have set the Shivering Sand itself smiling at him in return. Before I could get on my legs he plumped down on the sand by the side of me, put his arm round my neck, foreign fashion, and gave me a hug that fairly squeezed the breath out of my body. "Dear old Betteredge!" says he. "I owe you seven and sixpence. Now do you know who I am?"

Lord bless us and save us! Here—four good hours before we expected him—was Mr. Franklin Blake!

Before I could say a word I saw Mr. Franklin, a little surprised, to all appearance, look up from me to Rosanna. Following his lead, I looked at the girl too. She was blushing of a deeper red than ever; seemingly at having caught Mr. Franklin's eye, and she turned and left us suddenly, in a confusion quite unaccountable to my mind, without either making her courtesy to the gentleman or saying a word to me—very unlike her usual self: a civiler and better-behaved servant, in general, you never met with.

"That's an odd girl," says Mr. Franklin. "I wonder what she sees in me to surprise her?"

"I suppose, Sir," I answered, drolling on our young gentleman's Continental education, "it's the varnish from foreign parts."

I set down here Mr. Franklin's careless question, and my foolish answer, as a consolation and encouragement to all stupid people—it being, as I have remarked, a great satisfaction to our inferior fellow-creatures to find that their betters are, on occasions, no brighter than they are. Neither Mr. Franklin, with his wonderful foreign training, nor I, with my age, experience, and natural mother-wit, had the ghost of an idea of what Rosanna Spearman's unaccountable behavior really meant. She was out of our thoughts, poor soul, before we had seen the last flutter of her little gray cloak among the sand-hills. And what of that? you will ask naturally enough. Read on, good friend, as patiently as you can, and perhaps you will be as sorry for Rosanna Spearman as I was, when I found out the truth.

CHAPTER V.

THE first thing I did, after we were left together alone, was to make a third attempt to get up from my seat on the sand. Mr. Franklin stopped me.

"There is one advantage about this horrid place," he said; "we have got it all to ourselves. Stay where you are, Betteredge; I have something to say to you."

While he was speaking I was looking at him, and trying to see something of the boy I remembered in the man before me. The man put me out. Look as I might I could see no more of his boy's rosy cheeks than his boy's trim little jacket. His complexion had got pale: his face, at the lower part, was covered, to my great surprise and disappointment, with a curly brown beard and mustaches. He had a lively touch-and-go way with him, very pleasant and engaging, I admit; but nothing to compare with his free-and-easy manners of other times. To make matters worse, he had promised to be tall, and had not kept his promise. He was neat, and slim, and well made; but he wasn't by an inch or two up to the middle height. In short, he baffled me altogether. The years that had passed had left nothing of his old self, except the bright, straightforward look in his eyes. There I found our nice boy again, and there I concluded to stop in my investigation.

"Welcome back to the old place, Mr. Franklin," I said. "All the more welcome, Sir, that you have come some hours before we expected you."

"I have a reason for coming before you expected me," answered Mr. Franklin. "I suspect, Betteredge, that I have been followed and watched in London for the last three or four days; and I have traveled by the morning instead of the afternoon train because I wanted to give a certain dark-looking stranger the slip."

Those words did more than surprise me. They brought back to my mind, in a flash, the three jugglers, and Penelope's notion that they meant some mischief to Mr. Franklin Blake.

"Who's watching you, Sir—and why?" I inquired.

"Tell me about the three Indians you have had at the house to-day," says Mr. Franklin, without noticing my question. "It's just possible, Betteredge, that my stranger and your three jugglers may turn out to be pieces of the same puzzle."

"How do you come to know about the jugglers, Sir?" I asked, putting one question on the top of another, which was bad manners, I own. But you don't expect much from poor human nature—so don't expect much from me.

"I saw Penelope at the house," says Mr. Franklin; "and Penelope told me. Your daughter promised to be a pretty girl, Betteredge, and she has kept her promise. Penelope has got a small ear and a small foot. Did the late Mrs. Betteredge possess those inestimable advantages?"

"The late Mrs. Betteredge possessed a good many defects, Sir," says I. "One of them (if you will pardon my mentioning it) was never keeping to the matter in hand. She was more like a fly than a woman: she couldn't settle on any thing."

"She would just have suited me," says Mr. Franklin. "I never settle on any thing either. Betteredge, your edge is better than ever. Your daughter said as much, when I asked for particulars about the jugglers. 'Father will tell you, Sir. He's a wonderful man for his age; and he expresses himself beautifully.' Penelope's own words—blushing divinely. Not even my respect for you prevented me from—never mind; I knew her when she was a child, and she's none the worse for it. Let's be serious. What did the jugglers do?"

I was something dissatisfied with my daughter—not for letting Mr. Franklin kiss her; Mr. Franklin was welcome to that—but for forcing me to tell her foolish story at second-hand. However, there was no help for it now but to mention the circumstances. Mr. Franklin's merriment all died away as I went on. He sat knitting his eyebrows and twisting his beard. When I had done, he repeated after me two of the questions which the chief juggler had put to the boy—seemingly for the purpose of fixing them well in his mind.

"'Is it on the road to this house, and on no other, that the English gentleman will pass by us to-day?' 'Has the English gentleman got It about him?' I suspect," says Mr. Franklin, pulling a little sealed paper parcel out of his pocket, "that 'It' means this. And 'this,' Betteredge, means my uncle Herncastle's famous Diamond."

"Good Lord, Sir!" I broke out, "how do you come to be in charge of the wicked Colonel's Diamond?"

"The wicked Colonel's will has left his Diamond as a birthday present to my cousin Rachel," says Mr. Franklin. "And my father, as the wicked Colonel's executor, has given it in charge to me to bring down here."

If the sea, then oozing in smoothly over the Shivering Sand, had been changed into dry land before my own eyes, I doubt if I could have been more surprised than I was when Mr. Franklin spoke those words.

"The Colonel's Diamond left to Miss Rachel!" says I. "And your father, Sir, the Colonel's executor! Why, I would have laid any bet you like, Mr. Franklin, that your father wouldn't have touched the Colonel with a pair of tongs!"

"Strong language, Betteredge! What was there against the Colonel? He belonged to your time, not to mine. Tell me what you know about him, and I'll tell you how my father came to be his executor, and more besides. I have made some discoveries in London about my uncle Herncastle and his Diamond, which have rather an ugly look to my eyes; and I want you to confirm them. You called him the 'wicked Colonel' just now. Search your memory, my old friend, and tell me why."

I saw he was in earnest, and I told him.

Here follows the substance of what I said, written out entirely for your benefit. Pay attention to it, or you will be all abroad, when we get deeper into the story. Clear your mind of the children, or the dinner, or the new bonnet, or what not. Try if you can't forget politics, horses, prices in the City, and grievances at the club. I hope you won't take this freedom on my part amiss; it's only a way I have of appealing to the gentle reader. Lord! haven't I seen you with the greatest authors in your hands, and don't I know how ready your attention is to wander when it's a book that asks for it, instead of a person?

I spoke, a little way back, of my lady's father, the old lord with the short temper and the long tongue. He had five children in all. Two sons to begin with; then, after a long time, his wife broke out breeding again, and the three young ladies came briskly one after the other, as fast as the nature of things would permit; my mistress, as before mentioned, being the youngest and best of the three. Of the two sons, the eldest, Arthur, inherited the title and estates. The second, the Honorable John, got a fine fortune left him by a relative, and went into the army.

It's an ill bird, they say, that fouls its own nest. I look on the noble family of the Herncastles as being my nest; and I shall take it as a favor if I am not expected to enter into particulars on the subject of the Honorable John. He was, I honestly believe, one of the greatest blackguards that ever lived. I can hardly say more or less for him than that. He went into the army, beginning in the Guards. He had to leave the Guards before he was two-and-twenty—never mind why. They are very strict in the army, and they were too strict for the Honorable John. He went out to India to see whether they were equally strict there, and to try a little active service. In the matter of bravery (to give him his due) he was a mixture of bull-dog and gamecock, with a dash of the savage. He was at the taking of Seringapatam. Soon afterward he changed into another regiment, and, in course of time, changed again into a third. In the third he got his last step as lieutenant-colonel, and, getting that, got also a sun-stroke, and came home to England.

He came back with a character that closed the doors of all his family against him, my lady (then just married) taking the lead, and declaring (with Sir John's approval, of course) that her brother should never enter any house of hers. There was more than one slur on the Colonel that made people shy of him; but the blot of the Diamond is all I need mention here.

It was said he had got possession of his Indian jewel by means which, bold as he was, he didn't dare acknowledge. He never attempted to sell it—not being in need of money, and not (to give him his due again) making money an object. He never gave it away; he never even showed it to any living soul. Some said he was afraid of its getting him into a difficulty with the military authorities; others (very ignorant indeed of the real nature of the man) said he was afraid, if he showed it, of its costing him his life.

There was perhaps a grain of truth mixed up with this last report. It was false to say that he was afraid; but it was a fact that his life had been twice threatened in India; and it was firmly believed that the Diamond was at the bottom of it. When he came back to England, and found himself avoided by every body, the Diamond was thought to be at the bottom of it again. The mystery of the Colonel's life got in the Colonel's way, and outlawed him, as you may say, among his own people. The men wouldn't let him into their clubs; the women—more than one—whom he wanted to marry, refused him; friends and relations got too near-sighted to see him in the street.

Some men in this mess would have tried to set themselves right with the world. But to give in, even when he was wrong, and had all society against him, was not the way of the Honorable John. He had kept the Diamond, in flat defiance of assassination, in India. He kept the Diamond, in flat defiance of public opinion, in England. There you have the portrait of the man before you, as in a picture: a character that braved every thing; and a face, handsome as it was, that looked possessed by the devil.

We heard different rumors about him from time to time. Sometimes they said he was given up to smoking opium, and collecting old books; sometimes he was reported to be trying strange things in chemistry; sometimes he was seen carousing and amusing himself among the lowest people in the lowest slums of London. Anyhow, a solitary, vicious, underground life was the life the Colonel led. Once, and once only, after his return to England, I myself saw him, face to face.

About two years before the time of which I am now writing, and about a year and a half before the time of his death, the Colonel came unexpectedly to my lady's house in London. It was the night of Miss Rachel's birthday, the twenty-first of June; and there was a party in honor of it, as usual. I received a message from the footman to say that a gentleman wanted to see me. Going up into the hall, there I found the Colonel, wasted, and worn, and old, and shabby, and as wild and as wicked as ever.

"Go up to my sister," says he; "and say that I have called to wish my niece many happy returns of the day."

He had made attempts by letter, more than once already, to be reconciled with my lady, for no other purpose, I am firmly persuaded, than to annoy her. But this was the first time he had actually come to the house. I had it on the tip of my tongue to say that my mistress had a party that night. But the devilish look of him daunted me. I went up stairs with his message, and left him, by his own desire, waiting in the hall. The servants stood staring at him, at a distance, as if he was a walking engine of destruction, loaded with powder and shot, and likely to go off among them at a moment's notice.

My lady has a dash—no more—of the family temper. "Tell Colonel Herncastle," she said, when I gave her her brother's message, "that Miss Verinder is engaged, and that I decline to see him." I tried to plead for a civiler answer than that; knowing the Colonel's constitutional superiority to the restraints which govern gentlemen in general. Quite useless! The family temper flashed out at me directly. "When I want your advice," says my lady, "you know that I always ask for it. I don't ask for it now." I went down stairs with the message, of which I took the liberty of presenting a new and amended edition of my own contriving, as follows: "My lady and Miss Rachel regret that they are engaged, Colonel; and beg to be excused having the honor of seeing you."

I expected him to break out, even at that polite way of putting it. To my surprise he did nothing of the sort; he alarmed me by taking the thing with an unnatural quiet. His eyes, of a glittering bright gray, just settled on me for a moment; and he laughed, not out of himself, like other people, but into himself, in a soft, chuckling, horridly mischievous way. "Thank you, Betteredge," he said. "I shall remember my niece's birthday." With that, he turned on his heel, and walked out of the house.

The next birthday came round, and we heard he was ill in bed. Six months afterward—that is to say, six months before the time I am now writing of—there came a letter from a highly respectable clergyman to my lady. It communicated two wonderful things in the way of family news. First, that the Colonel had forgiven his sister on his death-bed. Second, that he had forgiven every body else, and had made a most edifying end. I have myself (in spite of the bishops and the clergy) an unfeigned respect for the Church; but I am firmly persuaded, at the same time, that the devil remained in undisturbed possession of the Honorable John, and that the last abominable act in the life of that abominable man was (saving your presence) to take the clergyman in!

This was the sum total of what I had to tell Mr. Franklin. I remarked that he listened more and more eagerly the longer I went on. Also, that the story of the Colonel being sent away from his sister's door, on the occasion of his niece's birthday, seemed to strike Mr. Franklin like a shot that had hit the mark. Though he didn't acknowledge it, I saw that I had made him uneasy, plainly enough, in his face.

"You have said your say, Betteredge," he remarked. "It's my turn now. Before, however, I tell you what discoveries I have made in London, and how I come to be mixed up in this matter of the Diamond, I want to know one thing. You look, my old friend, as if you didn't quite understand the object to be answered by this consultation of ours. Do your looks belie you?"

"No, Sir," I said. "My looks, on this occasion at any rate, tell the truth."

"In that case," says Mr. Franklin, "suppose I put you up to my point of view before we go any further. I see three very serious questions involved in the Colonel's birthday-gift to my cousin Rachel. Follow me carefully, Betteredge; and count me off on your fingers, if it will help you," says Mr. Franklin, with a certain pleasure in showing how clear-headed he could be, which reminded me wonderfully of old times when he was a boy. "Question the first: Was the Colonel's Diamond the object of a conspiracy in India? Question the second: Has the conspiracy followed the Colonel's Diamond to England? Question the third: Did the Colonel know the conspirators followed the Diamond; and has he purposely left a legacy of trouble and danger to his sister, through the innocent medium of his sister's child? That is what I am driving at, Betteredge. Don't let me frighten you."

It was all very well to say that, but he had frightened me.

If he was right, here was our quiet English house suddenly invaded by a devilish Indian diamond—bringing after it a conspiracy of living rogues, set loose on us by the vengeance of a dead man. There was our situation, as revealed to me in Mr. Franklin's last words! Who ever heard the like of it—in the nineteenth century, mind; in an age of progress, and in a country which rejoices in the blessings of the British constitution? Nobody ever heard the like of it, and, consequently, nobody can be expected to believe it. I shall go on with my story, however, in spite of that.

When you get a sudden alarm, of the sort that I had got now, nine times out of ten the place you feel it in is your stomach. When you feel it in your stomach your attention wanders, and you begin to fidget. I fidgeted silently in my place on the sofa, and Mr. Franklin noticed me, contending with a perturbed stomach, or mind, which you please—they mean the same thing—and, checking himself just as he was starting with his part of the story, said to me, sharply, "What do you want?"

What did I want? I didn't tell him; but I'll tell you, in confidence. I wanted a whiff of my pipe, and a turn at Robinson Crusoe.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 26.

PAUL FALCONER'S LEGACY.

IT was a bleak December evening. People called it "Christmas weather." So it was for those who had a great fire on the hearth, bowls of belly on the wall, and all sorts of savory cooking going forward in the kitchen. But some people had none of these things; and they called it "hard times."

There were no outward signs of Christmas in a certain desolate house in the north of London. It belonged to a poor widow, who earned a scanty living by letting furnished apartments. The neighborhood was too humble, and the furniture too mean, for her lodgers to be any thing but needy, reduced people. Yet the little faded house was quiet and comfortable; to the last new-comer it seemed quite a haven of peace.

He was a young man, not more than two-and-twenty. He had very little luggage, and that was principally manuscript. He scarce ever left his room; and for the family knew about him was that his name was Paul Falconer, and that his rent was paid in advance.

On Christmas-eve, when she carried some coals to his fire, she found him lying listlessly upon the little uncomfortable sofa. There had been an unusual bustle on the staircase, and she watched her moving about his room he asked what had caused it.

"Why, you see, Sir," she answered, "it's Christmas-time; and that makes a little difference to every one."

"What! is there a party in the house?" he asked.

"No, indeed, Sir; but there's one a-coming and another a-going. The young gentleman in the room above has got his brother with him. They're quiet, and in a place is the bull's only home when he comes from boarding-school. The elder one is a good brother, and makes all sorts of sacrifices; and the little one seems a nice boy, and likely to reward him. Then the two lodgers in the attics have both gone until after Boxing-Day—one to his mother's house, and the other to see his sweet-heart in the country. You know Christmas comes but once a year, Sir."

"Ay, indeed!" he said.

"Maybe you'll be having company yourself, to-morrow, Sir?" she inquired, stooping to pick a shred from the hearth-rug.

"No—no one," he said; "there is no one coming."

She went out and closed the door, and he rose from his couch and took the fire-guard from the fire-place.

"It is too late," he said to himself; "too late —too late! I reap only what I sowed. God forgive me!"

For some time he sat in silence; then he murmured again, "I have all for Fame—home duties, household affections. I let my mother work herself into the grave, and my brother is ready for any future prospects by premature toil. Then, when she was gone, I was too self-occupied to remember my young brother, and so I left him to himself; and while I sought fame he found infamy: and was only carried from a convict's cell to a grave. And I—I—And where is this Fame? I see her in the dim distance, as I stand on the brink of the tomb, and she is not as fair as I fancied her. And I have only lived for this! so I have surely lived in vain!"

Presently he turned to the table, and taking up pen and paper he wrote:

"THE BEAUTIFUL BIRD OF SPRING.

"Many years ago, in a far-off country, there lived a youth named Espero. He resided with his mother in a small cottage, and his only duty was to cultivate the fields around. Espero was very happy until he heard a legend of a strange, beautiful bird, whose plumage possessed every hue, which lived in the spring-time, carrying in its crest a precious stone, which made the fortune of the lucky being who captured it. After hearing this story he spent his time in watching the clouds, at the very season when he should have been sowing his furrows, which conduct made his mother very angry and uneasy.

"At last, one bright morning, he spied the object of his desire, and started off in pursuit. He heard his mother call, but he only shouted back that he would return the moment it was caught. The bird flew over his fields, and on he went after it, trampling down his own flowers and vegetables. Oh, it was a weary race, and led through such dismal ways! But it ended at last. He caught the bird, and saw the gem on its head. It was not so large as the bird had reported, in short, not worth more than two or three of his own harvests. And the fowl pecked him sorely all the way home. But when he got there he wondered to find the neighbors did not know him, and he wondered more to find his fields brown, and his flowers withered. He went to the house and called his mother, but there was no answer. He found the rooms were all empty. So he went out again, and spoke to the first man he met.

"'Why don't you speak to me?' he asked.

"'Who on earth are you?' replied the other.

"'Are you gone mad? Don't you know Espero—your next-door neighbor?'

"The man answered, and then turned about and shouted, 'Comrades, all of you, here's Espero come home!'

"What wonder is that?' said Espero, pettishly. 'Where is my mother?'

"'Dead, long ago,' said a woman who came up.

"'Dead! in this short time!' he exclaimed, incredulously.

"'Short time!' some indeed!' remarked the woman; 'it's more than ten years, and it might be twenty by the changes in you—your hair is nearly gray!'

"And Espero sat down on the ground, and wept.

"Quite a little crowd gathered round him, and a sympathetic old man said every one else he had heard the 'Legend of the Beautiful Bird.'

"Presently he looked up and said faintly, 'Carry me home. There is a sickness at my heart; I think I shall die.'

"And the beldam stooped over him, and said, 'I did not know you were under the curse of my story. I told, or I could have taught you that though the bird has a gem in its crest it has poison in its talons.'

"So Espero died, and they buried him, and a stranger got the price of the BEAUTIFUL BIRD OF SPRING."

When Paul Falconer had finished this fable he folded it and wrote a superscription on the cover. Then he shivered and sighed wearily. "I am chilly and tired: I must rest; I have lived in vain—it is too late to live."

And when the frosty sunshine stole into the dim chamber and the widow came to perform her daily duties she found that a Guest had been there early on that Christmas morning, and had taken Paul Falconer from his lonely feast-day, for she stood face to face with the Dead.

On New-Year's Day one or two gentlemen came to the humble funeral, and took possession of the disordered room, and after a consultation which they found on the desk where Paul had left it. And then the other lodgers told the widow that the dead man had been a writer of fiction, and they read in the public prints about "a genius who had left his fame behind him;" and the widow lifted her head and wondered, and when the news-writers had quite forgotten his gifts, she remembered him as "a kind spoken youth, whom folks call clever."

And that was the end of Paul Falconer.

* * * * *

More than twenty Christmas-tides passed away, and then one very snowy Christmas-eve found a youth lounging about in the great "keeping-room" of the Bird-in-Hand Inn. Though the evening was drawing on, he had no light except from the great fire on the hearth, neither did he appear to desire any other light. The room was comfortable enough, and would have been snug had the red curtains been drawn to exclude the desolation without; but as it was he lay paced the room he seemed too lost in thought to notice these things.

He was about sixteen years of age, rather tall, with a striking face, just a shade too pale, and looking paler because of his mourning apparel. What mourning acquisition the rest of the whole house, for the first snow of the season lay on the fresh sods of its master's grave. Maurice Liddon had come home to be settled in St. Thomas.

It was an important time in the lad's life, for that pale youth was an enthusiast in art, and his father had made arrangements for his admission into the studio of a great London painter. But now the strong providing hand was gone. Besides this it was necessary for the widowed mother to make any sacrifice for his advantage. Maurice Liddon knew this, and knew what this sacrifice would be. Mrs. Liddon was a lady considered superior to that of the village school, his mother must dismiss her servants, and the pleasant household would drop into a more humble style of existence, while he would fare sumptuously in every thing save out a bright future for himself. "But they will share it, he thought, "for they will certainly share the comfort and the glory without the labor. Perhaps the girls would not profit much by a costly education, and every one says I shall be great, and I believe I shall; but for if I am doomed to disappoint them—"

"Mother likes me to go," he muttered, presently, as if his conscience called loudly for more decisive words; "her will is to make my going to be a pleasure. She is a dear, good mother, and I will reward her some day. Yes, I will go.

He did not want to think any more about it, so he stirred the fire into a brighter blaze, and looked round the room for a book. There was a small pile of volumes on the side-board, which had been brought out from some of his father's stores. They did not seem very promising; some were Country Magazines, and others numbers of the "Gentleman's Magazine," but at last he lighted on a worn and torn periodical dated twenty years before.

He took it to the fire-light, and kneeled down on the hearth. It contained some chapters of an old-fashioned novel, with many of the pages cut away: a poem, half deficed; and a review of some scientific work, which the progress of knowledge had proved to be one long mistake. In short, only one article was entire and readable, and it was called "The Beautiful Bird of Spring."

Maurice Liddon read the fable quite through, and he says, but did not notice, the name of "Paul Falconer" at the end. Then he leaned his head against the old-china-piece, and gazed into the fire.

About an hour later his mother came in with a candle and some linen; for there was plenty of needle-work to be done before his city outfit could be ready. But Maurice rose and went to her side, and told her he should not go—at least, not for the present—that he could not leave her in her new course, and he was sure he could make great progress by himself. And she threw her arms round his neck, and told him that though she could not bear to see a stain of tears should hinder his start in life, yet she was heartily glad of his decision—she could not say how glad!

Then Maurice took up the torn and worn magazine, and stole to his own room, and put it in the box with his colors and brushes; and then he kneeled down and prayed as he whispered, "I thank thee, Heavenly Father, that thou hast strengthened me to do right!" In this I mean to leave the figure. I mean to do my duty, and then if fame come, it will not be too costly."

And like an answer from God come the meaning of the "dear old-fashioned word promise"—

"Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord God giveth thee."

* * * * *

Years passed on. Once more it was Christmas-tide in Liddon Inn; but it did not find Maurice Liddon in the keeping-room alone. Beside the blazing hearth sat a silvery-haired dame, and on a low stool at her feet were two young girls, in all the fresh beauty of early womanhood. Maurice stood by the table, unfastening sundry post packets.

"There, Lyddie," said he, laughing, and tossing one to his youngest sister, "you must read that for me—your penmanship is not dead yet."

She took the newspaper, and read aloud from the marked paragraph:

"Of all the pictures in the Winter Exhibition, none charms us more than Mr. Liddon's 'Plowing Early Harvest.' While we look at it, we feel the country breeze; we enjoy, indeed, is the artist who need never paint except when inspiration is upon him, and such we feel sure is Mr. Liddon. He does not look upon nature as a lay figure; he knows it, in the poet's words, 'as his mother's face,' and interprets it with the honest affection of a son."

"Well done, Maurice," said the mother, softly, "read just at the right time."

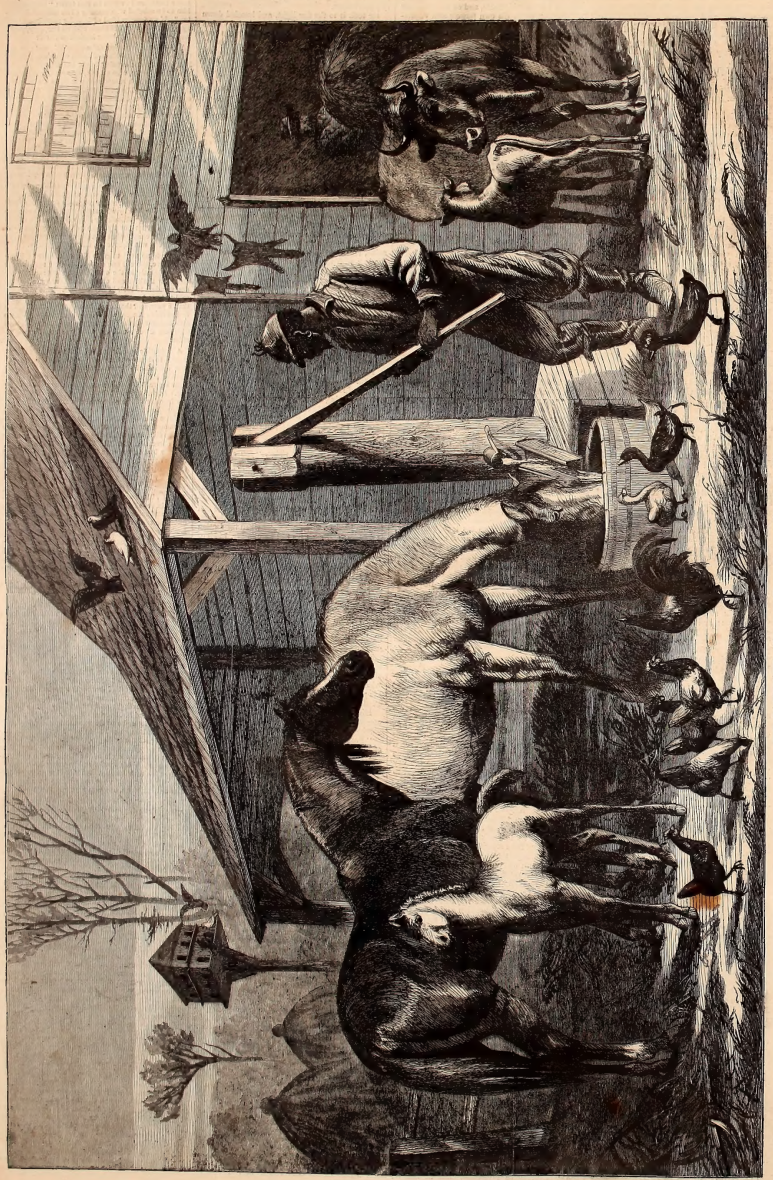
"How famous you would be had you devoted yourself to art as some do?" remarked his eldest sister.

"Not so," replied Maurice, gravely. "Very likely I should have formed wild habits, or degenerated into a mere copyist. Ten years ago I might have been foolish enough to sacrifice certain happiness for uncertain glory; but this little story—read just at the right time—made me wiser;" and Maurice took the old magazine from his painting-box, and pointed to "The Beautiful Bird of Spring."

His two sisters read it—looking over each other—and when they had finished, Lydia sighed gently.

"Paul Falconer! who was he? I never heard of him."

"Neither did I," said Maurice.



HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

RECENT rays that since November 26, when a terrific earthquake and hurricane, no less than five hundred distinct shocks have been felt by the residents of that island. But earthquakes seem to be confined to St. Thomas—more recently they have occurred in divers places nearer home—in Canada, in Vermont, and in Northern New York, although no damage was done in these places, beyond rousing numerous frightened people from their slumbers. Earthquakes, we apprehend, seem to be in an unstable and excited state, and many persons are beginning to quake in their shoes. Nobody can predict when it is to be the matter, but up to present date, in our country at least, earthquakes can not compete with locomotives as "engines of destruction." Indeed it would seem far more safe to take a house in St. Thomas, than to take a car on almost any of our railroad lines. Scarcely a day passes without adding to the list of "accidents," and "railroad disasters" are now of such frequent occurrence as to dismiss her servants, and the pleasant household would drop into a more humble style of existence, while he would fare sumptuously in every thing save out a bright future for himself. "But they will share it, he thought, "for they will certainly share the comfort and the glory without the labor. Perhaps the girls would not profit much by a costly education, and every one says I shall be great, and I believe I shall; but for if I am doomed to disappoint them—"

"Mother likes me to go," he muttered, presently, as if his conscience called loudly for more decisive words; "her will is to make my going to be a pleasure. She is a dear, good mother, and I will reward her some day. Yes, I will go.

He did not want to think any more about it, so he stirred the fire into a brighter blaze, and looked round the room for a book. There was a small pile of volumes on the side-board, which had been brought out from some of his father's stores. They did not seem very promising; some were Country Magazines, and others numbers of the "Gentleman's Magazine," but at last he

Advertisements

THE BARN-YARD.—DRAWN BY EDWIN FORBES.—[SEE PAGE 26.]

ART-STUDENTS AND COPYISTS IN THE LOUVRE GALLERY, PARIS.—DRAWN BY WINSLOW HOMER.—[SEE PAGE 26.]

THE BARN-YARD.

THE large engraving on page 24, by EDWIN FORBES, is not a bad companion picture to the one which we have already noticed on the front page of this issue. The barn-yard may be said to represent what many of the thrifty pioneers leave behind them when their restless spirits, like so many implacable Inspector Buckets, compel them, like as many restless and unquiet Joes, to keep "moving on." But the barn-yard of a thrifty farmer, and the original, with all the incidents portrayed therein, may be found in any of the New England or Middle States.

THE LOUVRE GALLERY.

WE reproduce in this Number of the Weekly one of Mr. WINSLOW HOMER'S studies of Art-life in Paris, made during his late residence in the French capital. It represents the Art-students and copyists in the gallery of the palace of the Louvre, engaged in making studies or copies of the Old Masters which have been gathered there. The great galleries of Paris, and indeed of all the European capitals, are daily crowded in the manner represented in the picture by men and women and sometimes mere children. The gallery of the Louvre is a splendid studio, and magnificently supplied with works of Art. The gallery itself has been over five hundred years in building. In 1200 it was a hunting-lodge; then it was an arsenal; CHARLES V. made it a library; his successor changed it to a fortress; HENRY II. remodeled it into a pretence-gallery, and it was gradually enlarged for this purpose, and finally completed in 1857. It contains among the apartments devoted to Art, the "Musée Français," the "Ancient Art," the "Egyptian Museum," the "Chambers of the Council of State," now used to receive the drawings of all the workmen selected for the "Marine Museum." The works have been collected from all parts of Europe. NAPOLEON I. and his successors have always proved the industrious of the French Art collectors, and in the campaigns in Italy stole—"seized" is the word used by the French in describing the means by their collection—the finest works of the old Italian masters and carried them to Paris. Germany and Austria were also significantly laid under contribution in the same manner. So valuable were the works of Art thus carried off to Paris by the great conqueror that one of the most emphatic articles contributed the Holy Alliance treaty, on the fall of NAPOLEON in 1815, provided for the restoration of the paintings pillaged by France. This, unfortunately for the world this provision was never carried out, and instead of being again scattered throughout Europe many of the finest works of the Old Masters are collected in the Art-temple of the Louvre.

MEMORY'S OFFERING.

IN the winter of 185- I returned to England, after having been absent from it for some thirty years. My object was to inquire after such friends whom I had known before I quitted my native land. Many, I found, were dead. Some, who when I formerly knew them were in health better than a state of poverty, had risen wonderfully in the world. Others, again, who were then in affluence, were reduced almost to penury. Among the latter was a family with which I particularly sympathized. Both husband and wife I had known in India, and had been on terms of great intimacy with them. Some fifteen years before the former had been called to England by the sudden illness of his father, who had been seized with paralysis, from which he had only partially recovered. Thornton, (as that was my friend's name) arrived safely in England, with his wife, and about three months afterward his father died in a state of helpless imbecility.

The old man appeared to have been of a very unamiable disposition. He was excessively avaricious, and yet, at the same time, he entered with courage into difficult enterprises, several of which were unfortunate, while others had indeed him enormous profit. At his death he was found to be possessed of a magnificent freehold estate, and a large number of shares in various life companies. A vast proportion of the latter, however, proved, on investigation by the executors, to be worthless. Although the estate had been especially devised to Thornton by his father, the title-deeds could not be found. That they, and the whole of the property, had formerly been in the old man's possession was certain (he having perused the entire bundle) but as he was exceedingly close in all his affairs, regarding with great jealousy any interference, it was supposed he had concealed the deeds even before his attack of paralysis. As Thornton had never imagined they would be missing, he had made no inquiries respecting them during the old man's life. At first the loss of the deeds gave the heir considerable annoyance, but as no other claimants arose, and as he was unacquainted of an indolent and somewhat careless disposition, he deferred from day to day prosecuting the search, until at last the thought of the deeds almost faded from his mind.

He had remained for thirteen years in quiet possession of his estate, when he was suddenly seized with an attack of inflammation of the lungs. When this attack subsided it left a most distressing weakness, from which, notwithstanding all the skill of the physician who attended him, there was little hope of his recovery. Finding all other remedies fail, and fearing that the disease might pass into consumption if it were not checked, he was advised to pass a winter in the south of Italy, to try the effect of a change of climate. To undertake a journey of the kind was most distressing to both Thornton and his wife, as they had several children whom they would be obliged to leave behind them. They determined, however, to follow the advice given them, and in the autumn they started for Naples. After they had been about two months in that city my friend received a letter from his solicitor, informing him that a claimant had come forward for his estates in ——shire. He went on to say that at first sight the claimant's case appeared to be a strong one, but that as Thornton was of course in possession of the title-deeds as well as the transfer of the property, they should doubtless be able to prove the claim fraudulent. He concluded by advising Thornton's immediate return to England, so that they might as soon as possible have an interview with counsel, and set aside the probabilities of an expensive Chancery suit.

The letter came like a thunder-clap on Thornton. He now blamed himself severely for his indolence and apathy in not having sought for the title-deeds. Should a forgery would have been to find immediately after the death of his father, they would now, of course, be far more so. He had no alternative, however. Although the change of climate had done him no good he resolved to come back to England at once, and commence what he ought to have commenced years before—an active search for the title-deeds. Accordingly, a few days after the receipt of the letter, he and his wife left Naples for home. Their journey proceeded favorably enough till they arrived at Mount Cenis, when they were overtaken during the night by a violent snowstorm. Their carriage was upset, though fortunately they escaped without personal injury. At the time of the accident they were near one of the post-houses. An open sledge was prepared for them, and they continued their journey. When on the summit, they were for a considerable time exposed to the cold blast, their progress being of the slowest. The descent was a precipitation, however, was accomplished without difficulty, nor did any thing else worthy of notice occur till they reached the post-house of Lanslebourg, on the time appeared to have suffered no very great inconvenience from his accustomed exposure to the cold, but soon afterward he was in a somewhat alarming degree. He was seized with a distressing cough, which allowed him no sooner either night or day, [illegible] appeared to be attended to. He called upon his lawyer, and then, for the first time, told him the terrible truth, that one of his most valuable title-deeds but that he did not even know where they were.

It would occupy too much space were I to go into the details of the suit which was brought against Thornton for the estates. Every corse which legal ingenuity could devise was resorted to by his solicitor, but unhappily without effect. Each successive defense brought forward in support of his claim. But its case was not so strong as that of the defendant. Nor was this the only misfortune which befell the poor family. Another, and a far more terrible one, was impending over it by step. Thornton was now in a deep decline. No human skill could save him. He had before him the terrible certainty of soon leaving his widow and children destitute in the world, without influence or friends to interest themselves in their behalf. One grief he could not even from the decision of the court, which left his family penniless, was not given till a week after his decease.

On my arrival in England one of my first wishes was to visit poor Mrs. Thornton. I had heard of the death of her husband, but not one word of the pecuniary misfortunes which had befallen the family. I therefore looked forward to seeing in a state of affluence. I did not know her address, but I called on a person whom I knew to have been intimate with her husband, in order to obtain it. Here, for the first time, I learned, in part, the sad story of the Thornton family. My informant, however, could give me but few particulars. "He had lost sight of them," he said, "for some time. They had moved from the house which they had lived in into a smaller, and from that, he understood, into a smaller one still, and he knew nothing more." He gave me, however, the name of one who was better acquainted with them than he was. My second inquiry did not improve the aspect of things. I learned that they were no longer keeping house but living in lodgings, and he gave me their address. I replied at the lodgings, and after a stay of two others, found number than the former, till at last I found Mrs. Thornton and her family residing shelter in a poorly-furnished room in Bloomsbury.

It was about six o'clock on Christmas-eve when I paid her my first visit. The poor woman had used some different language to me, and when at last she did so she burst into tears. I endeavored to console her, but for some I partially succeeded. "I am sorry," she said, "to be obliged to receive you in such a condition as we are in. As you may perceive, we are in great distress." The aspect of the room thoroughly bore out her assertion. Around a small table, lighted by a single candle, were seated three of her daughters, the eldest—perhaps some fourteen or fifteen years of age—busily employed in making up some necessary garments of a very poor description. Beside the mother's chair stood two little boys between four and six years of age. They were quiet, but frightened, and gazed with curiosity at the tears on their mother's cheeks. I inquired of the poor woman how she intended to act in the future. She replied that at present she could form no plan, her mind being so utterly crushed by the fearful blow she had received in her husband's death. She hoped that shortly she would be able to exert herself, either by teaching children or doing needle-work, but where to begin, or to whom to apply, she was wholly at a loss to decide. She then gave me some details of the Chancery suit, most of which I had already heard from different sources. More by way of saying something than from any interest I felt in the answer, I asked her whether her husband had been certain that the deeds had really been in his father's possession. She replied that he had been positively certain as to that: and had assured her over and over again that, before he himself had left England for India, he had seen them, and had had time for more days in his possession. I remained with Mrs. Thornton till about eight o'clock. I had promised to spend the Christmas-eve at the house of a friend not very far from her lodgings, where there was to be a small family party. I told Mrs. Thornton, however, that I would call on her again in a few days, and if I could assist her in any way I would most willingly do so.

The party to which I was invited was at the house of a widow, whom I had also known in India. But how different was her position from that of Mrs. Thornton's! In one I had just left was overwhelmed with sorrow, while the other was the very embodiment of happiness. Her house looked gay all over, for all in it were merry. The rooms were handsomely furnished, and well lighted; every thing, in short, betokened luxury. There were, perhaps, twenty children present, varying from ten to seventeen years of age. They sang, and danced, and amused themselves with games till the room sounded like a Babel. Among the elder girls was one had particularly attracted my attention. She was remarkably pretty; but what specially pleased me was the great richness and purity of her voice when singing. Her mother, for her age, she appeared to be an accomplished musician; and I am intensely fond of music. Moore's melody of the "Last Rose of Summer" she sang so well that she was not only encored but asked to sing it a third time. It had always been a great favorite of mine, and I thought it never sound higher in my estimation than it did that evening.

I remained at the party till about eleven o'clock, when, having taken a very present good-night, I returned to Morley's Hotel, where I was residing at the time. On retiring to my room I was grateful to find a bright fire burning in the grate. The night was bitterly cold, and I had not yet got accustomed to the rigor of an English winter. I sat myself down, and dressing-gown, and before retiring for the night I threw myself into an easy-chair by the fire, and fell into a dozen sleep.

The events of the day now came before my mind without cautinuity or connection. None of them drove me to sleep for a moment, till I came to poor Mrs. Thornton and her helpless family; those remained in my thoughts for some minutes. I felt grieved, deeply, in what way I could possibly assist them, but had not been able to come to any thing like a definite conclusion. I then reflected that Thornton was the position of the two widows whom I had seen that evening. The dwelling of the one seemed to be the abode of happiness, that of the other the abode of misery. The different persons I had met at the children's party then occurred to me one by one, and all had a most soothing effect on the pretty, graceful girl to whose singing I had listened with so much pleasure. Moore's melody, as I said before, had always been a favorite one with me. I remembered, too, that the first time I had heard it was when I was about eighteen years of age. I had left school, and was to pass a month or six weeks in London before entering myself as a student at the University of Oxford. It was likewise at a small party, where there was a girl of about the same age as the young lady I had so much admired during the evening. Whether the melody had then been sung in an artistic a manner as this evening I can not say. Possibly it was not, for at that period my heart was exceedingly susceptible, and I may have then given the lady credit for greater skill than she possessed. At last I fell asleep, and was perfectly enraptured with her performance, and not only with her performance but also with her appearance. Her person was then in my mind with singular vividness. As I sat with my toes turned toward the fire, I brought to my memory her figure, seated on the piano-stool. She wore a white dress, fastened round the waist with a sash of broad blue ribbon, tied in a bow behind, and the ends hanging down to the ground. She had preposterously large sleeves, especially at the shoulders, and her hair was dressed behind with three bows, one above eight or nine inches above her head. I had not thought of her for years, but now not only was she herself seated before me in remembrance, but even the old-fashioned square piano, with its thin, turned legs, and its two candles on the desk, was present to my imagination, and I could even see the branch ornaments which surmounted the legs of the instrument, and the book of melodies on the music-stand.

My mind continued to dwell upon the scene in close connection with the singer. I remembered a certain conversation of the name of Marcus as having been present then, and as being afterward the surgeon of the ship in which I sailed to India. I remembered, too, that on more than one occasion I had been in correspondence with him. He was a middle-aged bachelor, with very ordinary-looking, and with short and scrubby black hair, and black, piercing eyes. After the young lady had concluded, he walked to the piano, and in a somewhat pedantic tone, and with strong Scotch accent, stated that, although he greatly admired her singing, he could not by no means dispute the correctness of the words. He held it was an utter absurdity for the poet to say, when addressing the rose, "Where thy mates of the garden lie scentless and dead." All the world, at any rate that portion of it acquainted with the most elementary principles of botany, was perfectly well aware that the rose did not lose its scent after death, but that its leaves were frequently gathered and preserved solely owing to the fact that the odor remained in them.

When I had perfectly identified the figure and bearing of the Scotch doctor, another person came upon the scene. It was that of a stout elderly lady, the grandmother of the girl who had sung the song. She was dressed in a preposterously large turban, and a stiff old-fashioned silk gown which looked as though it had never been made for her. By fixing the mind upon her, every portion of her dress and appearance came vividly before me, and even the gouty appearance of a joint of one of the fingers did not escape me. Her face at the time was unnaturally red, for she was in a great passion, which she had evidently difficulty in suppressing. By some obscure reasoning she had arrived at the conclusion that the Scotch doctor's objection conveyed an imputation against the great-daughter's singing, and she hastily rose from her seat to defend her. She told him that it was a great pity when people did find fault that they did not take care to first understand the subject they were talking about. It was true that Scotch tune leaves have a scent, and a powerful one too, but it was one of a totally different character from that which they had when in full blossom. This was evidently the poet's meaning. The doctor could not let this clumsy explanation pass without reply, and he insisted on telling her that the word was "scentless." The old lady finding her position untenable, got more and more indignant, and some many words passed between her and the doctor. The dispute was only put an end to by the interference of the lady of the house.

A few hours before such a simple incident connected with that evening party was present in my mind, yet a slight accidental circumstance had brought every thing before me almost as fresh as when it occurred. I now pursued the same train of thought, incited thereto by the desire to prove whether the occurrence was of a dicary of mine—that nothing is ever irrevocably lost to the memory, but that the most trifling thing remains at last perfectly stamped in the leaves of the greatest importance. I endeavored to conjure up the minutiæ of the occurrences of that gala evening, and succeeded wonderfully. As soon as I had fixed one object clearly in my mind I easily made it the stepping-stone to another, till I clearly remembered even the most petty and insignificant objects. The dress of the party and the appointments of the room; the old-fashioned high chimney-piece of painted and carved wood; the glass above it with its frame covered with cut paper to defend it from the flies; the cane-bottomed hunting-chairs; the tea and coffee dishes and ornaments of the supper-table, as well as the way in which the candles were placed, became again perfectly present. I remembered, as well, that the plates were of different patterns, as if the whole china of the establishment had been collected for the occasion. I even then saw silver forks and spoons of different patterns, as though a portion of our plate had been borrowed. The dishes which were served presented themselves before me in succession. There were the cold fowls at each end of the table, and a tongue at the other, a lobster salad in the centre, and some dishes of jellies and creams, most of them in a somewhat melted condition, as if half of them had been made at home and had been carried hastily out of their moulds. Every separate circumstance connected with the late party, down to the very supper, I believe, I could have conjured up had I cared to pursue the thread of association; but getting somewhat tired I rose from my seat and a few minutes afterward was in bed. But it was some time before I could sleep. I fell into a drowsy, dreamy state, half asleep and half awake, and the thought of the evening party I have described would occasionally come before me, and then itself to my thoughts in a manner as if the events of the day. The figure of the Scotch doctor particularly haunted me, and I believe he was the last person in my thoughts. I remembered having some obscure idea that he was living in London, I wished, if possible, to find him out if that was the case.

Whether I fully came to the conclusion before falling asleep that I would seek out my recent friend I know not; but of this, however, I am certain, that when I awoke next morning the idea again came into my mind. I descended into the coffee-room and ordered my breakfast. While it was being prepared I passed the time in walking backward and forward in the room, my mind being at the same moment occupied with my own personal affairs. Suddenly I stopped before a table, on which the London Post-office Directory. Bradshaw's Railway Guide, and other books of the kind lying. Thinking of something else at the time, I mechanically took up the Medical Directory. On opening it the idea flashed across my mind to search for the name of my doctor friend. I did so, and found that he was a firm of Marcus & Roberts, surgeons, residing in —— street, Bloomsbeth. As there was no other practitioner of the name of Marcus in the Directory, I concluded that this must be my old Indian acquaintance. I accordingly noted the address on a slip of paper, and then sat down and ascertain whether it were really he as soon as the morning service (it was Christmas-day) should be over.

I kept to my resolution, and with some little difficulty (for I was a perfect stranger in the locality), succeeded in finding the house. When I arrived at the door my name was entered in the dispensary, and the doctor shortly afterward made his appearance. It was more than twenty years since I had seen him, and although time had made considerable changes I recognized him with little difficulty. True, his hair, which had formerly been so stiff as to stand upright, was still gone, and his head was as bald as the palm of one's hand. Still, his shaggy black eyebrows, deep-set piercing eyes, and intelligent, good-humored expression remained. In figure, too, he had altered. From being a slim, wiry man, he had become rather somewhat corpulent.

He at once recognized me, and after a most friendly greeting, conducted me into his little sanctum behind the dispensary. Here we were seated together for some time, talking over former times and old acquaintances. I found that he had retired from the service about twenty years since, possessed of some little money; that he had afterward married, and had settled in the locality I found him in; that a year after his marriage he had had the misfortune to lose his wife, who died in giving birth to a daughter, and that he had ever since remained a widower; that his daughter had married a short time before, his son-in-law being now his partner; and that they had a very good substantial practice, and were much respected by their patients.

During our conversation the doctor suddenly asked me how I had contrived to find him out. I told him that I had discovered his address by means of the Medical Directory, and that I had been induced to look for his name in consequence of his coming so vividly to my mind the evening before. In narrating the circumstances, I reminded him that it was on the evening of that party I had had the pleasure of first making his acquaintance.

"You quite surprise me," he said; "I had not the slightest recollection of that. But now that you mention it I think I can remember something about it. Was it not in a house at —— Street?" he asked.

I replied that it was.

"How very singular!" he remarked; "though I had completely forgotten not only the party, but even the name of the person who gave it, I now begin to remember both perfectly."

I mentioned his dispute with the old lady about the words of the song. Leaning his head back in his chair, and placing his hands before his eyes, he remained for some moments silent.

"How extraordinary!" he said, at last. "I begin now to remember both the girl and her grandmother."

We went on in this way talking over the occurrences of the party, each endeavoring to assist the other on points in which our memories failed. At last Macron said:

"You are not the only person to whom I was introduced that evening for the first time. I also made the acquaintance of that full-peerage fellow, Murdoch, the solicitor, who, by-the-by, became a very good patient of mine afterward."

"I forget him entirely," I said.

"Surely not; if you think for a moment," replied Macron, "you must remember him. He was a tall, gaunt man, about fifty years of age, and exceedingly reserved in his manner."

After a moment's reflection I really recalled, not only the figure of the man, but even the peculiarities of his dress. He was tall and angular, with large hands and feet. He wore an enormous white cravat, and a long white shirt-frill. He had on a blue coat, with brass buttons, black pantaloons, fitting tight to his legs, and fastened at the ankle with ribbons, displaying to still greater advantage the enormous size of his foot.

We now began to speak of our old Indian acquaintances, and among others of poor Thornton, whose late history I found was totally unknown to Macron. He listened with great interest and evident sympathy to my narrative.

"I had really a deep respect for him," he said, "and a greater still for his wife. What does the poor thing intend to do?"

"Really I do not know," I replied. "She has the world before her where to choose; and that is all that can be said. What little I can do to help her I will do with pleasure; but I fear that will not be much."

"But do you really believe," said Macron, "that Thornton's father ever had legal possession of the estate?"

"I have no reason to doubt it," I replied; "and Mrs. Thornton herself seems certain that the deeds had been some days in her husband's possession before he left England for India."

"That is singular," said Macron. "I sincerely pity the poor lady. If that old solicitor had been alive, he might have thrown some light upon the matter."

"What had Murdoch to do with it?" I inquired, somewhat puzzled at the remark.

"I do not know whether he was Mr. Thornton's solicitor: I believe he was, by-the-by. I know they were intimately acquainted, and had business transactions together."

"Are you sure they were intimately acquainted?"

"Perfectly sure. As I told you before, Murdoch was, during the latter part of his life, a patient of mine, and I had to attend him at his own house in Bloomsbury—where, by-the-way, he also had his office—generally once or twice a week, for about a year before his death; and I used to hear old Thornton's name mentioned there. But I have forgotten pretty well about it. It is a long time ago now. Old Murdoch must have been dead at least fifteen years. If you think I can do anything for the widow," continued Macron, "pray tell me. As you may imagine, I have not very much in my power. But you remember the old fable of the mouse and the lion caught in the hunter's net. I might be useful in getting her children out into the world for her."

I promised Macron that I would certainly make him useful if I could; and after a little more conversation we parted, determining that for the future we should keep up our acquaintance.

Next morning, as I was on the point of leaving my hotel to pay Mrs. Thornton a visit, I met Dr. Macron at the door.

"I am glad I caught you," he said, "for I very much wished to have a chat with you."

I immediately led him back to the coffee-room; and having got seated at one of the tables pretty well apart from the other company, he told me that the description I had given him of the misfortunes of the Thornton family had touched him so much that he had been unable to drive it from his mind. "I am afraid," he continued, "that I you will fancy I am wasting your time on a very fruitless errand; but as I know you feel deeply for the poor widow and her family, I am sure you will excuse me even should my visit lead to nothing. I told you yesterday that I was certain Mr. Murdoch, the solicitor, had been mixed up in some way with old Mr. Thornton's affairs. After I retired to bed a circumstance bearing on the subject, which I had utterly forgotten, came to my mind. Some sixteen ago, when I was attending Murdoch, who was suffering from a sharp attack of gout, I remember that he had a violent dispute with his grandson, a boy about fourteen years of age. Murdoch at the time was seated in the room on the first-floor of his house in Bloomsbury. He had given the orders to tie up some deeds carefully in brown paper, and to label them. The lad obeyed; but I was surprised to see that on his presenting the packet to his grandfather, he was rewarded with a sound box on the ear. It appeared that the poor boy, in writing the name on the parcel, had omitted the paper, and that his grandfather, who was most precise in all things, had lost his temper at the blunder. He endeavored to make peace between them, but for some time with scant success, Murdoch pointing out the ink-blot to me in excuse for his violence to the boy.

"As I reflected on the circumstances my memory by degrees brought back to me the whole details connected with the affair. I clearly remembered the room, with its tin boxes ranged round the walls, the small collection of law books in dull yellow bindings, the table covered with papers, and the easy-chair where sat the gouty old man. Even the paper pavel which had caused the dispute came before me, as plainly as the day when the affair occurred.

"For some minutes I was lost in wonder at the retentiveness of memory. The vision of the blotted packet before my eyes the while, I thought I could remember the words, 'Mr. Thornton's deeds,' written on it. Whether this was really the case or only a freak of the imagination I can not say. Very possibly you may smile at my folly, but I could not help thinking that no mischief would be done by my informing you of it."

"It is not likely that I shall smile at your statement," I replied, "for so far from considering it improbable that you remember the written words correctly, I think it is extremely likely. The memory plays strange freaks with us every day, but so frequent are these phenomena that we take no account of them, although they are well worthy of the most careful consideration. But, candidly, though we assume your memory to be correct, I do not see how the recollection can benefit poor Mrs. Thornton, if I understand you, Murdoch has been dead for many years."

"Yes, but his grandson is still alive; and it is probable he would still remember the whole circumstances from the blow he then received."

"Can we find him?"

"Yes, easily. He is now a clerk in one of the city banks."

I proposed to Macron that we should immediately call upon him. To this he readily assented, and we at once set out together. We found young Murdoch in the office, and he conducted us into a private room. Macron commenced the conversation by asking him whether he recollected a certain day when, in his grandfather's office, he received a box on the ear for making a blot on a label he had written?

"Remember!" he said, laughing: "yes, I should think I do; and with good cause, too, for my ear tingled for the next four-and-twenty hours after it. The annoyance was the greater to me from your being present. I felt hurt, for my dignity was wounded, although you were kind enough to attempt to make peace between us. Every circumstance connected with the transaction is now as fresh in my memory as on the day it occurred."

"Do you remember what deeds the parcel contained?" inquired the doctor.

"Perfectly well; they belonged to a gentleman named Thornton, and related to a freehold estate he had purchased."

"Do you know what was done with the deeds?"

"They were to be lodged with a banker in Wales, but I forget his name now. Mr. Thornton had agreed to purchase some iron works there, but not having sufficient ready money of his own at the time he borrowed a portion of it from the bankers on his note of hand, and the deeds were to be lodged with them as an equitable collateral security."

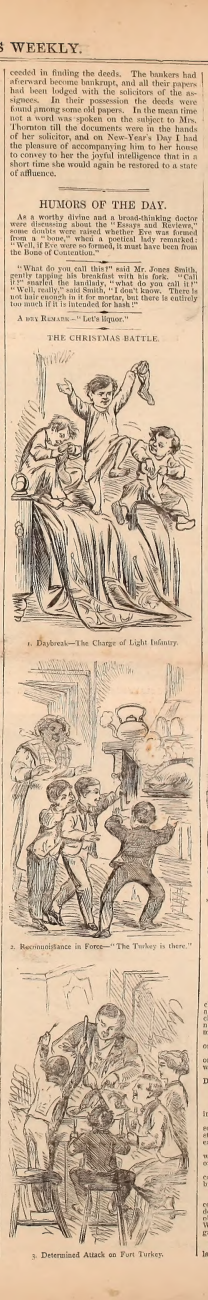
"And how did the affair terminate?" inquired Macron.

"Well, I can not tell you that correctly," Mr. Murdoch replied. "The iron-works, I know, were a dead failure, and it was said that the loss caused the attack of paralysis that killed Mr. Thornton. I have some idea that Murdoch took up the bill before it became due; but even of this I am not quite certain."

We conversed a short time longer with Mr. Murdoch, but without obtaining from him any further information of any value. When we acquitted the bank I bade Macron adieu, thanking him for the trouble he had taken, and I then called on Mrs. Thornton. Without informing her of my reason for calling, I drew from her the name and address of the solicitor who had transacted Mr. Chancey sale for her husband, and after I had quitted her, I went direct to his office, and fortunately found him at home. He listened to me with great attention, and with evident sympathy. When I had concluded, he said:

"It will give me immense satisfaction if I can discover the deeds, not only for the poor widow's sake, but also because I have always been under a powerful impression that they existed, and had only been mislaid. I will immediately set about the search, and if I find them, it will give me more satisfaction than any cause I ever gained."

The remainder is soon told. The solicitor succeeded in finding the deeds. The bankers had afterward become bankrupt, and all their papers had been lodged with the solicitors of the assignees. In their possession the deeds were found among some old papers. In the mean time not a word was spoken on the subject to Mrs. Thornton till the documents were in the hands of her solicitor, and on New-Year's Day I had the pleasure of accompanying him to her house to convey to her the joyful intelligence that in a short time she would again be restored to a state of affluence.



HUMORS OF THE DAY.

As a worthy divine and a broad-thinking doctor were discussing about the "Essays and Reviews," some doubts were raised whether Eve was formed from a "bone," when a poetical lady remarked: "Well, if Eve were so formed, it must have been from the Bone of Contention."

"What do you call this?" said Mr. Jones Smith, gently tapping his breakfast with his fork. "Call it?" snarled the landlady, "what do you call it?" "Well, really," said Smith, "I don't know. There is not hair enough in it for mortar, but there is entirely too much if it is intended for hair."

A BOY REMARK.—"Let's liquor."

THE CHRISTMAS BATTLE.

1. Daybreak—The Charge of Light Infantry.

2. Reconnaissance in Force—"The Turkey is there."

3. Determined Attack on Fort Turkey.

4. Mince-Pie Works carried by Storm.

5. The Retreat by Night—The Line retires.

6. Night after the Battle.

An Irishman called at a country book-store to purchase a steel pen. The clerk handed him one, and after examining it a moment he threw it down, declaring that he didn't want to be cheated in that manner. The clerk picked it up, and asked, "What is the matter with it?"

"It's broke," said the man; "I want a whole one, or I'll not pay you for it."

The clerk assured him that it was whole, and a good one, but was effectually silenced by the Irishman, who pointing out its defect, exclaimed:

"Ah will you be after calling that a whole one? Don't you see it's split?"

WANTED.

A bride who is willing to commence housekeeping in the same style in which her parents began.

Twenty fashionable young ladies who dare to be seen wedding a dust-brush, or darning their brother's stockings, if a gentleman should happen to make an early call.

Ten independent young ladies of "good families," who dare to wear their last winter's bonnets to church on a fine Sunday.

Fifteen young ladies of sufficient age to go into company, who dare confess they ever made a loaf of bread or a pudding.

A friend of Lady Morgan's was once denouncing a certain Bishop, and concluded a virulent philippic by declaring that his lordship was so heretical in church observances that he would "eat a sausage on Ash-Wednesday!" "Of course he would," said Lady Morgan—"of course he would, if it was a good sausage!"

The first thing a boy says to her bread, and not the last thing a child says to its father—"Shell out!"

PORK-PACKING IN CINCINNATI.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, delights to call herself the "Queen City of the West;" her rival neighbors of Louisville, Pittsburg, Chicago, and St. Louis, take great pleasure in sneeringly calling her "Porkopolis." The "nickname" has grown of late years to be a boast of the city, for it has grown to be expressive of the fact that the Queen City is the greatest pork-packing centre in the country. Here over half a million hogs are slaughtered and packed annually; the number of establishments engaged in the trade can not be named, and the revenue derived from its profits is incalculable. It was very natural that in the pork-houses of this city our artist should find employment for his pen and pencil. Accompanying his sketches, which we give on this page, came the following descriptive article:

HOG-SLAUGHTERING—THE "KILLING" ROOM.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

HOG-SLAUGHTERING—THE "GUTTING" ROOM.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

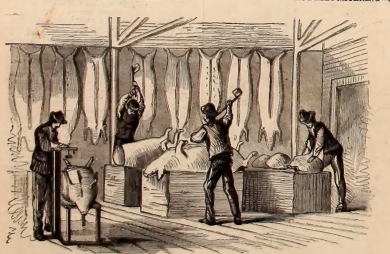
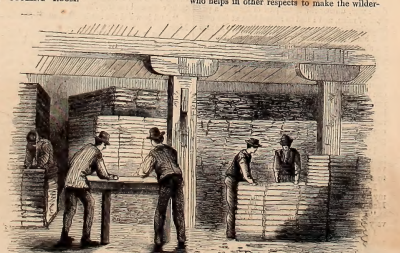
The killing is done on the second-floor, to which the hogs ascend by means of an inclined walk. Entering a pen at the top of this walk, they are unceremoniously knocked on the head with a hammer in the hands of a person who "never fails to bring 'em down at the first clip." From this pen they go to the sticking-floor, when a knife is intruded down the windpipe into the heart. In a moment they are thrown into a vat of scalding water, where the carcass remains only a sufficient length of time to permit the bristles to be removed easily, when an iron cradle lifts it to a table, where two men await its arrival for the purpose of removing the bristles on the back. They then pass the hog on to two other men remove certain other portions of the hog. Thus the hog rolls to the end of the table remote from the scalding-vat, where it arrives in a completely denuded state. Here a gambrel is inserted in the hocks of the hind-legs: the gambrel is placed in a socket suspended from a wheel on a track above; the hog is rolled from the table: its weight bears it to the presence of a stalwart negro, who removes the entrails and lays the hog open with three or four strokes of his knife. The hog swings further on; another man drenches it with a flood of water from a hose-pipe. From this person the carcass goes down a track to the hanging-room, where it is left for cooling. From the entrance of the pen to the cooling-room—or minister duration—is a journey of two and a half minutes' duration.

The cutting-room is furnished with huge blocks of wood, on which the carcass is placed when cool. A single blow severs the head, another the hams. The hams pass to a person dexterous in the use of the knife, who trims the hams with a certainty and skill that seems astonishing. The back-bone is cut out, and the sides separated into "chunks." The pork sliced to its upper end, and the refuse are carried to the hog-boiler, which, when full, is closed, and a jet of steam intruded, which reduces the entire mass to a pulp, from which the fat is pressed for lard. The hams are prepared and placed in hogsheads, where they lie in pickle for a certain length of time before going to the smoke-house.

The cellar is filled with pork, carefully salted and piled. In the cellar shown in the sketch was piled more than three million pounds of pork. The killing season lasts from November until March. During this period the pork-packing establishments in Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and other Western States are kept almost continuously busy, and from two and a half to three millions of hogs are slaughtered and packed.



HOG-SLAUGHTERING—THE "COOLING" ROOM.



HENRY KEEP.

IT is one of the generally-accepted fallacies promulgated by SHAKSPEARE that "some men are born great; it is very true, as he asserts, that "some have greatness thrust upon them," but it is never by the accident of birth: and in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred greatness is achieved by hard, earnest labor and thought. There is certainly "a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;" but SHAKSPEARE knew well, when he wrote the words and painted the sad results of an omission to seize such an opportunity, that that same tidal wave was to be ridden only by the bold swimmer who knew when to take it. And that is a part of the art of swimming in life which can not be imparted; it is only learned of experience. And thus it happens that the really great, the truly successful men of our country have been self-taught and self-made.

HENRY KEEP, whose portrait adorns page 29 of the Weekly, is one of these self-made men. He has made himself prominent and powerful among the financiers of the country. "He is great," said the philosopher, "who causes two blades of grass to spring up where only one grew before;" and the philosopher is right. He, too, is great who helps in other respects to make the wilderness blossom like the rose, who with a liberal use of material means urges on the advance-guard of civilization through regions that only yesterday were the domain of the savage—who levels the forest, digs canals, builds railroads, provides employment for the laborer, and in a thousand other ways diffuses wealth wherever wealth is needed to develop the resources of a young country. Commodore VANDERBILT, GEORGE LAW, and DANIEL DREW, as we have had former occasions to show, are recognized types of this kind of greatness. These men have so distributed, and are now so distributing, their wealth as in some sense to make the entire country a participant. They are kings in the largest acceptation of the term—railroad kings, steamboat kings, money kings—yet using their more than monarchical power to promote in various ways the public good. HENRY KEEP, from beginnings quite as humble as those of VANDERBILT, or DREW, or LAW, has risen to a position equally conspicuous.

HOG-SLAUGHTERING—THE "CUTTING" ROOM.

HOG-SLAUGHTERING—THE "SALTING" CELLAR.

One of the most successful men in Wall Street, and for years past at the head of one of the greatest Transportation Companies in the world, relates that he was born in the boot of a stage; JOHN JACOB ASTOR was born, one might say, in a butcher's stall; "CORNELL the boatman" (now "CORNELIUS VANDERBILT, the railroad king") was born if not in, at least heir to, a Staten Island ferry-boat (and a very small beginning that was seventy-three years ago); the "steamboat king," DANIEL DREW, began life as a cattle-drover. HENRY KEEP appears to have been born in the poor-house, and to have begun life as a runaway apprentice. He was born in Adams, Jefferson County, New York, on June 22, 1818. His mother died when he was in his infancy; his father had none of this world's goods, and the son was taken in charge by the poor officers of the county and apprenticed at the age of twelve to JOSEPH and EUNICE GRUMMONDS. His life for five years with his protectors not suiting him, he ran away at seventeen and went to Rochester, whereupon the GRUMMONDS announced the momentous fact by placing on record, in the columns of the Sackett's Harbor North American, the following advertisement, adorned with the cut of a "runaway boy" so frequently seen in Southern papers a few years ago, but now haply out of use:

HENRY KEEP, THE WALL STREET FINANCIER.

RUN away from the Subscriber, HENRY KEEP, an indentured Apprentice. All persons are forbid trusting him on my account, as I shall pay no debts of his contracting.

J. GRUMMONDS.

"All persons" did not forbear "trusting him," however, at least on his own account, for it was not long before he obtained a "situation" on the canal "to drive the horse along the towpath." After that we hear of him figuring as a team-driver for a Mr. JOHN G. TELLER. His careful habits soon enabled him to accumulate a small capital, and with the true intuition of genius he conceived the idea of transferring his talents from bucolic pursuits and team-driving to the loftier yet riskier realms of finance. From 1837 to 1840 he was engaged as an Exchange broker and dealer in uncurrent money, and in this business he met with great success. At a later period he established the "Potsdam Bank," the "Union Bank," "Henry Keep's Bank," and other monetary institutions in Central and Western New York. In 1854, or thereabout, he removed to New York city and began operations in Wall

THE TORNADO IN THE WEST INDIES—POSITION OF THE U. S. STEAMER "MONONGAHELA" AT ST. CROIX.—SKETCHED BY JOHN E. C. PETERSON.—[SEE PAGE 30.]

Street. Walking one day into the counting-room of the well-known firm of LOCKWOOD & Co., he said, with characteristic bluntness:

"Sir, every concern that I have done business with has broken; do you think you can stand me?"

LOCKWOOD & Co. liked the man's frankness, and they agreed to "stand him."

Our great railroad system at that time was experiencing the disastrous effects of improvident management. In the autumn of 1859 Cleveland and Toledo, for example, was selling in the market at as low a figure as 16. The "infirmity of this concern" (as DANIEL O'CONNELL would have said if he had known any thing about it) was KEEP's opportunity, and he lost no time in improving it. He succeeded in having the road placed under his sole control; and under his management it was brought out of the Slough of Despond, and to-day its shares are selling at 100 @ 102 ex-dividend. He next took Michigan Southern in hand. This road at the time was about to pass into the hands of receivers, and its shares were quoted at five cents on the dollar. As soon as he obtained control of its affairs it experienced a new lease of prosperity, so much so that the stock to-day is quoted at 77, while the road itself, from one of the worst, is now one of the best equipped in the whole country.

Mr. KEEP's shrewd business foresight was exhibited about this time as conspicuously in real estate as in railroad speculations. In connection with another capitalist he became the purchaser of the well-known "Brick Church property" at what, in those days, was considered an extravagant price; but whoever looks at the magnificent buildings which to-day adorn its site need not be informed that, with the subsequent rapid appreciation of values, the purchase proved a princely investment.

The next noteworthy incident in Mr. KEEP's career was the famous contest for the control of the New York Central Railroad, the details of which must be familiar to such of our readers as take an interest in Wall Street affairs. On the 12th of December, 1866, after an exciting contest KEEP was elected President of that wealthy corporation; and that office he retained until certain arrangements were made, of a character to confer on the Central various important business advantages, when, being desirous of devoting more time to his private affairs, he voluntarily resigned the position. A few months later he was unanimously elected President of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, one of the most important lines in the West.

How all these results were brought about, how many days and nights it necessitated of earnest consultation and close calculation, how many nice combinations had to be formed, not only here, but on the other side of the Atlantic, it is not our purpose to dwell upon; and yet, if these could be all written out, we should have an example of unwearying vigilance, intelligent energy, and far-seeing sagacity of which the annals of business life, even in these days of restless activity, furnish but few parallels. Mr. KEEP is a man of but few words; he was never known to break faith with his fellow-men; in all his dealings he is straightforward; and wide as has been the scope of his financial enterprise his integrity has never been impeached.

THE LATE TORNADOES.

THE late very general movement of the earth's bowels appears to have excited the interest of scientific men all over the world. Theories innumerable have been advanced to explain the natural causes of the destructive phenomena, and to show why the human race is subjected to such agencies. It is a little singular that nearly all of the learned men of Europe who have written on the subject have had occasion to quote and adopt the theories and accept the arguments of the chief scientific institution of this country, the National Observatory at Washington, as expounded by its former Superintendent, Captain M. F. MAURY, in his able and fascinating work, the "Physical Geography of the Sea," published many years ago by HARPER & BROTHERS, and now a standard work in all countries. RICHARD A. PROCTOR has expressed the most popular of these theories in regard to the causes of the West India tornadoes in the following brief and comprehensive extract:

> In the West Indies cyclones occur principally in August and September, when the southeast monsoons are at their height. At the same season the African southwesterly monsoons are blowing. Accordingly there are two sets of winds, both blowing heavily and steadily from the Atlantic, disturbing the atmospheric equilibrium, and thus in all probability generating the great West India hurricanes. The storms thus arising show their force first at a distance of about six or seven hundred miles from the equator, and far to the east of the region in which they attain their greatest fury. They sweep with a northwesterly course to the Gulf of Mexico, pass thence northward, and so to the northeast, sweeping in a wide curve, resembling the letter U placed thus ⊃, around the West Indian Seas, and thence traveling across the Atlantic, generally expending their fury before they reach the shores of Western Europe. This course is known as the storm-track.

But we have less to do with expounding the theories than in relating some of the effects of these tornadoes. When one remembers that the earthquake which devastated Sicily in 1693 killed at least one hundred thousand persons, and that during the two earthquakes at Antioch, in 526 and 612, over three hundred thousand persons miserably perished, it is difficult to understand that a great many more persons have perished from cyclones and tornadoes. Yet such is the case. In the gale of August, 1782, all the trophies of Lord RODNEY's victory, except the Ardent, were destroyed, two British ships of the line foundered at sea, numbers of merchantmen under Admiral GRAVES's convoy were wrecked, and at sea alone three thousand lives were lost.

Quite recently a storm far more destructive than this swept over the Bay of Bengal. In the great gale of October, 1864, all the ships in the harbor at Calcutta were swept from their anchorage, and driven one upon another in inextricable confusion. Fearful as was the loss of life and property in Calcutta harbor the destruction on land was greater. A vast wave swept for miles over the surrounding country, embankments were destroyed, and whole villages, with their inhabitants, swept away. Fifty thousand souls, it is believed, perished in this fearful hurricane.

The suddenness with which a true tornado works destruction was strikingly exemplified in the wreck of the steamship San Francisco. She was assailed by an extra-tropical tornado when about three hundred miles from Sandy Hook, on December 24, 1853. In a few moments she was a complete wreck! The wide range of a tornado's destructiveness is shown by this, that Colonel REID examined one along whose track no less than one hundred and ten ships were wrecked, crippled, or dismasted.

There occur land-storms, also, of a cyclonic character in the valley of the Mississippi. "I have often observed the paths of such storms," says MAURY, "through the forests of the Mississippi. There the track of these tornadoes is called a 'wind-road,' because they make an avenue through the wood straight along, and as clear of trees as if the old denizens of the forest had been cleared with an axe. I have seen trees three or four feet in diameter torn up by the roots, and the top, with its limbs, lying next the hole whence the root came."

"The southern points of America and Africa have won for themselves," says MAURY, "the name of 'the stormy capes,' but there is not a storm-fiend in the wide ocean can out-top that which rages along the Atlantic coasts of North America. The China seas and the North Pacific may vie in the fury of their gales with this part of the Atlantic, but Cape Horn and the Cape of Good Hope can not equal them, certainly in frequency, nor do I believe, in fury." We read of a West Indian storm so violent that "it forced the Gulf Stream back to its sources, and piled up the water to a height of thirty feet in the Gulf of Mexico. The ship Ledbury Snow attempted to ride out the storm. When it abated, she found herself high up on the dry land, and discovered that she had let go her anchor among the tree-tops on Elliott's Key."

In the great hurricane of 1780, which commenced at Barbadoes and swept across the whole breadth of the North Atlantic, fifty sail were driven ashore at the Bermudas, two line-of-battle ships went down at sea, and upward of twenty thousand persons lost their lives on the land. So tremendous was the force of this hurricane (Captain MAURY tells us) that "the bark was blown from the trees, and the fruits of the earth destroyed; the very bottom and depths of the sea were uprooted; forts and castles were washed away, and their great guns carried in the air like chaff; houses were razed; ships wrecked; and the bodies of men and beasts lifted up in the air, and dashed to pieces in the storm."

Mr. PROCTOR, in quoting this last statement from MAURY, adds that it must be accepted with many grains of allowance. He remembers to have read that in this hurricane guns which had long lain under water were washed up like mere drift upon the beach, and thinks that "this circumstance grew gradually into the incredible story related" by MAURY. Mr. PROCTOR had not perhaps heard of the fate of the United States steamer Monongahela when he penned these lines, or he would have hesitated before doubting MAURY's story. Perhaps the illustration which we give of the position, high and dry, to which the Monongahela was lifted by the tornado at St. Croix will convince him of the possibility of great guns and great ships, too, flying through the air like chaff. Commodore BISSELL's official report gives a full account of the astonishing effect of the late tornado and earthquake which wrecked the Monongahela. He states that a violent trembling of the ship, which was the first intimation the crew had of danger, "lasted some thirty seconds, and immediately afterward the water was observed to be receding rapidly from the beach. In a moment the current was changed and bore the ship toward the beach, carrying out the entire cable and drawing the bolts from the kelson, without the slightest effect in checking her terrific speed toward the beach. Another anchor was ordered to be let go, but in a few seconds she was in too shoal water for this to avail. When within a few yards of the beach the reflux of the water checked her speed for a moment, and a light breeze from the land gave a momentary hope that the jib and foretop-mast stay-sail might pay her head off shore, so that in the reflux of the wave she might reach waters sufficiently deep to float her, and then be brought up by the other anchor. These sails were immediately set, and she payed off so as to bring her broadside to the beach. When the sea returned in the form of a wall of water, twenty-five or thirty feet high, it carried us over the warehouses into the first street of the town. This wave, in receding, took her back toward the beach, and left her nearly perpendicular on the edge of a coral reef, where she keeled over to an angle of fifteen degrees. All this was the work of a few moments only, and soon after the waters of the bay subsided into their naturally tranquil state, leaving us high and dry upon the beach. Gentlemen looking at the ship from shore declare that the bottom of the bay was visible where there was before, and is now, forty fathoms of water."

Our illustration of the vessel as she lies on the beach is from the pencil of Mr. JOHN E. C. PETERSON, and the original sketch was made a few days after the disaster.

No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York, Dec. 14, 1867.

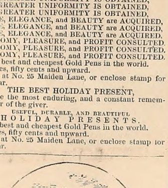
In my Card of November 1, 1865, I stated that "for the purpose of more fully supplying the wants of the public, and in order to prevent unscrupulous dealers from palming off inferior and worthless goods as the Morton Gold Pens, I shall hereafter sell no goods at wholesale except only to duly appointed and authorized Agents," &c. To this plan I have since strictly adhered.



In accepting agents great care has been exercised to appoint those who, by long-continued fair dealing, have acquired a reputation for honesty, responsibility, and probity—men in whose word the public have learned to place confidence. These agents have agreed to keep a full assortment of my pens, and to sell them at my published prices. Thus the public are supplied by them with just such pens as they want, either as to writing or price, and get a full equivalent for the money paid.

No agent is appointed to travel from place to place, or canvass the country, so that all who want a Morton Gold Pen must get it from the Local Agent or from headquarters.

None need apply for the Agency except in conformity to the above, the liberal discount "To Clubs" being sufficient inducement to all others. A. MORTON.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
The best and cheapest Gold Pens in the world.
Prices, fifty cents and upward.
Call at No. 25 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.

THE BEST HOLIDAY PRESENT,
because the most enduring, and a constant remembrancer of the giver.
USEFUL, DURABLE, AND BEAUTIFUL
HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
The best and cheapest Gold Pens in the world.
Prices, fifty cents and upward.
Call at No. 25 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of T. Y. KELLEY & Co., 30 Vesey St., New York, are now supplying families throughout the country with TEAS, warranted in all cases perfectly pure as imported, at cargo prices, thus saving to them five or six profits of middle-men, which average from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound. Clubs can be formed in any city or town, by any person, male or female, and to such as will take the trouble we will furnish them Teas and Coffees for their own use free of charge, to the amount of five per cent. on each order they send us. On application, we send, by mail, circulars containing price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms to Agents in detail.

We forward all goods, collect on delivery, by the Express Company, and members of the Club can divide the Express charges equally among themselves.

PRICE LIST.
Oolong (black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Mixed (green and black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Young Hyson (green), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 25.
Imperial (green), 90, $1 00, $1 25.
English Breakfast (black), 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20.
Japan, 90, $1 00, $1 25.
Gunpowder, $1 25, $1 50.

We import a very superior quality of Kiangsi Oolong and Moyune Young Hyson Teas, put up in original Chinese packages, which we sell at $1 30 the Oolong and $1 60 the Young Hyson, per package.

Ground Coffees, 20c., 25c., 30c. per pound. Best Old Government Java, ground, 40c.

All goods put up by us bear our trade mark, and no others are genuine. Address all orders to
GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of
T. Y. KELLEY & CO., 30 Vesey Street,
P. O. Box 574. New York.

WINTER EVENING AMUSEMENTS. Parlor Fireworks, 25 cents; Magic Ferns, 25 cents; The Egyptian Mystery, 25 cents; Magic Cigar-Lighters, 25 cents: Parlor Lightning, 25 cents; The Oriental Mystery, 25 cents; The Parlor Pistol, 65 cents; Chinese Parlor Sights, 25 cents; Explosive Spiders, 25 cents; Magic Cards, 30 cents; The Magic Die, $1; and Games of all kinds. Send orders to O. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau Street, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
26 Courtlandt Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED,

To sell a new, elegant, perfumed STATIONERY CASE; also, ENGRAVINGS, WATCHES, and JEWELRY. Great chance to make money.
HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman St., New York.

JAMES VICK
IMPORTER AND GROWER OF FLOWER AND VEGETABLE SEEDS,
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds,
AND
FLORAL GUIDE FOR 1868, is now published and ready to send out. It makes a work of about one hundred large pages, containing full descriptions of the Choicest FLOWERS and VEGETABLES Grown, with plain directions for Sowing Seed, Culture, &c. It is beautifully Illustrated with more than ONE HUNDRED FINE WOOD ENGRAVINGS of Flowers and Vegetables, and a BEAUTIFUL COLORED PLATE OF FLOWERS.
Well printed on the finest paper, and one of the most beautiful as well as the most instructive works of the kind published.
☞ Sent to all who apply, by mail, postpaid, for Ten Cents, which is not half the cost. Address
JAMES VICK, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

DESIRABLE PRESENTS. SPECTACLES AND EYE-GLASSES, Lorgnets, &c., with the celebrated BRAZILIAN PEBBLES, manufactured by SEMMONS, Oculist Optician,
669½ and 1103 Broadway.

OPERA, FIELD, and MARINE GLASSES of immense power and new designs. Microscopes, Thermometers, and Claude Lorraine Glasses, suitable for Presents. SEMMONS, Oculist Optician, 669½ and 1103 Broadway.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

THE EGYPTIAN MYSTERY. Wonderful and curious. Sent, on receipt of 25 cents, by O. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau Street, New York.

BARD & BROTHERS,
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES, SILVER, RUBBER, and GOLD-PLATED TELESCOPIC PEN-CASES, TOOTH-PICKS, &c., &c.
JAMES D. BARD, Agent,
No. 22 Maiden Lane, New York.

GREAT OFFER for the HOLIDAYS.
HORACE WATERS & CO.,
No. 431 Broadway,
Will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six superior makers, at bargains for cash, or will take one fifth cash and the balance in monthly installments, for rent, and rent money applied, if purchased.

WORKING MODELS OF STEAM ENGINES, various styles and sizes. Illustrated Catalogues sent on receipt of a postage stamp by
O. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau St., New York.

THE MUSICAL MIRROR,
A Volume of ELEMENTARY INSTRUCTIONS in VOCAL MUSIC, with numerous PRACTICAL EXERCISES, attractively arranged upon an original plan; together with a COLLECTION OF MUSIC, harmoniously adapted to SACRED AND SECULAR WORDS. The whole especially designed for PUBLIC SCHOOLS, COLLEGES, AND SINGING CLASSES. Price 75 cents. Copies mailed postpaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston; CHAS. H. DITSON & Co., 711 Broadway, New York.

RUPTURE CURED by wearing White's Patent Lever Truss (no pressure on the back), and using Dr. Gregory's celebrated Hernia Lotion. A radical cure is warranted. Send a 10 cent stamp for pamphlet.
WHITE'S PATENT LEVER TRUSS Co., 609 Broadway.

A NEW ORDER OF THINGS.

UNDER the present vicious system of trade, consumers of goods have to pay more than double what they cost, owing to the number of hands through which they pass. We have, therefore, established a plan whereby consumers in the country towns can receive their goods, almost direct from first hands, and at a very small advance. Send for our Circular. A splendid chance is offered to Agents, male and female, to get up Clubs. Address S. C. THOMPSON & CO., 30 Hanover Street Boston, Mass.

CHASE'S IMPROVED DOLLAR MICROSCOPE. Adapted to all trades and professions. Agents wanted. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1, with directions. Address O. N. CHASE, 81 Washington St., Boston, or FOWLER & WELLS, New York City.

"Economy is Wealth."—Franklin.

WHY will people pay $50 or $100 for a Sewing Machine when $25 will buy a better one for all PRACTICAL purposes? Notwithstanding reports to the contrary, the subscribers beg to inform their numerous friends that the "FRANKLIN" and "MEDALLION" Machines can be had in any quantity. This Machine is a double thread, complete with Table, constructed upon entirely new principles, and DOES NOT infringe upon any other in the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of patrons will testify. ☞ AGENTS WANTED.—Machines sent to Agents on trial, and GIVEN AWAY to families who are needy and deserving. Address
J. C. OTTIS & CO., Boston, Mass.

NO ONE NEED BE IN THE DARK.
ALL TRAVELERS SHOULD USE THE
Pocket Lantern

VERY LIGHT, STRONG, and DURABLE. Can be folded and carried in the pocket or traveling-bag with safety and convenience, occupying the space of a cigar-case, and are opened and closed as readily. They contain, whether open or closed, matches and extra candles, and, being always ready for use,
Are most Appreciated in the Greatest Emergencies.
Dealers and canvassers supplied at following rates, on receipt of orders accompanied with remittances:

	P't. doz.	P't. gross.	1 gross.
No. 1—2 Candles in ea.	$1 00 ea.	$8 50 doz.	$8 00 doz.
No. 3—3 " "	75 "	6 50 "	6 00 "

PURE SPERM CANDLES.

	Less than 12 lbs.	12 lbs.	40 lbs. (1 case.)
No. 1—20 to the lb.	$1 00 lb.	$0 75 lb.	$0 70 lb.
No. 3—90 " "	1 25 "	95 "	90 "

JULIUS IVES & CO., 49 Maiden Lane, New York, Manufacturers and Dealers in Kerosene Goods generally, and Proprietors of IVES'S PATENT LAMPS,
THE SAFEST, MOST CONVENIENT, AND IN EVERY WAY THE BEST LAMP EVER USED.
CHANDELIERS, BRACKETS, HANGING, AND TABLE LAMPS OF ALL KINDS, CAN BE LIGHTED AS QUICKLY AS GAS, FILLED AND TRIMMED SAFELY AND NEATLY, ALL WITHOUT REMOVING THE SHADE, GLOBE, OR CHIMNEY, OR UNSCREWING THE BURNER.

CLUB FOR 1868.

$2 50 A YEAR

For the WEEKLY EVENING POST and the AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST.

$3 00 A YEAR

For the WEEKLY EVENING POST and the RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE.

$4 00 A YEAR

For the WEEKLY EVENING POST, AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST and RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE.

$4 00 A YEAR

For the SEMI-WEEKLY EVENING POST, and either the AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST or RIVERSIDE MAGAZINE.

Send for free specimen copy to
"THE EVENING POST,"
NEW YORK.

PROSPECTUS OF

The Evening Post

NEW YORK.

It is understood, we suppose, that while the EVENING POST aims to be primarily a newspaper in which the current events of world history, political, commercial, scientific, social, and literary, are recorded or pleasured at, it is also emphatically a political paper. It can not separate itself from the life of our times, and particularly from the life of our country, and it must discuss questions of public interest with all the earnestness, all the intelligence, all the force, that it can muster and their importance may seem to demand.

ITS CREED.

What its principles in politics are have been long known. They may be summed up in the words, NATIONAL UNITY; State Independence; and Individual Freedom and Equality of Rights. The perpetuity and supremacy of the Union, as the guaranty of our national strength and glory; the Independence of the States in all their local affairs, as the guaranty against an oppressive and dangerous centralization; the Freedom and Equality of the Individual, without regard to birth or section, as the rightful end of all government, and the surest means of social development, personal happiness, and national progress.

These are our general principles; and in the application of them we shall insist upon the honorable payment of our public debts; the retrenchment of expenditures; the most rigid economy of administration; the maintenance of a integrity and capacity, not partisan service, as the grounds of appointment to office. We shall oppose the extension of all governments to be odious, decree, and execute justice among all its members, all partial laws are iniquitous; all special privileges a wrong; all interference with the natural development of industry, and an unrestricted exchange of the fruits of that industry, an usurpation of power and a pernicious impertinence. We believe, too, that every member of society who contributes to its support or its defense should be precisely admitted to a participation in its political control. In other words, equal rights, equal laws, freedom from unjust and unnecessary constraints, and universal suffrage, are our matters how far they have been our motives in the past, and as, we trust, they will be our motives in the future.

REMIT TO US.

We ask that all correspondence on the subject of clubbing with us, other papers mentioned above, and all remittances may be made directly to us; and we beg all who remit money on this offer to be particular to specify what it is for, and to give their Post-office and State plainly written.

The Evening Post

CLUB RATES.

Those who would rather subscribe to the EVENING POST alone, can do so at the following rates:

TERMS TO MAIL SUBSCRIBERS.

Evening Post—Weekly.

Single copy, One Year.....$2 00
Five copies.....9 00
Ten copies, addressed to names of subscribers...11 50
Twenty copies, addressed to names of subscribers 24 00
TEN COPIES TO ONE PERSON'S ADDRESS.....15 00

Evening Post—Semi-Weekly.

Single copy, One Year.....$4 00
Two copies, One Year.....7 00
Five copies, or over, for each copy.....2 00

☞ Additions may be made to a club, at any time, at club rates.

REMITTANCES should be made, if possible, by Draft or Post-Office Order on New York.

☞ POSTMASTERS and others desiring to act as Agents will be furnished with Show-Bills and further terms by applying to

WM. C. BRYANT & CO.,
PUBLISHERS OF THE EVENING POST,
41 Nassau St., New York.

A NEW VOLUME.—Look out for the January Phrenological Journal, containing the HISTORY OF PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, with portraits of Kings, Queens, and Emperors; also of Patrick Henry, Edward Everett, F. W. Robertson, and others; including "Signs of Character;" Races of Men; Science of the Soul; Social Relations, Love, Courtship, and Marriage; Self-Improvement; Self-Improvement; Choice of Parents, with other matters all ought to know, to be found in no other publication. Only $2 a year, or 20 cents a number. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

Fowle's Pile and Humor Cure.

One Bottle warranted a perfect cure in all kinds of PILES. Two to three bottles in the worst cases of ERYSIPELAS, SCROFULA, SALT RHEUM, and ALL DISEASES OF THE SKIN. For INTERNAL and EXTERNAL USE. In cases of failure all dealers will please return the money, and receive full bottles of my agents. No cases of failure in PILES or HUMORS for ten years.

Prepared by HENRY D. FOWLE, Chemist, No. 71 Prince St., Boston. Sold every where. $1 a Bottle.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORODITE WATCH FACTORY.

ORODITE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For greatness, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time for life. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $100. Also Orodite Chains, as well as those of gold, from $2 to $5. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Orders must pay ax the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 42 and 44 Nassau St., New York (up stairs).

TESTIMONIALS.

U. S. STEAMER "COMMODORE PERRY," ERIE, October 5, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., New York:

GENTS.—I am in receipt of the Orodite Watch, just received by express. It gives entire satisfaction. As I ordered this for another party, I now wish you to send me another of the same quality, for my own use. You will get some five or six more orders from this vessel, and two or three from the employés of the express company, as I engaged all in their service, and they were charmed with it. I think it the finest and best watch in the country for the price, and cheap at double the cost. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. BERRY, Assistant U. S. N.

FORT LARNED, September 23, 1867.

Messrs. Collins & Co.:

GENTLEMEN.—I received by express your package containing two Watches—am well pleased with them. I sold them both in an hour. I now want one for Superintendent Rock, one for Assistant-Superintendent Cook, one for Carpenter Ash, one for Carpenter Hamilton, and two for Stone-Mason Lyons, one for Stone-Mason Smith, and one for myself—seven in all. Send as before, by U. S. Express, C. O. D. Send immediately, and oblige

Yours respectfully,
JACKSON FENNACK, MICH., October 1, 1867.

C. E. Collins & Co.:

The Watches that I ordered came safe to hand, and all of them are giving good satisfaction; and I must say that they far surpass my expectations, both for appearance and time. I want you to forward me four more; have them all in good running order. I have been selling the Watches as fast as I could get them to my friends. One of the others was for myself, and I shall also keep another. Likely you will receive other orders from me. I would like to see one of your Chains. Yours respectfully, C. H. GATES, Keenaska, Delta Co., Mich.

NO. 190 ROBINSON ST., ALLEGHANY CITY, PA., July 20, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., Nos. 42 and 44 Nassau St., New York:

GENTLEMEN.—You will please send me by "Wells, Fargo Express Company," one Ladies' Imitation Watch, just the same as the Ladies' Watch you sent me before, with curved case. Please collect through the Adams Express Company, as before. These Watches are a wonder at the price. Please send me a good Watchkeeper, and write me as soon as you ship, and very much oblige, Very respectfully, WM. NEILLIE.

POST HOSPITAL, BARRANCAS, FLA., October 16, 1867.

C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTS.—I have this day received the Watch which you mailed on the 10th. I was much pleased with the appearance of the case. You will receive more orders from me or through me. It looks as well as the one I paid $175 for. Yours, &c., THOS. A. HOPKINS.

GRENADA, MISS., October 7, 1867.

Messrs. Collins & Co.:

The watch came safely to hand to-day. I am astonished at the complete workmanship of the watch. I shall take pride in circulating the new discovery. Also I shall send you new subscribers, if not, for them for the sale of said watches. Also send me two others of the same stamp. Very respectfully, &c.,
GEO. W. GRAY & BRO.

OFFICE OF THE QUINCY R. R. BRIDGE CO., QUINCY, ILL., October 9, 1867.

To Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

DEAR SIRS.—Your composition watch arrived safe to hand this day, per United States Express. It pleases me very well. I have shown it to my friends and neighbors, who are much pleased with it, and will in a few days send you on further orders. It greatly exceeds my expectations in every respect. Yours truly,
CHAS. JAS. THOMAS, Quincy Bridge Co.

115 BANK STREET, CLEVELAND, OHIO, November 4, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SIRS.—I received the Watches on the 30th of October. Please send me two more, the same kind you sent me to Akron. I sold two of them for $40 each in one hour after I got it out of the express office: it was the one that had the most carved work on. Please send the same, lady's size, as soon as possible: I have had eight in all. I shall be in Cleveland this month, and I think I can sell a number of them.

Truly yours, GEO. SMITH.

P. S.—Please send me two Orodite Watches, lady's size, and oblige yours, G. S.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

29,000 HALF CHESTS by ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Sloyne districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which is the low price of 30c. per pound, and we warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying the Clubs formed in every locality, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them of us personally in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to club with his neighbors call at the store and get one of our Price Lists and a copy of this our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when it is completed you can send the list to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, as there need be no confusion in their distribution —each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $20, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express, to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be able to give better goods. We wish to introduce our Teas into families of less than 50lb.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all who use our name, or imitate our style of advertising or circulars, or copy our name in either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make all kinds of Patent Medicines, Perfumery, Toilet Articles, Cosmetics, Candies, Wines, Cordials, Soaps, Dyes, and hundreds of other articles in daily demand. Easily made, and sold at large profits. Sent postpaid for 25 cents, by O. A. BOOBRACH, No. 132 Nassau St., N. Y.

Watches Superseded. The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, in handsome case, with glass shade, steel and metal works, white enameled dial, ordinary watch size, sound and serviceable. Warranted to denote correct time, and keep in order for two years. Where satisfaction is not given, money returned. Sent free for $1 50. Address WATCH-KEEPER, care Gold Street and Fulton Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet

OF SOLIDIFIED GLYCERINE softens and smooths the skin, prevents chapping, imparts beauty and brightness to the complexion, is deliciously fragrant, transparent, and superb as a toilet soap. Sold by all Druggists. R. & G. A. WRIGHT, Philadelphia.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $8, $12, $16, $25, $30. Price of Office, $15, $28, $39, $42, $65, $105. Send for Circular to LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 52 Water St., Boston.

"Systematic and persistent Advertising the sure road to success in business."

T. C. EVANS'S

LIST OF SELECTED NEWSPAPERS,

RELIGIOUS, AGRICULTURAL, AND LITERARY,

Comprises the Best Advertising Mediums in the Country, their

COMBINED CIRCULATION EXCEEDING 600,000,

Penetrating to nearly or quite every postoffice, and the premises of the large majority of the Intelligent Reading Public of the Northern States. Advertisements inserted in any list, and the BEST ATTAINABLE POSITION, while it is offered at a price which will repay investigation. It includes

HARPER'S WEEKLY
LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER,
&c., &c., &c.

☞ A Complete List, with prices for all or in part, will be furnished on application to

T. C. EVANS,
129 Washington Street, Boston.

Holiday Presents.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are now offering

Parisian Cloaks and Sacques,

ELEGANT INDIA SHAWLS (LONG AND SQUARE),

Richly Embroidered Silk and Velvet Robes,

REAL THREAD LACE POINTS,

EMBROIDERED HANDKERCHIEFS,

Alexandre's Unrivaled Kid Gloves,

IN ALL SHADES AND SIZES,

RUSSIA AND HUDSON'S BAY SABLE, MINK, AND ERMINE MUFFS, COLLARS, TIPPETS, &c.,

ALSO

A GREAT VARIETY OF

CHRISTMAS and NEW YEAR'S GIFTS,

AT EXCEEDINGLY LOW PRICES.

BROADWAY AND TENTH STREET.

EMPLOYMENT! $10 A DAY and EXPENSES PAID. Circulars free. O. T. GARRY, Biddeford, Me.

$225 A MONTH! 15 new articles for AGENTS. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

JANUARY, 1868.

In the present Number is commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Story of Modern Life," by Miss DINAH MARIA CRAIK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, forbidding a pointing and entertaining variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 will be commenced the Series of "The Mormons," Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Cross," a Novel, by LAMAR DE MORIL.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $2 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, each containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY a year, for the WEEKLY at BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscribers in the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

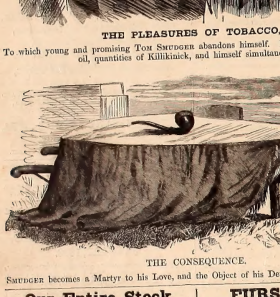
Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription has expired. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

Back Numbers of the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR can be supplied at any time, and subscribers can begin at any time. When a direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, Postage Stamps, Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $2 00 per Line, each insertion.



Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 00 per Line; Outside Pages, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

THE PLEASURES OF TOBACCO.

To which young and promising TOM SNUDGER abandons himself. He wasteth the midnight oil, quantities of Kilikinick, and himself simultaneously.

THE CONSEQUENCE.

SNUDGER becomes a Martyr to his Love, and the Object of his Devotion is buried with him.

Our Entire Stock

IS NOW OFFERED AT

REDUCED PRICES,

in view of our REMOVAL up town in the Spring.

WHITE CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 143 pieces, $30.

PLATED WARE FROM ROGERS, SMITH & CO.

GOLD-EDGE TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $11.

DECORATED TEA SETS, $15.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 419 Broadway.
4 doors below Broome Street.

Chickering & Sons' American Pianos.

FIRST GRAND PRIZE. THE HIGHEST AWARD. THE LEGION OF HONOR. FOR THE CHICKERING PIANO.

MAKING SIXTY-THREE FIRST PREMIUMS DURING THE PAST FORTY-FOUR YEARS.

WAREROOMS:
652 Broadway, New York;
246 Washington St., Boston.

GOLD PENS.

Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Repointing at 50 cents each by mail. Manufactory 16 Maiden Lane. E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

Established 1822. E. W. BURR, Established 1822.

MANUFACTURING JEWELER,

791 Broadway,

OPPOSITE GRACE CHURCH,

Will offer during the Holidays the finest assortment of

DIAMONDS AND OTHER GEMS,

STONE CAMEOS,

and every description of

The Finest Jewelry and Watches,

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

FURS! FURS!

F. W. ISAAKS'S SON,

(ESTABLISHED 1826.)

Russian American and Hudson's Bay Co. Furs.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description on hand and to order. All goods of our own manufacture, and warranted of superior quality and workmanship. F. W. ISAAK'S SON, 620 Broadway.

USEFUL HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

W. H. LEE & CO.

WARE ROOMS

199 Fulton Street,

N. Y.

Parlor Settees, Turkish Chairs and Lounges, Inlaid Work Tables, and Bouquet Stands, Library and Chamber Suites.

$20. Gold Coin. $20.

The new business cards, to imitate $20 gold pieces. Ornamental and useful, and the best advertising medium, as every body retains them. Manufactured by W. T. & J. MEBEREAU, 60 Dunne Street.

FOUNTAIN PEN, 1¼ CENTS.

AGENT'S WANTED. Success guaranteed. Profits large. $10 a day. No humbug. Sample box, 10 Pens, for 35 cents; ½ gross, $1 25, or 1 gross, $2, postpaid. Money returned if not satisfied. Address Morse Fountain Pen Co., 413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PRINCE & COS. AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.

Forty thousand are now in use. BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

TURNER'S TIC DOULOUREUX OR Universal Neuralgia PILL.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.

Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cents; six do., $5.00, postage 37 cts.; twelve do., $9.00, postage 60 cts. Sold by all druggists.

TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS.

And others should send to all parts of the United tates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 60 Broadway.

Popular Goods

at

Popular Prices

FOR BOYS AND MISSES.

BALMORAL AND ROB ROY STOCKINGS.

CLOTH AND FANCY KNIT GAITERS.

MERINO UNDER VESTS AND DRAWERS.

CLOTH, KID, AND BEAVER GLOVES.

FANCY GLOVES AND INFANTEES.

COMFORTERS, SCARFS, HOODS.

GARIBALDI AND CARDIGAN JACKETS.

A LARGE VARIETY OF ELEGANT GOODS AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway.

Mettam's Galvano-Electro-Metallic Insoles, Belts, and Armlets.

For the cure of Rheumatism, Gout, Neuralgia, Cold Feet, and all diseases of the Blood and Nerves. Send for a Circular. LOHIN BROOKS & SONS, Boot and Shoe Dealers, 434 Broadway, New York, Sole Agents.

WANTED, AGENTS,

$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every other stitch can be unsewed, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We want agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., or BOSTON, MASS.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

Our Young Folks,

For 1868 will be a magnificent volume, having Stories, Tales, Sketches, and Poems, by the following writers: CHARLES DICKENS, DONALD G. MITCHELL, MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, MRS. LUCY LARCOM, J. T. TROWBRIDGE, MRS. ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, MRS. ANNIE THOMAS, MRS. ANNE WHITNEY, MRS. CELIA THAXTER, MRS. LUCRETIA P. HALE, MRS. ROSE TERRY COOKE, MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE, MRS. MARY MAPES DODGE, JANE G. AUSTIN, REV. EDWARD EGGLESTON, and many others. With many beautiful Illustrations. Price 25 cents for Specimen Number, postpaid; $2 60 a year. Liberal discount to Clubs.

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston.

DOLLAR & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum Goods, 91 John St., near Nassau, and 439 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Cigar-holders to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale and retail circular. Letter Box 5846.

DRUNKARD, STOP!

DR. BEERS, 670 Washington St., Boston, Mass., has cured 10,000 of the worst cases. Send stamp for circular. The medicine is harmless, and can be given without the knowledge of the patient. PRICE REDUCED.

J. O. HULL'S SON,
New York.

BAY RUM SOAP,

Over 100 Styles Toilet Soaps.
HOME BETTER IMPORTED.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. 125th.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

ALL WANTING FARMS.

Good soil, mild climate, thirty-four miles south of Philadelphia. Price only twenty-five dollars per acre. Best of grain and grass land. Also improved farms. Hundreds settling. Information sent free. Address C. K. LANDIS, Proprietor, Vineland, New Jersey.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.—KALDENBERG & SON, who received the Prize at Paris, and highest prize at the American Institute, 1867, offer the FINEST stock of Meerschaum Pipes ever imported at REDUCED PRICES. Repairing, Boiling, &c. Monograms, Portraits, &c., cut to order. Send for circulars. 6 John St., up stairs, and 23 Wall Street, cor. Broad. Patrons up town, No. 717 Broadway (N. Y. Hotel).

N.B. Every article warranted genuine and to color.

$25 PER DAY. Agents wanted in every city to sell Prof. Porter's Patent Gaslight Reflectors, for store windows. Excels all others. Never tarnishes nor grows dim. Four lights equal to any other eight lights. For further particulars, address

GREAT AMERICAN REFLECTOR COMPANY,
Office, 312 and 314 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

WHY NOT USE White Pine Compound, when it is such a sure remedy for Coughs, Lung Complaints, and Kidney troubles?

PRICES: BOX OF 60 DRAGÉES, EQUAL TO ONE AND A HALF PINTS OF THE OIL, 75 CENTS.
BOX OF 120 DRAGÉES, $1 25; BOX OF 240 DRAGÉES, $2 00.
M. WARD, CLOSE & CO., WHOLESALE AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES, NEW YORK.

T. H. McALLISTER'S
HOUSEHOLD MICROSCOPE.

A miniature model of the first-class scientific microscope. A necessity to every family, and a most acceptable holiday present. Four magnifying powers, for investigating the minutiæ of animal and vegetable life. Price $6. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician,
49 Nassau Street, New York.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.

New Designs, $1 50 postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD,
ARCHITECT, 191 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Published;

I.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

II.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By LUCY RANDALL COMFORT. With Engravings. Square 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

III.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 6 to February 24, 1867. On the "Ely Foundation" of the Union Theological Seminary. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

IV.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas, Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $3 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

V.

MACE'S FAIRY BOOK. Home Fairy Tales (Contes du Petit-Château). By JEAN MACÉ, Author of "The Servants of the Stomach," &c. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH, Translator of "Martin's History of France," "Labouleye's Fairy Book," &c. With Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

VI.

THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By GOLDWIN SMITH, Author of "Lectures on the Study of History," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

VII.

AGNES STRICKLAND'S QUEENS or ENGLAND. Lives of the Queens of England. From the Norman Conquest. By AGNES STRICKLAND, Author of "Lives of the Queens of Scotland." Abridged by the Author. Revised and Edited by CAROLINE G. PARKER. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. (Uniform with the Student's Histories.)

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

GUILD COURT: A London Story. By GEORGE MAC DONALD. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Citoyenne Jacqueline," &c., &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE BROTHERS' BET; or, Within Six Weeks. By EMILIE FLYGARE CARLEN. 8vo, Paper, 38 cents.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the Author of "Paul Massie." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CARLYON'S YEAR. By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

STONE EDGE. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

CIRCE; or, Three Acts in the Life of an Artist. By BARONESS WAHLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE TENANTS OF MALOIRY. By J. S. LE FANU. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BIRDS OF PREY. By M. E. BRADDON. Illustrations 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE CURATE'S DISCIPLINE. By MRS. ELOART. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Send Free by Mail, on receipt of Price.

SUGAR-COATED PILLS of COD LIVER EXTRACT (not Oil). Not objectionable to the most Delicate Stomach.

MORE ECONOMICAL, AND EFFICACIOUS THAN COD LIVER OIL. Now in use in St. Luke's, Bellevue, Bureau of Medicine and Out-door Relief, Eclectic Medical College and Dispensary, Homeopathic Dispensary, &c., &c.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 577.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE FENIAN "GUNPOWDER TREASON."

ENGLAND continues to be terribly excited and frightened over her new and very much enlarged version of the GUY FAWKES gunpowder-plot, and the English press seems to think there is reason

"Why gunpowder treason
And Guy Fawkes plot
Should not be forgot."

England has not had for many years so thorough an excitement as has resulted from the explosions at the Clerkenwell prison, at Millbank, and at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and other places noticed in our former issues. Subsequently a powder mill at Faversham, near London, was blown up, and as the cause of the disaster, like that at Newcastle, was unknown it was at once attributed, like the other, to the Fenians. After using the general post-offices of the kingdom to distribute their destructive torpedoes, which however failed to kill any one, the Fenians are now reported as endeavoring to destroy the post-offices by means of Greek fire—another decided failure. No further explosions than those named have occurred; but a number of mysterious Fenians are reported to have attacked and carried a Martello tower near Cork, and carried off a large supply of arms.

Our previous reports have been entirely by telegraph, and have been very unsatisfactory. We are now beginning to receive the illustrated accounts of the several explosions which occurred. We give on this page an illustration of the first of the explosions, that at Clerkenwell prison, in which RICHARD BURKE and JOSEPH CASEY were confined. Our illustration shows the ruin of the prison wall immediately after the occurrence of the explosion, with the police in possession engaged in guarding the breach in the wall and in removing the rubbish.

The effect of the explosion was to blow in a triangular section of the prison wall of about 20 feet at the base by 60 feet or 70 feet at the summit; to utterly destroy the house immediately opposite, burying all within it under the ruins; to demolish a great part of many other houses right and left and immediately in the rear, wounding fifty of the inhabitants; and to fill the whole lane with heaps of bricks from the prison wall.

DESMOND and ALLEN, who were arrested charged with placing and firing the barrel of gunpowder, were examined in London on January 3, and the evidence was by no means satisfactory or conclusive of their guilt. The examination was adjourned, but so strong was the feeling against the Fenians that, although nothing was proven against them, the prisoners were not discharged.

RUINS OF THE WALL OF CLERKENWELL PRISON, LONDON, IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE EXPLOSION.

The head-quarters of the Fenians, in Paris, France, were lately seized by the French police. A large quantity of letters and documents, revealing the plans of the organization for the destruction of the British fleet in the Channel, were secured. Lord STRATHNAIRN, the commander-in-chief of the British army in Ireland, was in extraordinary activity against a Fenian movement. His precautions were mainly directed to the centers of the south and the west coast of the island, where a revolutionary "landing" was looked for. On January 3 a body of daring Fenians entered the magazine at Cork and carried away half a ton of powder in sight of the eyes of the astonished guards. In view of the disrupted state of Ireland the clergy of the city of Limerick have signed a declaration declaring that there can be no permanent peace in Ireland unless it is treated as Hungary has lately been by Austria. It will hardly be gratifying to England to have Austria held up as a model for her.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1868.

THE POLITICAL ISSUE OF 1868.

FROM time to time there is a Convention held in some part of the Southern States by the late political leaders in that section, and once or twice a month a letter is published from some one of the same leaders. The resolutions of the Conventions and the counsel of the letters have always the same tone. The constitutions now forming for the Southern States must be rejected. "The present plan of reconstruction must be defeated; and the friends of the Conventions and of the letter-writers must wait patiently for a return of their old ascendency, which is sure to come."

The latest letter was written upon the day before Christmas by BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK of Alabama. It is decorous and temperate in tone; and, like all the letters and resolutions of which we have spoken, it presents the situation very plainly, not indeed in the manner contemplated by the writer, but in some less complete. "We want peace," writes Mr. FITZPATRICK, "but not degradation; we wish to be left free to act for ourselves, and free from the intermeddling of those who do not live among us, but come here to foment discord and speculate upon our troubles. Who are the "we" of whom Mr. FITZPATRICK speaks? Who are they who wish to be left free to act for themselves? They are not the people of the State. They are not the loyal citizens. They are merely the old white dominant class. Those are the "we" who wish to be left free to act for themselves, and also for the rest of the population, in some cases more than the half. Therefore, says Mr. FITZPATRICK, and logically, "let the people vote down this constitution and adopt another more in accordance with the genius of their institutions, and all will be well." Now what does Mr. FITZPATRICK mean by the people, and what does he suppose to be the genius of our institutions, if it be not equal rights? And what is the value to the Constitution lately adopted by the Alabama Convention does he find any thing inconsistent with the genius of republican institutions? It guarantees full and equal liberty of personal and civil rights; and admits to the suffrage every male person of a certain birth, naturalization, age, and residence, and disfranchises only those who violated the rules of civilized warfare during the rebellion; convicted traitors and other criminals; idiots and the insane; and those who are disqualified by the proposed Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and by the Reconstruction law, a disqualification which the Legislature may remove. Is there any fundamental whatever may be injudicious, but can a constitution in which these are the sole disqualifications be repugnant to a man who is sincerely friendly to "the genius of our institutions?

The melancholy truth is that Mr. FITZPATRICK, and all those for whom he speaks, think that the genius of our institutions requires that the late rebels should be recognized as the political class of the State, and that they should have exclusive control of the local governments. Under every moderate and careful phrase this is the meaning. "We," says Mr. FITZPATRICK, meaning the citizens who rebelled, we, and we only, must reorganize these States. And he indicates exactly the issue to which the country is now brought. The Presidential campaign which is now opening will answer precisely that question. It will decide that the Union shall be reorganized as those who have maintained it shall prefer, or as those who sought its destruction and are now subdued shall determine. This issue may be obscured by financial difficulties. It may be perplexed by the folly of the dominant party. But nothing can now conceal the fact that there are but two parties in the country, and one paramount subject, namely, reconstruction. One of these parties, the Republican, insists that the whole body of the people of the Southern States, with the exceptions we have mentioned, shall be consulted in the formation of the new governments of those States. The other party, the Democratic, insists that a certain limited class, mainly composed of the late rebels, and to which all the present disaffected states adhere, shall have the exclusive power of reorganization.

The situation is simple. The issue is plain. It will be decided according to the general judgment of the greater or less disadvantages of the two plans. That of the Republican party, which is now developing itself, has the undoubted disadvantage of admitting to the suffrage large numbers of uneducated persons. But this is counterbalanced by the inexpressible benefit of securing an entire and overwhelming minority of voters instinctively loyal to the national government, and therefore of establishing a state system in sympathy with it; of making the actual control in the new States, at the polls and in the Convention, justifies the confidence which was necessarily placed in them. For, it must be remembered, there were but three courses possible. When the war ended, and left the rebel States without civil government, the United States might have governed them as Territories, or it might have authorized the white population under certain conditions to reorganize the States; or it might have invited the whole body of the people to reorganize them. These were the three methods. The first was felt to be impracticable. Probably it would have been the wiser way; but the country would not consent. It was never a question between the other two methods. The President, without the least authority, and stepping entirely out of his official duty, insisted upon the second. Congress adopted the third.

An educative qualification for the suffrage, which was urged as impartial and reasonable, was necessarily rejected in the actual condition of affairs. If the States could have been retained for some years as Territories merely, and the obstruction of the rebel leaders entirely unopposed in the mean while, this qualification might have been wisely introduced. But to have adopted it without sufficient delay to give the poor whites and the freedmen a chance to acquire the qualification would have been simply to intrust the reorganization of the States to the class formerly ruling, and to make the present disaffected population bellogs. Experience is proving, we think, and will yet more conclusively show, that the risk involved in the Congressional plan was, under the circumstances, wisely taken. It was well and a few months since by Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON, in his Fortnightly Review, that "what is wanted in the mass who vote is the desire for the right result, freedom from selfish motive and willingness to trust in wise guidance..... Very plain men know who wish them well, and who wish a thing which will bring them good. Electors have not got to govern the country, they have only to find out men who will govern it. Government is just and active. They are so ignorant, says one—more ignorant as electors than certain members are as legislators?' General education is sure to follow, and that in an immensely advanced by general suffrage. And with whatever faults of detail we are very sure that the system of reconstruction which was adopted was, upon the whole, the best that the circumstances allowed.

Evidently it must be continued, or the work must begin again. The issue is clear, and the sincere friend of the country, any man who with Mr. FITZPATRICK "wants peace," or who understands the conditions of national progress and prosperity, will wish again to plunge the Southern States into the chaos from which they are now beginning to emerge, by attempting the disfranchisement of white voters, and instructing those States and all their interests and population to the exclusive authority of disaffected citizens. We do not use the word harshly, nor with the desire to excite passion. We speak of those who believed and believe that secession is a constitutional right, and that slavery is the best condition of a free government. Those who hold these opinions are necessarily disaffected to this government, and such persons are the great majority of the white population of the Southern States. Of course, liberty can not be safe in their hands, and no Union can be peaceful in which they control a large group of States. Our American principles, therefore, our patriotism, our prosperity, and our peace, alike demand that we do not abandon the work upon which we have entered; while common-sense indicates that we prosecute it as dispassionately and wisely as we do firmly and confidently. It is this issue which the election will decide, and General GRANT will undoubtedly lead those who intend to fight it out upon the line already indicated.

THE POWER OF THE STATE OVER THE CITY.

WHAT powers does the State possess over the city of New York? Plainly, the charter of the city must be deemed a part of the political machinery of the State; and in all matters of general public concern the charter is subject to alteration by the Legislature. This view has prevailed from the very beginning. The first charters issued were granted by the Dutch to the city under the title of School Burgomasters and Schepbens of New Amsterdam. To these succeeded the English charters: from Governor NICOLLS, in 1665; from Governor DONGAN, under JAMES II., in 1686; from Governor COSBY, under QUEEN ANNE, and the Montgomery Charter, under GEORGE II., in 1730. The English charters were confirmed by an act of the Colonial Legislature in 1732, of which act all judges and persons were to take notice "as if it were a public act of the Assembly relating to the whole Colony." On the adoption by the State of the Constitution of 1777, it was provided that nothing contained in it should be deemed to annul any charters to bodies politic and corporate; which clause was repeated in the Constitutions of 1821 and 1846.

To these charters amendments of the most important character were made, from time to time, by the Legislature; sometimes with, but more frequently without, the application or consent of the Corporation. And an amended charter was passed by the Legislature in 1830 substantially conforming to one which had the year before been adopted by a convention of the people of the city, which contained a provision that "any part of the charter of the city of New York, and of the several acts of the Legislature of the State of New York amending the same, as are not inconsistent with the provisions of this law, shall not be considered as repealed, modified, or in any manner affected thereby," etc.; which last-mentioned charter has also been frequently amended, without consent of the Corporation. This is, in substance, a history of the whole matter.

After the capitulation by the Dutch to the English Governor NICOLLS, in the new charter then issued, recited that he, "upon mature deliberation and advice, found it necessary to discharge the whole body of government lately in practice of School Burgomasters and Schepbens....." as not known or customary in any of his majesty's dominions." And on the adoption of our Constitution in 1777, it was declared that all laws then in force for the government of the Colony, inconsistent with the new form of government, were void, and that the supreme legislative power had reverted to the people.

An examination of the Dongan and Montgomery charters will show that they contained various provisions inconsistent with our American system, which provisions could not be repealed by the Legislature if the doctrine contended for by counsel be sound, that the Charter can not be touched except with the consent of the city. Authority was given to the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty out of native born or naturalized or denizated subjects to create free citizens, to whom the monopoly of trade within the city was given; and it was declared that "no other persons, other than such free citizens, shall hereafter use any trade, mystery, or manual occupation within the city and liberties, and precincts thereof, saving in the time of fairs, there to be kept, and during the continuance of such fairs only." Citizens thus formed were protected against jury service, or serving in certain specified official capacities outside of the city of New York; and it was also declared in the Montgomery Charter that the city should "be, and from thenceforth shall remain, a perpetual county, by itself." These provisions, which will be recognized as among those which had their origin in feudal times, have not been in terms abrogated, but have become obsolete from non user as not in harmony with the system of government which our Revolution established. As late as 1826, Chancellor KENT, in his Notes on the Charter (p. 172), expressed the opinion that if such resident of the city were chosen by the State laws then in force to serve out of the city, either as a juror, or on an inquest, or as tax assessor or collector, or as a constable, bailiff, or other ministerial officer, he could, under the protection of those ancient provisions, and of the restriction in the United States Constitution forbidding any State laws impairing the obligation of contracts, protect himself against the service.

The charter from English Governors did not give the city any right of representation either in the British Parliament, or in the Council of the Colony, or in the Colonial Legislature, and hence the city was armed with privileges and prerogatives considered essential to its existence as a free city. For some years after the charter from Governor NICOLLS, what was called the Legislative power of the Colony was exercised by the Governor and Council. On the accession of JAMES II. a Colonial Legislature was created in which New York city was represented in one House (the Assembly), but not in the upper, which was an appointed Senate, over whose joint legislative acts there were such restrictions that they amounted to but little more than a mere petition. On the adoption of the Constitution of the State in 1777, nine members of the Legislative Assembly out of seventy were awarded to the city of New York, and a corresponding representation in the Senate was also allowed; and although the charters then existing were saved by an express clause from being annulled (which they have never been), the State instantly after the termination of the war commenced the duty of conforming our local government, thus reinvested, to the general character of our system. The city of New York had not alone accomplished the Revolution. It now celebrates on the 25th of November of each year the evacuation of the British forces which occupied the city during almost the whole of the war; and there was no obligation on the part of the State to treat it as a free city, and to no power on the part of the city to free itself of such legislation as the State might adopt in general and public matters. The people of the whole State, including those of the city, were melted into one mass by the results of the Revolution; and inasmuch as the city shared in the exercise of the supreme power of legislation which was created—which might affect other cities—it became subject equally to that authority excepting that its Charter could not be annulled, and except also that all grants of land made by the city and of franchises coupled with a pecuniary interest, were protected from legislative interference.

In all other respects the Charter has been so changed that its original features can scarcely be distinguished in the powers now exercised. In 1832 a contest arose between two measurers of grain, one appointed by the city under the authority or the charter, the other appointed by the State under an act of the Legislature, created without the consent of the Corporation. The Supreme Court held (Satterlee vs. Sutton) that "the grant to the Corporation to appoint measurers was a grant of political power, coupled with an interest save the fees as a compensation for measuring; and that the grant in question was not to be considered in the light of property, or intended as a source of revenue, and that the Legislature had a right to act." And the Court was then composed of Chief-Justice JONES, and Judges HOFFMAN and OAKLEY, distinguished lawyers and judges. Subsequently the decision will be regarded as authority. The doctrine has never been overruled.

The acts for the creation by the State of Boards of Commissioners to regulate the police force and to protect the public health are, more especially, matters of a public character, and some more clearly within the scope of State legislation. No police force for the city was created by the English charters. The acts of March 2, 1798, and of March 21, 1800, established a police force. And until October, of interfering with chartered provisions, the Legislature in creating the new Board was merely perfecting a system commenced by itself in accordance with that supreme power which the Constitution of 1777 asserted as belonging to the State at large, over the whole machinery of government within the State.

A LITTLE HISTORY.

MORE than a quarter of a century has elapsed since WILLIAM G. HARNDEN and ALVAH ADAMS announced to the good people of Boston and New York that they were prepared to carry packages between the two cities, and to deliver them safely for a consideration. Even in those days there was competition. HARNDEN traveled by the Boston and Providence line; ADAMS by the Norwich and Worcester; it was a race between them. Their diligence was so far rewarded that they extended their lines to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, while other partners, HENRY WELLS, WILLIAM G. FARGO, WILLIAM A. LIVINGSTON, JOHN BUTTERFIELD, and others spread nets northward to the confines of the Northwestern civilization, even to Buffalo. Thus began the express business of the United States, which now gives employment to nearly ten thousand men. The capital in civil over which one mass by the results of the Revolution; and inasmuch as the city shared in the exercise of the supreme power of legislation which was created—which might affect other cities—it became subject equally to that authority excepting that its Charter could not be annulled, and except also that all grants of land made by the city and of franchises coupled with a pecuniary interest, were protected from legislative interference.

In all other respects the Charter has been so changed that its original features can scarcely be distinguished in the powers now exercised. In 1832 a contest arose between two measurers of grain, one appointed by the city under the authority or the charter, the other appointed by the State under an act of the Legislature, created without the consent of the Corporation. The Supreme Court held (Satterlee vs. Sutton) that "the grant to the Corporation to appoint measurers was a grant of political power, coupled with an interest save the fees as a compensation for measuring; and that the grant in question was not to be considered in the light of property, or intended as a source of revenue, and that the Legislature had a right to act." And the Court was then composed of Chief-Justice JONES, and Judges HOFFMAN and OAKLEY, distinguished lawyers and judges. Subsequently the decision will be regarded as authority. The doctrine has never been overruled.

The acts for the creation by the State of Boards of Commissioners to regulate the police force and to protect the public health are, more especially, matters of a public character, and some more clearly within the scope of State legislation. No police force for the city was created by the English charters. The acts of March 2, 1798, and of March 21, 1800, established a police force. And until October, of interfering with chartered provisions, the Legislature in creating the new Board was merely perfecting a system commenced by itself in accordance with that supreme power which the Constitution of 1777 asserted as belonging to the State at large, over the whole machinery of government within the State.

A LITTLE HISTORY.

MORE than a quarter of a century has elapsed since WILLIAM G. HARNDEN and ALVAH ADAMS announced to the good people of Boston and New York that they were prepared to carry packages between the two cities, and to deliver them safely for a consideration. Even in those days there was competition. HARNDEN traveled by the Boston and Providence line; ADAMS by the Norwich and Worcester; it was a race between them. Their diligence was so far rewarded that they extended their lines to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, while other partners, HENRY WELLS, WILLIAM G. FARGO, WILLIAM A. LIVINGSTON, JOHN BUTTERFIELD, and others spread nets northward to the confines of the Northwestern civilization, even to Buffalo. Thus began the express business of the United States, which now gives employment to nearly ten thousand men. The capital in civil over which one mass by the results of the Revolution; and inasmuch as the city shared in the exercise of the supreme power of legislation which was created—which might affect other cities—it became subject equally to that authority excepting that its Charter could not be annulled, and except also that all grants of land made by the city and of franchises coupled with a pecuniary interest, were protected from legislative interference.

In all other respects the Charter has been so changed that its original features can scarcely be distinguished in the powers now exercised. In 1832 a contest arose between two measurers of grain, one appointed by the city under the authority or the charter, the other appointed by the State under an act of the Legislature, created without the consent of the Corporation. The Supreme Court held (Satterlee vs. Sutton) that "the grant to the Corporation to appoint measurers was a grant of political power, coupled with an interest save the fees as a compensation for measuring; and that the grant in question was not to be considered in the light of property, or intended as a source of revenue, and that the Legislature had a right to act." And the Court was then composed of Chief-Justice JONES, and Judges HOFFMAN and OAKLEY, distinguished lawyers and judges. Subsequently the decision will be regarded as authority. The doctrine has never been overruled.

The acts for the creation by the State of Boards of Commissioners to regulate the police force and to protect the public health are, more especially, matters of a public character, and some more clearly within the scope of State legislation. No police force for the city was created by the English charters. The acts of March 2, 1798, and of March 21, 1800, established a police force. And until October, of interfering with chartered provisions, the Legislature in creating the new Board was merely perfecting a system commenced by itself in accordance with that supreme power which the Constitution of 1777 asserted as belonging to the State at large, over the whole machinery of government within the State.

so many for the freight-masters. From their official cradle all these parties were bound by their own interests to serve the express company. And, as a matter of course, they did serve it. It soon became known to merchants that if they wanted their goods moved promptly and delivered undamaged they must not send them as freight by rail, but must employ an express company. The latter, which, through the assistance of its good friends in the railway direction, could move freight by rail much cheaper than private individuals, would carry a case of goods from New York to Buffalo or St. Louis for very little more than the regular railway freight charge, and would deliver it several days sooner. If A. of Cincinnati ordered his goods from New York by rail, while his rival B. ordered his by express, A. had the pleasure of seeing his rival's goods arrive a week before the tardy railway freight made its appearance. It was the interest of every railway official in the country to compel shippers to employ the express companies. This was, of course, to the detriment of the railways; but it is only very lately that railway officials have had any interest in the roads they have controlled.

In those days express stocks were like Panama or Mexican bank shares. They were hardly ever offered for sale. Occasionally somebody died or failed, and a whisper went round that he had "some Adams," whereupon covers of rich men were retracted by the count from miles around. To have "some Adams" was a guarantee of financial supereminence.

As must have been expected, the directors of the express companies could not resist the temptation of supplying so very pressing a demand. All being private companies, there was no legal limitation to the amount of stock which each might issue. They tried the market gradually at first. A million of Adams was swallowed without overloading the financial stomach. Then another. And another. The American followed suit, and so did the United States. The market was fed with discreet hand, and an aggregate of some $2,500,000—mining representing goodwill, not property—were actually swelled to nearly thirty millions, of which no less than ten millions represented the Adams property alone. "How is it," said a recent traveler, "that I never meet a railway director who is worth less than a million?" He didn't understand the express mystery.

But darker days were coming. The owners of a good placer in Australia took the life of any man who found them out prematurely. The express placer was found out, but Messrs. Desmond & Co. had too much respect for the law to take the finder's life. He forthwith set up a rival company called the Bankers' Express. It flourished, as the word is, but quietly subsided. Only the knowing ones were aware that the three great companies had bought off their rival by reimbursing all his outlay, and paying him a bonus of one hundred per cent.

So brilliant a success naturally led to imitations. The projectors of the Bankers' Express no sooner realized a hundred per cent. on that enterprise than they started the Merchants' Union with twenty millions capital. This interloper was resisted for over a year with sword and lance, on land and by horse, in the cars and in the courts. But the new men won their trade, and held fast. They paid up (or are said to have paid up, for these matters are misty) eleven millions dollars, and the old companies came to terms, resigning to the Merchants' Union 29½ per cent. of the total express business of the country.

The victory thus won, the same men are now understood to be at work organizing a new rival—to be established in New England, and, of course, to be bought off like its predecessor.

But a new danger looms on the horizon. Men have arisen who believe that railroad stocks may be made something better than Wall Street shuffle-cocks, and who, although directors of railways, actually undertake to administer their trust in the interest of their constituents. Commodore Vanderbilt has obtained control of the Harlem and Hudson Rivers lines, and secures contracts with express companies, made them pay as much as other people, and undertook to carry freight for the public as promptly as they could. This was alarming, intolerable; so frightful, in fact, that the American Company actually bought forty or fifty thousand shares of New York Central for the purpose of getting a backer of its own to control that road. It succeeded, and the new board fulfilled its destiny by making contracts with the express companies for five years. At the end of the year the new Board went out, and the terrible Commodore went in. What he will do remains to be seen. But there is a man who says that the Commodore doesn't think much of the five-years' contracts; that Mr. Fargo, as Vice-President of the Central, could make it very uncomfortable with Mr. Fargo the expressman; and that some fine morning, in the gray dawn, the express freight will be "forgotten" at every station on the New York Central; that there is no reason why the railroads, or his roads at least, should not do their own express business, and still less why his stockholders should be mulcted to pay income on thirty-five millions of imaginary express capital. And there is another man who says the Commodore's views do not differ in the least from those which are likely to prevail on the roads running west from Toledo to the wilderness, and controlled by Mr. Keep.

The Old Man of the Mountain hung on Sinbad's neck for a terrible time; but when his sailor did shake him off he finished him outright.

TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.

Senator Sprague, who can not be suspected of any Democratic free-trader, says that "we have taxed out of existence many interests which made us a prosperous people." And the Senator, who is one of the largest manufacturers of cotton cloth in the country, further says that it is a question whether cotton can now be called an existing interest! That is an astounding assertion, and it would unfortunately extravagant. Still we might endure the loss of cotton and the cotton trade. But if we heavily tax the intelligence of the country; if we impose vast burdens upon popular education; if we stop the printing-press, we shall have laid our destructive hands upon the very source of our national power and prosperity.

Intelligence is the corner-stone of a free government. Cheap literature is a vital necessity of our progress and welfare. Whatever, therefore, increases the cost of books and so diminishes the chances of their universal diffusion encourages popular ignorance; and the law that discriminates against the native author strikes at the entire literature which, as the true expression of our national life and character, is the most important of all. This is what our present laws do. They operate against our own highest interest. They discriminate in favor of American literary industry; and a change is absolutely necessary to secure to citizens of the United States in their own country the same rights that are guaranteed to Englishmen by the recent postal convention and secured to them by tariff regulations. At this moment printing paper (such as is used at the Harper Press), which may be considered a raw material, pays a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem; while the same paper with the addition of the labor of press-work and binding, and made into a book, pays but 25 per cent. duty ad valorem. And not only is the raw material for the American publisher thus disproportionately taxed, but he is positively prohibited by law from sending by mail through the United States books above a certain weight, while similar English books are sent free to any point. Such are the absurd and iniquitous thoughtlessness and ignorance with which the tariff is framed.

We are glad to say that the new postal convention with Great Britain establishes certain reduced rates of postage which will be gratefully accepted by the public. But it seems to have been carelessly framed by reference to existing laws in this country, and therefore inflicts a very great injury upon American trade and enterprise. Indeed, in some respects, the postal convention seems to have been framed in the special interest of English publishers. The new convention provides that the postage on all books-packets sent between the two countries shall be at the rate of six cents for every four ounces; that the packages may be two feet in length, one foot in width or depth; and that such matter shall be delivered at the destination free of charge. A printed invoice of the book-packets or samples may be affixed, and the names of the publisher or merchant who sends them as well as of the person to whom they are addressed may be superscribed in writing.

Now, by the Postal Laws of the United States, the weight of a book-packet sent from any point of the States must not exceed four pounds; if it does it is charged postage at letter rates. It is charged at the same letter rates if there be any writing upon the envelope except the address of the person to whom it is sent. Thus, a package which might weigh twenty pounds may, under the new convention, be sent from London to New York for $4 80; while under our present postal law it would cost $19 20 to send it from New York to Newark. A resident of Omaha or San Francisco may thus buy and receive from London a Latham's Johnson's English Dictionary, weighing ten pounds, for about one-half what a Webster's Dictionary sent from Springfield would cost him!

Again, our customs officers are not permitted to examine parcels received from England, although they are permitted to examine them here. By the terms of the convention, also, "no charges whatever shall be levied in the country in which international newspapers, book-packets and patterns, or samples of merchandise are delivered." It is easy, therefore, to drive a profitable free-trade in dutiable articles. One boot may be sent across the Atlantic as a sample by this mail, and its mate by the next. Pattern horse-shoes may be sent, as they actually have been, and at less cost than if they had paid regular freight, charges and duty added. And these are to be delivered at their destination free of charge.

All that we ask is a fair chance for American industry and enterprise, and that foreign manufactures shall not be positively preferred by law to domestic interests. The anomalies and absurdities that we have mentioned demand a swift remedy from Congress. For it is this incessant chafing of unfair regulations at a thousand points which at last irritates the most patient and reasonable citizen into active hostility to the party which has the power of redress but will not use it. Every honest man is willing to pay his share of the present heavy taxes, for he knows the great advantages which they have secured to him in the salvation of the government; but he has the right to demand that those taxes be honestly and equally levied, and he will justly condemn as fatal a policy which enriches foreigners at his expense.

THE ASPECTS OF TRADE.

The New Year opens gloomily. The general aspect of business throughout the country is not encouraging. The evidence of the manufacturers in convention at Cleveland, the candid testimony of such representative men as Governor Seward at Rhode Island, the grievous complaints that come from the South, the universal dissatisfaction at the West, the persistent clamor for a revision of the tariff and modification of the internal revenue laws, the frequent suspensions and failures of business firms, the discharge of workmen and the reduction of wages, all point to the universal depression that exists. New England especially suffers from those very protective measures which she once so earnestly encouraged, and the leading journals of Massachusetts are clamorous in the utterance of grievous complaints. The speculaties of New England skilled labor, which were in the seventies a wealth to the capitalist and of rapid accumulation in short time since, are now a drug in the market and a drug upon those who are compelled to "carry" them. Upon no other section has the depreciation in prices fallen so heavily. Take, for example, the single item of printing cloths, as shown in the annual pamphlet for the city of Providence: The price of 64 x 64 yard sheets, which at the beginning of 1861 was 4¾ cents, rising to 27 cents in 1865, has now dropped to 6¾ cents currency, or about 5 cents gold, as of 1861. That hundred interests have suffered in like ratio is shown by the fact of a reduction of nearly $1,000,000 in manufacturing dividends for the six months ending January 1st, 1868. Losses equally serious are entailed upon the commercial classes by the stagnation in trade and shrinkage in merchandise values. No better index of the state of trade is afforded than the withdrawal of the Cunard steamers from the port of Boston for the lack of support.

These losses will not be apply, though in somewhat less degree, to the Middle States; and the situation is rendered still more severe and trying by the depressed condition of our foreign commerce and its dependent interests. Indeed, ship-building and all kinds of shipping sympathize with the general condition of trade. No wonder that the owners' profits have been small, or that business failures have been more numerous than at any period other than one of actual panic.

It may, perhaps, be regarded an anomaly that breadstuffs alone do not share in the depreciation or nearly all descriptions of products. This fact, however, is shown by comparing the prices of various articles in each of the past four years. The decline in many articles of consumption is as great as that in dry goods; but as regards the staples of life, the laborer who are thrown out of employment or who are working on short time or at reduced wages, have to pay nearly as much as ever. Hence the distress that bears so heavily upon this class of the population. The New Year dawned gloomily upon thousands of workmen and operatives, whom the closing mills had helped to discharge and calamity fell no less heavily upon the factory operatives of New England than upon the iron workers of Pennsylvania.

The number of copartnership dissolutions on the first of the year has been unusually large. The withdrawal of special partners is noticeable. The profits of the past two years have induced them to withdraw the remnant of their capital and invest it in more secure places. Terms which have barely sustained themselves above the waves of financial embarrassment think it wiser to dissolve and do nothing than to risk their fraction of remaining capital in the experiment. Much of the money thus withdrawn is put into real estate, which, as respects the large commercial centres of the East and West, is still active and in request at advancing prices, at the same time, many new partnerships are formed, which have this advantage, that they commence business when prices are low, with the chances of immediate or prospective improvement.

It is not our wish to create despondency by the presentation of gloomy pictures. Though the situation be far from satisfactory, it must not be regarded as hopeless by any means. It is not in the nature of our people to despair or shrink from the burdens they have to bear. The worst period has unquestionably passed. The losses upon sales the past year have not been as insistent as during a portion of its predecessor. At the same time enough has been sacrificed to teach caution; and caution is one long step in the direction of healthy trade. Now has every branch of industry been paralyzed. If manufacturing companies have passed their dividends or been compelled to accept a pittance of profits, the deficiency is more than made up by the earnings of railroads and miscellaneous companies. The railroads seem lately to have happened upon an era of better management and closer economy, so that some lines long established now pay dividends for the first time. Nor is the case of the steamboat interest altogether hopeless or beyond retrieve. We regard the troubles there as more in the anticipation of possible short crops than of actual present distress. Still, the situation is desperate, and needs remedy. Timely aid, if not absolutely indispensable to existence, would be of inestimable service. The proposed to load planters the credit of the Government is feasible, and not without precedent. A similar plan worked well in 1830-31, and it is practicable now. The discovery in those years that cotton could be raised more cheaply in the Valley of the Mississippi than in the Atlantic States caused a great speculative excitement, which was fostered by the struggle that took place between the National Bank and the Federal Government. The planters who migrated to the new districts were obliged to mortgage their estates and their negroes, and these mortgages having been deposited with bank capital under State charters, State loans were issued in aid of them. These loans were to a considerable extent negotiated through the United States Bank, and the planters got plenty for their cotton to the lenders. The speculation subsided in 1834, leaving a very healthy state of affairs. The South needs time, money, energy, and a systematized plan of labor. Congressional legislation can do a great deal toward effecting this relief. And when through prosperity, the South shall take the rank which it formerly held as a cotton-producer, it will be found that the shipping interest will have also revived; for statistics of past years prove that Northern shipping has always been, to a great extent, dependent upon the Southern staple.

A WORD FROM LABOULAYE.

M. Laboulaye is so honored and beloved in this country for his intelligent comprehension of our late terrible struggle and his eloquent presentation of the interests of free society, which were involved in it, that his views of the present situation are particularly interesting. In a late private letter he says:

"I can not believe in the repudiation of your debt. The measure is too palpably unjust, and it would plunge the whole country in America to be popular. The Democrats may feel their way by such propositions, but it is difficult for me to imagine that they can succeed.

"I see, with more concern, that there is a disposition to make the blacks a separate caste, and to establish two nations in America, one of which is to be free because they have white skins, and the other serfs because they have colored skins. This is to lose the result of the war, and to sow the seed of fresh divisions. The aristocracy of the South will reconstruct itself with the political serfdom of the blacks, and the struggle between the North and the South will begin again. In ten years' time, then, will so much blood have been already shed?"

RECONSTRUCTION

General E. O. C. Ord has been relieved of the command of the Fourth Military District, by General Sickles, and General Pope of the Third District by General Meade. Since the original appointments, changes are made in Virginia, four of the nine military commanders of the Southern States have been relieved from duty. Rescinding other removals ordered by him which will hardly meet with general approval, is that of General Wagner Swayne from the charge of the Freedmen's Bureau in Alabama.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S SAFETY.

Positive advices from Africa were received in London on January 8, announcing the safety of Dr. David Livingstone. African explorers will remember Dr. Cadwe savages was announced in March, 1867. Dr. Livingstone has been in the interior of Africa on his present trip for over eighteen months. If he has crossed the continent, as he designed doing, in safety, it will be a perfected information of that strange country which will be invaluable to science.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

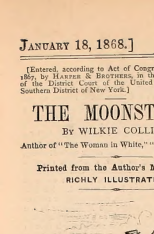
Turkey has at length become frightened at the solitude of Russia, and is trying to form a general incorporation among the Sultan's Christian subjects, and diplomatists have been sent to England and France to ask aid from those powers in the shape of a protest against Russian interference in the Cretan quarrel.

FIRST AND SECOND FLOOR.

If there remains any young bachelor not convinced of the evil of his ways, or not forewarned of the miseries in store for him if he persists therein by the pencil which we give to-day, we lose for this year of "The Bachelor's Dinner," let him study our engraving on page 36. If he does not then tremble at the prospect before him he is incorrigible, and must be left to his deserved fate of solitary dinners and childless hearth.

Readers will have no trouble in locating the scene of our engraving. There are dozens of hotels and thousands of houses in the country where such incidents as are therein portrayed occur every day. Crusty old bachelors frequently find themselves lodged in apartments immediately below those of a merry family like that which we illustrate; and the romp above generally resolves in a sequel below such as is here portrayed.

FIRST AND SECOND FLOORS—A STUDY FOR BACHELORS.—[SEE PAGE 35.]



[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.
RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER VI.

KEEPING my private sentiments to myself, I respectfully requested Mr. Franklin to go on. Mr. Franklin replied, "Don't fidget, Betteredge," and went on.

Our young gentleman's first words informed me that his discoveries, concerning the wicked Colonel and the Diamond, had begun with a visit which he had paid (before he came to us) to his father's lawyer at Hampstead. A chance word dropped by Mr. Franklin, when the two were alone, one day, after dinner, revealed that he had been charged by his father with a birthday present to be taken to Miss Rachel. One thing led to another; and it ended in the lawyer mentioning what the present really was, and how the friendly connection between the late Colonel and Mr. Blake, Senior, had taken its rise. The facts here are really so extraordinary that I doubt if I can trust my own language to do justice to them. I prefer trying to report Mr. Franklin's discoveries, as nearly as may be, in Mr. Franklin's own words.

"You remember the time, Betteredge," he said, "when my father was trying to prove his title to that unlucky Dukedom? Well! that was also the time when my uncle Herncastle returned from India. My father discovered that his brother-in-law was in possession of certain papers which were likely to be of service to him in his lawsuit. He called on the Colonel, on pretense of welcoming him back to England. The Colonel was not to be deluded in that way. 'You want something,' he said, 'or you would never have compromised your reputation by calling on me.' My father saw the one chance for him was to show his hand: he admitted, at once, that he wanted the papers. The Colonel asked for a day to consider his answer. His answer came in the shape of a most extraordinary letter, which my friend the lawyer showed me. The Colonel began by saying that he wanted something of my father, and that he begged to propose an exchange of friendly services between them. The fortune of war (that was the expression he used) had placed him in possession of one of the largest Diamonds in the world; and he had reason to believe that neither he nor his precious jewel was safe in any house, in any quarter of the globe, which they occupied together. Under these alarming circumstances he had determined to place his Diamond in the keeping of another person. That person was not expected to run any risk. He might deposit the precious stone in any place especially guarded and set apart—like a banker's or jeweler's strong-room—for the safe custody of valuables of high price. His main personal responsibility in the matter was to be of the passive kind. He was to undertake—either by himself, or by a trustworthy representative—to receive at a pre-arranged address, on certain pre-arranged days in every year, a note from the Colonel, simply stating the fact that he was a living man at that date. In the event of the date passing over without the note being received, the Colonel's silence might be taken as a sure token of the Colonel's death by murder. In that case, and in no other, certain sealed instructions relating to the disposal of the Diamond, and deposited with it, were to be opened, and followed implicitly. If my father chose to accept this strange charge, the Colonel's papers were at his disposal in return. That was the letter."

"What did your father do, Sir?" I asked.

"Do?" says Mr. Franklin. "I'll tell you what he did. He brought the invaluable faculty called common-sense to bear on the Colonel's letter. The whole thing, he declared, was simply absurd. Somewhere in his Indian wanderings the Colonel had picked up with some wretched crystal which he took for a diamond. As for the danger of his being murdered, and the precautions devised to preserve his life and his piece of crystal, this was the nineteenth century, and any man in his senses had only to apply to the police. The Colonel had been a notorious opium-eater for years past; and, if the only way of getting at the valuable papers he possessed was by accepting a matter of opium as a matter of fact, my father was quite willing to take the ridiculous responsibility imposed upon him—all the more readily that it involved no trouble to himself. The Diamond and the sealed instructions went into his banker's strong-room, and the Colonel's letters, periodically reporting him a living man, were received and opened by the lawyer, as my father's representative. No sensible person, in a similar position, could have viewed the matter in any other way. Nothing in this world, Betteredge, is probable unless it appeals to our own trumpery experience; and we only believe in a romance when we see it in a newspaper."

It was plain to me from this, that Mr. Franklin thought his father's notion about the Colonel hasty and wrong.

"What is your own private opinion about the matter, Sir?" I asked.

"Let's finish the story of the Colonel first," says Mr. Franklin. "There is a curious want of system, Betteredge, in the English mind; and your question, my old friend, is an instance of it. When we are not occupied in making machinery, we are (mentally speaking) the most slovenly people in the universe."

"So much," I thought to myself, "for a foreign education! He has learned that way of giving at us in France, I suppose."

Mr. Franklin took up the lost thread, and went on.

"My father," he said, "got the papers he wanted, and never saw his brother-in-law again, from that time. Year after year, on the pre-arranged days, the pre-arranged letter came from the Colonel, and was opened by the lawyer. I have seen the letters, in a heap, all of them written in the same brief, business-like form of words: 'Sir,—This is to certify that I am still a living man. Let the Diamond be. John Herncastle.' That was all he ever wrote, and that came regularly to the day; until some six or eight months

"HE GAVE ME THE EXTRACT FROM THE COLONEL'S WILL."

"HIS WILL BEGAN AND ENDED IN THREE CLAUSES."

since, when the form of the letter varied for the first time. It ran now: "Sir,—They tell me I am dying. Come to me, and help me to make my will." The lawyer went, and found him, in the little suburban villa, surrounded by its own grounds, in which he had lived alone ever since he had left India. He had dogs, cats, and birds to keep him company; but no human being near him, except the person who came daily to do the housework, and the doctor at the bedside. The will was a very simple matter. The Colonel had dissipated the greater part of his fortune in his chemical investigations. His will began and ended in three clauses, which he dictated from his bed, in perfect possession of his faculties. The first clause provided for the safe-keeping and support of his animals. The second founded a professorship of experimental chemistry at a northern university. The third bequeathed the Moonstone as a birthday present to his niece, on condition that my father would act as executor. My father at first refused to act. On second thoughts, however, he gave way, partly because he was assured that the executorship would involve him in no trouble; partly because the lawyer suggested, in Rachel's interest, that the Diamond might be worth something, after all."

"Did the Colonel give any reason, Sir," I inquired, "why he left the Diamond to Miss Rachel?"

"He not only gave the reason—he had the reason written in his will," said Mr. Franklin. "I have got an extract, which you shall see presently. Don't be slovenly-minded, Betteredge! One thing at a time. You have heard about the Colonel's Will; now you must hear what happened after the Colonel's death. It was formally necessary to have the Diamond valued, before the Will could be proved. All the jewelers consulted, at once confirmed the Colonel's assertion that he possessed one of the largest diamonds in the world. The question of accurately valuing it presented some serious difficulties. Its size made it a phenomenon in the diamond-market; its color placed it in a category by itself; and, to add to these elements of uncertainty, there was a defect, in the shape of a flaw, in the very heart of the stone. Even with this last serious drawback, however, the lowest of the various estimates given was twenty thousand pounds. Conceive my father's astonishment! He had been within a hair's-breadth of refusing to act as executor, and of allowing this magnificent jewel to be lost to the family. The interest he took in the matter now induced him to open the sealed instructions which had been deposited with the Diamond. The lawyer showed this document to me, with the other papers; and it suggests (to my mind) a clew to the nature of the conspiracy which threatened the Colonel's life."

"Then you do believe, Sir," I said, "that there was a conspiracy?"

"Not possessing my father's excellent common-sense," answered Mr. Franklin, "I believe the Colonel's life was threatened, exactly as the Colonel said. The sealed instructions, as I think, explain how it was that he died, after all, quietly in his bed. In the event of his death by violence (that is to say, in the absence of the regular letter from him at the appointed date), my father was then directed to send the Moonstone secretly to Amsterdam. It was to be deposited in that city with a famous diamond-cutter, and it was to be cut up into from four to six separate stones. The stones were then to be sold for what they would fetch, and the proceeds were to be applied to the founding of the professorship of experimental chemistry which the Colonel has since endowed by his Will. Now, Betteredge, exert those shrewd wits of yours, and observe the conclusion to which this Colonel's instructions point!"

I instantly exerted my wits. They were of the slovenly English sort; and they consequently muddled it all until Mr. Franklin took them in hand, and pointed out what they ought to see.

"Remark," says Mr. Franklin, "that the integrity of the Diamond, as a whole stone, is here artfully made dependent on the preservation from violence of the Colonel's life. He is not satisfied with saying to the enemies he dreads, 'Kill me—and you will be no nearer to the Diamond than you are now; it is where you can't get at it—in the guarded strong-room of a bank.' He says instead, 'Kill me—and the Diamond will be the Diamond no longer; its identity will be destroyed.' What does that mean?"

Here I had (as I thought) a flash of the wonderful foreign brightness.

"I know!" I said. "It means lowering the value of the stone, and cheating the rogues in that way!"

"Nothing of the sort," says Mr. Franklin. "I have inquired about that. The flawed Diamond, cut up, would actually fetch more than the Diamond as it now is; for this plain reason—that from four to six perfect stones might be cut from it, which would be, collectively, worth more money than the large—but imperfect—single stone. If robbery for the purpose of gain was at the bottom of the conspiracy, the Colonel's instructions absolutely made the Diamond better worth stealing. More money could have been got for it, and the disposal of it in the diamond-market would have been infinitely easier if it had passed through the hands of the workmen of Amsterdam."

"Lord bless us, Sir!" I burst out. "What was the object then?"

"A plot organized among the Indians who originally owned the jewel," says Mr. Franklin —"a plot with some old Hindoo superstition at the bottom of it. That is my opinion, confirmed by a family paper which I have about me at this moment."

I saw now why the appearance of the three Indian jugglers at our house had upsetted itself in Mr. Franklin in the light of a circumstance worth noting.

"I don't want to force my opinion on you," Mr. Franklin went on. "The idea of certain chosen servants of an old Hindoo superstition devoting themselves, through all difficulties and dangers, to watching the opportunity of recovering their sacred gem, appears to me to be perfectly consistent with every thing that we know of the patience of Oriental races, and the influence of Oriental religions. But then I am an unimaginative man; and the butcher, the baker, and the tax-gatherer, are not the only credible realities in existence to my mind. Let the guess at have made at the truth in this matter go for what it is worth, and let us get on to the only practical question that concerns us. Does the conspiracy against the Moonstone survive the Colonel's death? And did the Colonel know it, when he left the birthday gift to his niece?"

I began to see my lady and Miss Rachel at the end of it all, now. Not a word he said escaped me.

"I was not very willing, when I discovered the story of the Moonstone," said Mr. Franklin, "to be the means of bringing it here. But my friend, the lawyer, reminded me that somebody must put my cousin's legacy into my cousin's hands—and that I might as well do it as any body else. After taking the Diamond out of the bank I fancied I was followed in the streets by a shabby, dark-complexioned man. I went to my father's house to pick up my luggage, and found a letter there, which unexpectedly detained me in London. I went back to the bank with the Diamond, and thought I saw the shabby man again. Taking the Diamond once more out of the bank this morning, I saw the man for the third time, gave him the slip, and started (before he recovered the trace of me) by the morning instead of the afternoon train. Here I am, with the Diamond safe and sound—and what is the first news that meets me? I find that three strolling Indians have been at the house, and that my arrival from London, and something which I am expected to have about me, are two special objects of investigation to them when they believe themselves to be alone. I don't waste time and words on their pouring the ink into the boy's hand, and telling him to look in it for a man at a distance, and for something in that man's pocket. The thing (which I have often seen done in the East) is 'hocus-pocus' in my opinion, as it is in yours. The present question for us to decide is whether I am wrongly attaching a meaning to a mere accident? or whether we really have evidence of the Indians being on the track of the Moonstone, the moment it is removed from the safe-keeping of the bank?"

Neither he nor I seemed to fancy dealing with this part of the inquiry. We looked at each other, and then we looked at the tide, oozing in smoothly, higher and higher, over the Shivering Sand.

"What are you thinking of?" says Mr. Franklin, suddenly.

"I was thinking, Sir," I answered, "that I should like to shy the Diamond into the quicksand, and settle the question in that way."

"If you have got the value of the stone in your pocket," answered Mr. Franklin, "say so, Betteredge, and in it goes!"

It's curious to note, when your mind's anxious, how very far in the way of relief a very small joke will go. We found a fund of merriment, at the time, in the notion of making away with Miss Rachel's lawful property, and getting Mr. Blake, as executor, into dreadful trouble—though where the merriment was I am quite at a loss to discover now.

Mr. Franklin was the first to bring the talk back to the talk's proper purpose. He took an envelope out of his pocket, opened it, and handed to me the paper inside.

"Betteredge," he said, "we must face the question of the Colonel's motive in leaving this legacy to his niece for my aunt's sake. Bear in mind how Lady Verinder treated her brother from the time when he returned to England, to the time when he told you he should remember his niece's birthday. And read that."

He gave me the extract from the Colonel's Will. I have got it by me while I write these words; and I copy it, as follows, for your benefit:

"Thirdly, and lastly, I give and bequeath to my niece, Rachel Verinder, daughter and only child of my sister, Julia Verinder, widow, the yellow Diamond belonging to me, and known in the East by the name of The Moonstone—subject to this condition, that her mother, the said Julia Verinder, shall be living at the time. And I hereby desire my executor, in that event, to give my Diamond, either by his own hands or by the hands of some trustworthy representative whom he shall appoint, into the personal possession of my said niece Rachel, on her next birthday after my death, and in the presence of my sister, the said Julia Verinder. And furthermore, I desire also that my sister, as aforesaid, may be informed, by means of a true copy of this, the third and last clause of my Will, that I give the Diamond to her daughter Rachel, in token of my free forgiveness of the injury which her conduct toward me has been the means of inflicting on my reputation in my lifetime; and especially in proof that I pardon, as becomes a dying man, the insult offered to me as an officer and a gentleman, when her servant, by her orders, closed the door of her house against me, on the occasion of her daughter's birthday."

More words followed these, providing, if my lady was dead, or if Miss Rachel was dead, at the time of the testator's decease, for the Diamond being sent to Holland, in accordance with the sealed instructions originally deposited with it. The proceeds of the sale were, in that case, to be added to the money already left by the Will for the professorship of chemistry at the university in the north.

I handed the paper back to Mr. Franklin, sorely troubled what to say to him. Up to that moment my own opinion had been (as you know) that the Colonel had died as wickedly as he had lived. I don't say the copy from his Will actually converted me from that opinion: I only say it staggered me.

"Well," says Mr. Franklin, "now you have read the Colonel's own statement, what do you say? In bringing the Moonstone to my aunt's house, am I serving his vengeance blindfold, or am I vindicating him in the character of a penitent and Christian man?"

"It seems hard to say, Sir," I answered, "that he died with a horrid revenge in his heart, and a horrid lie on his lips. God alone knows the truth. Don't ask me."

Mr. Franklin sat twisting and turning the extract from the Will in his fingers, as if he expected to squeeze the truth out of it in that manner. He altered quite remarkably at the same time. From being brisk and bright, he now became, most unaccountably, a slow, solemn, and pondering young man.

"This question has two sides," he said. "An Objective side, and a Subjective side. Which are we to take?"

He had had a German education as well as a French. One of the two had been in undisturbed possession of him (as I supposed) up to this time. And now (as well as I could make out) the other was taking its place. It is one of my rules in life never to notice what I don't understand. I steered a middle course between the Objective side and the Subjective side. In plain English, I stared hard and said nothing.

"Let's extract the inner meaning of this," says Mr. Franklin. "Why did my uncle leave the Diamond to Rachel? Why didn't he leave it to my aunt?"

"That's not beyond guessing, Sir, at any rate," I said. "Colonel Herncastle knew my lady well enough to know that she would have refused to accept any legacy that came to her from him."

"How did he know that Rachel might not refuse to accept it, too?"

"Is there any young lady in existence, Sir, who could resist the temptation of accepting such a birthday present as The Moonstone?"

"That's the Subjective view," says Mr. Franklin. "It does you great credit, Betteredge, to be able to take the Subjective view. But there's another mystery about the Colonel's legacy which is not accounted for yet. How are we to explain his only giving Rachel her birthday present conditionally on her mother being alive?"

"I don't want to slander a dead man, Sir," I answered. "But if he has purposely left a legacy of trouble and danger to his sister, by the means of her child, it must be a legacy made conditional on his sister's being alive to feel the vexation of it."

"Oh! That's your interpretation of his motive, is it? The Subjective interpretation again! Have you ever been in Germany, Betteredge?"

"No, Sir. What's your interpretation, if you please?"

"I can see," says Mr. Franklin, "that the Colonel's object may, quite possibly, have been—not to benefit his niece, whom he had never even seen—but to prove to his sister that he had died forgiving her, and to prove it very prettily by means of a present made to her child. There is a totally different explanation from yours, Betteredge, taking its rise in a Subjective-Objective point of view. From all I can see, one interpretation is just as likely to be right as the other."

Having brought matters to this pleasant and comforting issue, Mr. Franklin appeared to think that he had completed all that was required of him. He laid down flat on his back on the sand, and asked what was to be done next.

He had been so clever and clear-headed (before he began to talk the foreign gibberish), and had so completely taken the lead in the business up to the present time, that I was quite unprepared for such a sudden change as he now exhibited in this helpless leaning upon me. It was not till later that I learned—by assistance of Miss Rachel, who was the first to make the discovery—that these puzzling shifts and transformations in Mr. Franklin were due to the effect on him of his foreign training. At the age when we are all of us most apt to take our coloring, in the form of a reflection from the coloring of other people, he had been sent abroad, and had been passed on, from one nation to another, before there was time for any one coloring more than another to settle itself on him firmly. As a consequence of this, he had come back with so many different sides to his character, all more or less unfinished, and all more or less jarring with each other, that he seemed to pass his life in a state of perpetual contradiction with himself. He could be a busy man, and a lazy man; cloudy in the head, and clear in the head; a model of determination, and a spectacle of helplessness, all together. He had his French side, and his German side, and his Italian side—the original English foundation showing through, every now and then, as much as to say, "Here I am, sorely transmogrified, as you see, but there's something of me left at the bottom of him still." Miss Rachel used to remark that the Italian side of him was uppermost on those occasions when he unexpectedly gave in and asked you, in his nice, sweet-tempered way, to take his own responsibilities on your shoulders. You will do him no injustice, I think, if you conclude that the Italian side of him was uppermost now.

"Isn't it your business, Sir," I asked, "to know what to do next? Surely it can't be mine!"

Mr. Franklin did not appear to see the force of my question—not being in a position at the time to see any thing but the sky over his head.

"I don't want to alarm my aunt without reason," he said. "And I don't want to leave her without what may be a needful warning. If you were in my place, Betteredge, tell me, in one word, what would you do?"

In one word I told him: "Wait."

"With all my heart," says Mr. Franklin. "How long?"

I proceeded to explain myself.

"As I understand it, Sir," I said, "somebody is bound to put this plaguy Diamond into Miss Rachel's hands on her birthday—and you may as well do it as another. Very good. This is the twenty-fifth of May, and the birthday is on the twenty-first of June. We have got close on four weeks before us. Let's wait and see what happens in that time; and let's warn my lady or not, as the circumstances direct us."

"Perfect, Betteredge, as far as it goes!" says Mr. Franklin. "But, between this and the birthday, what's to be done with the Diamond?"

"What your father did with it, to be sure, Sir!" I answered. "Your father put it in the safe-keeping of a bank in London. You put it in the safe-keeping of the bank at Frizinghall." (Frizinghall was our nearest town, and the Bank of England wasn't safer than the bank there.) "If I were you, Sir," I added, "I would ride straight away with it to Frizinghall before the ladies come back."

The prospect of doing something—and, what is more, of doing that something on a horse—brought Mr. Franklin up like lightning from the flat of his back. He sprang to his feet, and pulled me up, without ceremony, on to mine. "Betteredge, you are worth your weight in gold," he said. "Come along, and saddle the best horse in the stables directly!"

Here (God bless it!) was the original English foundation of him showing through all the foreign varnish at last! Here was the Master Franklin I remembered, coming out again in the good old way at the prospect of a ride, and reminding me of the good old times! Saddle a horse for him? I would have saddled a dozen horses if he could only have ridden them all!

We went back to the house in a hurry; we had the fleetest horse in the stables saddled in a hurry; and Mr. Franklin rattled off in a hurry, to lodge the cursed Diamond once more in the strong-room of a bank. When I heard the last of his horse's hoofs on the drive, and when I turned about in the yard and found I was alone again, I felt half inclined to ask myself if I hadn't woke up from a dream.

CHAPTER VII.

WHILE I was in this bewildered frame of mind, sorely needing a little quiet time by myself to put me right again, my daughter Penelope got in my way (just as her late mother used to get in my way on the stairs), and instantly summoned me to tell her all that had passed at the conference between Mr. Franklin and me. Under present circumstances, the one thing to be done was to clap the extinguisher upon Penelope's curiosity on the spot. I accordingly replied that Mr. Franklin and I had both talked of foreign politics till we could talk no longer, and had then mutually fallen asleep in the heat of the sun. Try that sort of answer when your wife or your daughter next worries you with an awkward question at an awkward time, and depend on the natural sweetness of women for kissing and making it up again at the next opportunity.

The afternoon wore on, and my lady and Miss Rachel came back.

Needless to say how astonished they were when they heard that Mr. Franklin Blake had arrived, and had gone off again on horseback. Needless also to say, that they asked awkward questions directly, and that the "foreign politics" and the "falling asleep in the sun" wouldn't serve a second time over with them. Being at the end of my invention, I said Mr. Franklin's arrival by the early train was entirely attributable to one of Mr. Franklin's freaks. Being asked, upon that, whether his galloping off again on horseback was another of Mr. Franklin's freaks, I said, "Yes, it was;" and slipped out of it—I think very cleverly—in that way.

Having got over my difficulties with the ladies, I found more difficulties waiting for me when I went back to my own room. In came Penelope—with the natural sweetness of women—to kiss and make it up again; and—with the natural curiosity of women—to ask another question. This time, she only wanted me to tell her what was the matter with our second house-maid, Rosanna Spearman.

After leaving Mr. Franklin and me at the Shivering Sand, Rosanna, it appeared, had returned to the house in a very unaccountable state of mind. She had turned (if Penelope was to be believed) all the colors of the rainbow. She had been merry without reason, and sad without reason. In one breath she had asked hundreds of questions about Mr. Franklin Blake, and in another breath she had been angry with Penelope for presuming to suppose that a strange gentleman could possess any interest for her. She had been surprised smiling, and scribbling Mr. Franklin's name inside her work-box. She had been surprised again crying, and looking at her deformed shoulder in the glass. Had she and Mr. Franklin known any thing of each other before to-day? Quite impossible! Had they heard any thing of each other? Impossible again! I could speak to Mr. Franklin's astonishment as genuine, when he saw how the girl stared at him. Penelope could speak to the girl's inquisitiveness as genuine, when she asked questions about Mr. Franklin. The conference between us, conducted in this way, was tiresome enough, until my daughter suddenly ended it by bursting out with what I thought the most monstrous supposition I had ever heard in my life.

"Father!" says Penelope, quite seriously, "there's only one explanation of it. Rosanna has fallen in love with Mr. Franklin Blake at first sight!"

You have heard of beautiful young ladies falling in love at first sight, and have thought it natural enough. But a house-maid out of a Reformatory, with a plain face and a deformed shoulder, falling in love, at first sight, with a gentleman who comes on a visit to her mistress's house, match me that, in the way of an absurdity, out of any story-book in Christendom, if you can! I laughed till the tears rolled down my cheeks. Penelope resented my merriment, in rather a strange way. "I never knew you cruel before, father," she said, very gently, and went out.

My girl's words fell on me like a splash of cold water. I was savage with myself, for feeling uneasy in myself the moment she had spoken them—but so it was. We will change the subject, if you please. I am sorry I drifted into writing about it, and not without reason, as you will see when we have gone on together a little longer.

The evening came, and the dressing-bell for dinner rang, before Mr. Franklin returned from Frizinghall. I took his hot water up to his room myself, expecting to hear, after this extraordinary delay, that something had happened. To my great disappointment (and no doubt to yours also), nothing had happened. He had not met with the Indians, either going or returning. He had deposited the Moonstone in the bank—describing it merely as a valuable of great price—and he had got the receipt for it safe in his pocket. I went down stairs, feeling that this was rather a flat ending, after all our excitement about the Diamond earlier in the day.

How the meeting between Mr. Franklin and his aunt and cousin went off is more than I can tell you.

I would have given something to have waited at table that day. But in my position in the household, waiting at dinner (except on high family festivals) was letting down my dignity in the eyes of the other servants—a thing which my lady considered me quite prone enough to do already without seeking occasions for it. The news brought to me from the upper regions that evening came from Penelope and the footman. Penelope mentioned that she had never known Miss Rachel so particular about the dressing of her hair, and had never seen her look so bright and pretty as she did when she went down to meet Mr. Franklin in the drawing-room. The footman's report was, that the preservation of a respectful composure in the presence of his betters, and the waiting on Mr. Franklin Blake at dinner, were two of the hardest things to reconcile with each other that had ever tried his training in service. Later in the evening we heard them singing and playing duets, Mr. Franklin piping high, Miss Rachel piping higher, and my lady, on the piano, following them, as it were, over hedge and ditch, and seeing them safe through it in a manner most wonderful and pleasant to hear through the open windows, on the terrace at night. Later still, I went to Mr. Franklin in the smoking-room, with the soda-water and brandy, and found that Miss Rachel had put the Diamond clean out of his head. "She's the most charming girl I have seen since I came back to England!" was all I could extract from him, when I endeavored to lead the conversation to more serious things.

Toward midnight I went round the house to lock up, accompanied by my second in command (Samuel, the footman), as usual. When all doors were made fast, except the side-door that opened on the terrace, I sent Samuel to bed and stepped out for a breath of fresh air before I too went to bed in my turn.

The night was still and close, and the moon was at the full in the heavens. It was so silent out of doors, that I heard from time to time, very faint and low, the fall of the sea, as the ground-swell heaved it in on the sand-bank near the mouth of our little bay. As the house stood, the terrace side was the dark side; but the broad moonlight showed fair on the gravel-walk that ran along the next side to the terrace. Looking this way, after looking up at the sky, I saw the shadow of a person in the moonlight thrown forward from behind the corner of the house.

Being old and sly, I forbore to call out; but, being also, unfortunately, old and heavy, my feet betrayed me on the gravel. Before I could steal suddenly round the corner, as I had proposed, I heard lighter feet than mine—and more than one pair of them, as I thought—retreating in a hurry. By the time I had got to the corner, the trespassers, whoever they were, had run into the shrubbery at the off side of the walk, and were hidden from sight among the thick trees and bushes in that part of the grounds. From the shrubbery they could easily make their way over our fence into the road. If I had been forty years younger I might have had a chance of catching them before they got clear of our premises. As it was, I went back to set a going a younger pair of legs than mine. Without disturbing any body, Samuel and I got a couple of guns and went all round the house and through the shrubbery. Having made sure that no persons were lurking about any where in our grounds, we turned back. Passing over the walk where I had seen the shadow, I now noticed, for the first time, a little bright object, lying on the clean gravel, under the light of the moon. Picking the object up, I discovered that it was a small bottle, containing a thick, sweet-smelling liquor, as black as ink.

I said nothing to Samuel. But, remembering what Penelope had told me about the jugglers, and the pouring of the little pool of ink into the palm of the boy's hand, I instantly suspected that I had disturbed the three Indians, lurking about the house, and bent, in their heathenish way, on discovering the whereabouts of the Diamond that night.

MY FIRST SPECULATION IN OIL.

I AM not a strong-minded woman, and very much prefer to lean on others and have the direction of my life taken entirely out of my hands. But I do like being independent of servants, so when I was left a widow with two small children and too small, not to say smaller, means, I determined on housekeeping, or rather, I should say, room-keeping, after this abominable over-crowded New York style, and heroically determined to be my own maid-of-all-work.

Naturally one of my first objects was to have something to cook by, and my fancy at once seized on a petroleum-stove, warranted, so ran the advertisement, "to burn any kind of oil"—it did not also add "and any quantity of that same." Where, thought I, could I find any thing simpler or more convenient? No coal to be carried up stairs; no ashes to be carried down, and no dust; petroleum thirty cents a gallon, and half a dozen patentees severally assuring me that their respective stoves would burn such incredibly small quantities of oil, that poor as I was, I was almost ashamed of such cheap warmth, and felt as if I could afford a respectable-sized carriage any time I chose. Here, thought I, is perfection. Cheap, and clean, and labor-saving—could any one desire more?

The great curse was to choose. The difficulty being that each patentee proved to me that his invention used just half as much fuel as the last one I had seen. As a woman, I was bound to believe him, my sex are so easily convinced; but as an encumbrance on arithmetic-class, it rather bothered me.

At last I pitched on the one that I saw in a shop in Broadway. This was not so small an army, but on the other hand it had an odd, spidery look that I took a fancy to. This odd look which I had would have been enough—I have a weakness for odd things and people—but the patentee at once decided me by a remark which happened to hit another of my weaknesses:

"Marm," said he, "if your room isn't terrible large, you'll be heated out of house and home by this 'ere stove."

This was the very thing for me. From long residence in the tropics I am a real chilly body. Even my mustache, to bring me to a realizing sense of my inquiries, had to suggest cold instead of heat as a probable final punishment. Too much warmth was the last thing to encourage me. On the spot, with a promptitude that half frightened myself, I decided to take the stove, but before ordering it I of course asked Mrs. Gray what his opinion was—not that I expected him to have any, he never has with me, and I had taken him for one, not for other purposes than for I generally follow my own; or protection, for I generally know how to take care of myself; not for company, for though Mrs. Gray is a very nice man, and sociable, and lively, and witty, in general society, he has a most unaccountable way with me; and though daily it is evident he is rather fond of me, he hasn't got the courage to say so. At least all my friends tell me he is in love with me, and that certainly does run about after me a good deal; he doesn't seem to know it himself, and certainly hasn't told me so in any plain-spoken way, but I suppose them; and there's nothing on earth so contemptible and stupid as my eyes as a timid lover. There! I don't care who knows my confessions.

So I wasn't much surprised when John Gray, in a stupid way, answered, when I asked his opinion about the stove, "If you like it, I don't see why it won't suit." I knew what was coming, and before he could drawl it out I had ordered home the stove.

When I came to pay for it, twenty dollars was a serious matter, but my steadfast soul never faltered. I knew the stove it was a good stove, but for a piece of perfection—all that a woman's heart could desire—it was nothing.

The morning came, and with it my purchase, and I remember thinking how beautiful both were. "Won't he be small from it at all," said the man, as he put the wick with a match. He had hardly done speaking when, beyond a question, I smelt something, which, if my stove had been any thing but a patent stove, I should have sworn was coal-oil. I ventured to hint my suspicions, but the man, with a preternatural calmness, which I believe to be part of the stove business, decided that I only smelt the varnish that is always put on new iron, you know. "Maybe you smell a kettle kerosene," he added, "for it spilt a few drops a-fillin' of the reservoy."

I thought I would decidedly prefer less than a few drops, and felt a vague misgiving that all was not just right, but again my faith triumphed, and I maintained a discreet silence, and determined to give the thing—already it was "the thing"—a fair trial.

I had work at home that afternoon, but there was also a little to be done away from home, and somehow amidst the smell of the varnish their always put on stoves, you know, the new patentee hair meter, which I had put off once or twice before, now struck me as having been unduly neglected, and altogether rather a pleasant thing to do. Coming home at dusk, I found the children with their noses and their tempers unnecessarily exercised by the prevailing varnish. The evening had turned chilly, and I found that I was by no means aggravated by the quantity or the quality of the heat. I filled up my stove, and raising the wick as high as I dared, I managed to make the room tolerably comfortable; but as the heat increased the smell and smoke increased in the same ratio, and our noses fairly ached with our constant sniffing. My daughter, who already had a bad cold and been coughing ever since, took to sneezing as well, and we were all very glad to go to bed early and sleep in blessed forgetfulness of all sensations in oil.

The next day found the stove not quite so unbearable, but still far from satisfactory. I looked at the stove, and found that as the hot air was burning oil I should expend, instead of the sixty cents a week (promised me by the patentees), about four times as much. The weather was pretty cool, and so were we—cooler than we could wish, but I could cook very successfully over my fire.

I worked nearly all day, with my head growing heavier and duller for the want of pure air; two or three times I opened the windows and cooled the room for the sake of being able to breathe. Three or four friends came in in the course of the day, but their visits were short, and I began to fear that the coolness of my room had spread to the manners of my friends. In the evening John Gray scraped and bowed his way into the room, excessively nervous and timid, and necessarily over-polite, insisting, as he did, on shaking hands all around two or three times before he shrunk into his usual sent in the corner, and lapsed into his usual stupid silence, leaving me to do all the talking. But before he had managed to get into his accustomed place, I think he must have detected the prevailing odor of oil or varnish, for he distinctly snuffed twice and I saw him glance at "that thing." But he didn't say any thing, and I thought it—was the trouble with the poor, stupid fellow; he could talk well enough to other women, could be pleasant enough to me when I chose to myself, were present, but he never had more than monosyllables for me when he was left to his own devices, and had won distinction in the war, but he hadn't the slightest particle of courage in my presence, and never managed to distinguish himself with me at all. On this occasion he lighted his cigar—I knew how fond he was of smoking, and I always provided him his lighter when he came —without once saying any thing about my purchase; and as I was conscious of at least a partial failure in my speculation, I refined altogether of other affairs. They couldn't have been very interesting, or the oil or varnish must have affected him more than I did me, for before he had hardly finished his cigar he rose to go. I looked at him in astonishment. I had never been able to get rid of him that is, he had not usually gone before half past ten of an evening before this—and I was a little provoked. In fact, I felt a very deal provoked, and I said, rather tartly:

"Well, you are as unsociable as my stove, and smoke as abominably. Why, because it smells to you, don't it? Well, I suppose the smell and the cold are no worse for you than for me."

He looked up and answered with more spirit than I had given him credit for.

"Mrs. Gray, if you don't want your friends to stay, you must find some other method of warming your room than with that thing (strong emphasis on "thing"). Though I'm a copper-lined man, and fastened," and he left.

"Well," I said to myself, "I am indebted to the stove for one thing, that is, I had supposed at his some little sense left;" and I turned off the confounded wick and went to bed to keep warm.

Next day was no better, and I grew cruelly with vexation. Here was having perfection with a vengeance—losing all my friends for a stupid old stove. I got quite into the paternal line, I might learn what was the matter. He came—a very bland and smiling gentleman, with the preternatural calmness before mentioned, a pair of gold spectacles, and very dirty hands. He seemed, too, to have caught something of the oiliness of the stove, for his cloth and was inclined to smooth over every thing. In fact, from his extreme glibness, I was very likely to discredit him. I must own, however, that I was in a general state of mistrust, owing to the unfortunate end of my interview with the night before, and I was only the arrival of Mr. Gray, timid as ever, to inquire if he could do any thing for me down town, that removed my suspicions from him and took off the mental blue spectacles through which I had been seeing every thing.

I saw at a glance that the man was a regular "Yankee."

I stated the case to him, in decidedly emphatic language, and declared that I would not use it unless the smell were remedied; to say nothing of its burning such an amount of fuel."

He leaned himself in front of the stove, and without a word peered into the flame, and turned the wick down and turned it up, and sniffed, and then sat quietly down between me and the stove to take off the mental blue spectacles through which I had been seeing every thing.

"Marm," said he, "if your room isn't terrible large, you'll be heated out of house and home by this 'ere stove."

"Oh yes, I did, with great care," I answered.

"Wa'al, then, there oughter be a piece of pipe a-leading into the chimney," that I hadn't got, I O K.

I suggested, in as insinuating a manner as could, that I did not want any varnish put on the new pipe. He answered that he would not use new pipe came in the course of the day—and, of course, varnished. There was the new pipe, bless, alas! the varnish.

The evening brought John, more communicative and less timid than I had ever seen him, and evidently with the intention of bearing without flinching the discomforts of my room, rather than give me pain and let me imagine that he intended to keep me alone. I thanked him confidential, and told him more of my hopes and plans than I had ever dared to speak of before. But the evening passed, the stove offered no bad, and the conversation resolved itself into a rattling musketry of small talk on my part, and an occasional monosyllable from John Gray, like the monosyllables properly should have come from me, and as he had not the courage to go when I sent again for the patentee. He came; he poured out my troubles to him in full; I asserted, argued, appealed. The grand result was—I got a new stove!

I did not quite feel the happy confidence that I had felt the first time, but I hoped for the best. The patentee set it in its place; lighted it; it flamed up! I stood with expectant nostrils, to catch the first faint smell of the varnish, as he called it—kerosene I called it—but it didn't come. I smelt again and again. I went out of the room I smelt again and again. I went out of the room and into the fresh air and came back, and still no smell. In my delight I executed a sort of Indian dance round the room to express my pleasure; I hoped all acquaintances would come in to witness the success of my experiment. As the afternoon wore away I went back to my radical beliefs, and condemned utterly the people who are always wanting the world to stand still. I determined to make a festival of such a pleasant end of all my troubles, and gave the children somewhat more than their usually plain supper. I put on my bonnet and rushed out into the avenue and bought some oysters; and when I came back, finding that I had half an hour of daylight, I sat down and wrote of my troubles and trials and their happy end to my sister in Boston, telling her to get a stove like mine, and giving her the name and address of the maker in New York.

The half hour before my supper was cooked, and just as we were sitting down John came in. I was delighted to see him, and he was delighted that the stove was a success. This was his third visit in a week. What did it mean? He came with a large basket of Thanksgiving goodies, sent by an aunt of his, with a letter desiring that "that poor dear widder, Miss Jones, might have some of 'em." The simple supper became a feast! I was afraid that the children would make themselves ill, but John, in the kindness of his heart, took the responsibility of children (a fondness, by-the-way, that went for a great deal with me), insisted that they should be gratified—and almost gratified himself in the conflict. But, alas! our joy was of short duration. The next day was to bring great peril. At about seven in the morning I lighted the fire, and I remember that I turned the wick very low, as I did not intend to get up just then. Once or twice I looked out at the kitchen door and the light was positive, and at about eight I got up and went into the other room. Instead of a distinct line of fire all round the wick there seemed to be flame enveloping the whole cylinder. I at once pressed down the lever entirely that controlled the blaze, fearful of an explosion, and found that it had flown so as the wick there would be nothing to feed the flame; but it didn't make any difference—the fire still continued to burn as it had done before. At last long, as there was only the volatile part of the petroleum to burn, and no conductor for it; but, instead of extinguishing the flame grew fiercer, and soon were bursting out all round the cylinder with great, angry tongues, lapping about, and the whole thing was evidently in a fine state for an explosion. I didn't know what to do. I remembered that water would only make the fire from coal-oil more intense. I waited in consternation; I didn't even think to give any alarm, but sternly confronted the danger in my perfect quiet, and when

The air was horrible; our faces and clothes were covered with particles of soot, and every thing in the room was black with it. I was now the water in the tank, which was supposed to keep the petroleum cool and prevent explosion, and finding that I thought I could do some good by adding cold water. I moved cautiously to the table, and taking the water-pitcher filled up the tank.

I drew back from the stove only in time to hear a sound which I can't find any word to express, but which was like the whir of a thousand shell through the air than any thing else. In an instant the room was filled by a sheet of flame touching the ceiling and likely, it seemed to me, to cover the whole floor. I stood in mute agony. I thought of every thing. Over the mantle hung a daguerreotype, relics of my former happy home, and endeared to me by a thousand recollections. Those I felt must go, even if we saved life. I glanced at my books and papers—my helps for my daily bread—and last, and most agonizing, my dear little children, with their terrible five years between them and me and the flame. It seemed hours that I stood there! At last there came help.

Through the smoke and the flame I saw him come in at the door; I saw his look of astonishment; I saw the flash of his eyes when I called out to him, "Help, John, help!" He dashed into the little room adjoining my own, which I used as a bedroom for my boy, and came prepared with a blanket. In an instant more he was battling with the flames, and in a few minutes—long in his and mine—I felt the last flash of flame died away, and the danger was over, the artificial strength of excitement failed me, and I sank down, and by fainting over into John's arms! He actually had the courage to put 'em out to catch me, and for five minutes I was in the best of all places I know what he did to restore me, but at length I came to, to bend my eyes languishingly on him; and then, turning them to the door, I saw standing there my bland and smiling fiend! the patentee!

I could not speak. I was too full for utterance. I pointed to him in silent indignation, at the ruin he had made. He glanced at it sideways, and then at me in the same way.

"I guess you had the wick too high."

Something exasperated me about the sentence and the way he said it: his manner was not only provoking, but it was bad a way with it that said, as plainly as words, "This is your fault, and you are the one to pay the penalty." But with an effort I only answered,

"No! I'm sure I put it down all the way as soon as the blaze began."

He stooped before the stove, and, with his hands on his knees, took another look at the dilapidated patent.

"Guess you had the wick too high," he repeated.

Not a tone was changed, but the man's manner as he looked up at me was full of the deliberate impudence of a man who knows he has only a woman against him. I trembled a little, but more with anger than any thing else.

"I don't know whether you doubt my word, but I distinctly remember turning the wick down, and it is down now, as you may see."

"Guess you had the wick too high," was all the fellow answered, with an indescribably insulting air of indifference.

The full impotence of my sex came over me like a wave, and I burst into tears as he made a movement forward. Never was movement more needless. A strong hand on his collar helped him to his feet with a shake that made the furniture rattle all over the room, and John Gray, fairly blazing and nearly speechless with rage, exclaimed:

"What do you mean, you scoundrel?"

And all the while he shook the individual in question at a rate that effectually precluded any further utterance.

The preparations for kicking the fiend down stairs were progressing with alarming rapidity when, in the momentary pause to aim the avenging boot, his imperturbable impertinence found breath to put in a remark that saved him on the brink of his peculiar elsewhere:

"What are you a-doin' this fur? You ain't her husband!"

John was fairly staggered, and dropped the fellow as if he had been one of his own stoves on fire. He looked at me; he looked at the man; he blushed; he trembled; and then stammered out:

"N-no—I'm not her—her—husband, but—"

"But he's going to be," I exclaimed, my fury again getting the better of me; "and you had better pack yourself off, and your confounded old stove with you."

The murder was out; it flushed upon me the next instant with a blush that tingled to my finger-tips. That moment John Gray drew face to face it up with a glory of love, his courage came back to him, and the strong arms opened, and blush hid itself on the manly breast that it had sought and wiped away in his kisses.

I don't know how the artist got down the stairs, or how the two seconds afterward he had gone. We don't use his patent in our house now; we find a furnace preferable on the whole, though we have a wood-fire for cheerfulness in the library. When the early winter nightfall comes on, and we sit by the rich fire-light that is so much nicer than gas, John Gray—my John, you know—looks down into my soul, as I sit on the hearth-rug beside him, with those great dear eyes of his, and says:

"After all, darling, that wasn't such a bad speculation of yours in oil!"

MY ULTIMATUM

Who talks to me of "giving up"
Of flying down discretion's road
Who says the bitter in his cup
Is bitter past the bearing?
For me, I feel that I can do
(Let fate be hard or tender)
I—like La Garde at Waterloo—
To die and not surrender.

What fierce encounters I have had,
Escapes how very narrow!
My first affray was with a lad
Who beat me hand and arrow.
If I should ever fight again
That old and young offender,
I see my pathway very plain—
To die and not surrender.

And then I ran a race to snatch
A laurel from Apollo,
Whom very few entrée to catch,
And very many follow.
Amid the throng of sons of song,
The herds of rhyming cattle,
E'en yet I pant and limp along—
To die and not surrender.

I strove with Flutes day and night,
But left the fray in dudgeon;
And now I wage a fiercer fight
With Tempus, old curmudgeon.
Go on, Destroyer!—eyes dark-grey,
And Art shall be the sender.
Grey hair?—I'll get a wig, my boy,
Or dye and not surrender!

"GRANDMAMMA IS COME."

THE most popular character of a household is, after all that is said of filial affection and duty, not infrequently the grandmother, particularly when she rightly appreciates her position with all of the home pleasure, and none of those home restrictions which, no matter how wholesome, are never rightly appreciated by children. They hear her spoken of only with respect and love: and when she comes her visit is anticipated with the most joyful preparations and greetings, and is invariably accompanied by gifts and "goodies." The poet had a tree sense of the importance of grandmammas when he wrote thus:

Just see the fuss the children make;
With what keen longing they look out
When grandmamma's away, they yearn
With love's warm fire for her return.
The boys, with many a loud hurrah,
Spread off the best of their play-day;
And now and then a boisterous shout,
Give warning of the welcome rout.
All's clear voice shrilly ringing out,
Through all the bustle and the hum,
"Look sharp there—grandmamma is come!"
And the girls kindly greetings show
What tenderness to be sure:
Oh, gentler privilege of youth,
To learn from age's lips the truth,
Distilled from loving Wisdom's rule!

Just see the fuss the children make;
With what keen longing they look out
When grandmamma's away, they yearn
With love's warm fire for her return.
The boys, with many a loud hurrah,
Spread off the best of their play-day;
And now and then a boisterous shout,
Give warning of the welcome rout.
All's clear voice shrilly ringing out,
Through all the bustle and the hum,
"Look sharp there—grandmamma is come!"
And the girls kindly greetings show
What tenderness to be sure:
Oh, gentler privilege of youth,
To learn from age's lips the truth,
Distilled from loving Wisdom's rule!

"GRANDMOTHER'S COME!"—[SEE PAGE 39.]

DAY-DREAMS OF THE PAST.—[SEE PAGE 42.]

DAY-DREAMS OF THE PAST.

THE artist of our charming engraving on page 41 has, and not without good taste, made his drawing somewhat of the nature of our day-dreams—a little mixed and incongruous, but not indefinite. He has thrown upon his canvas the numerous faces and figures and fancies which decorate it with a free and careless hand, and the picture which has resulted is as charming and fascinating as are these day-dreams in which we often allow our imaginations to revel unrestrained. The old head in the centre of the engraving is supposed to have given his fancy free scope in dreams of the past; and he has been overwhelmed with visions of youthful sports and enjoyments, the beauties he has known and loved, the scenes he has witnessed and enjoyed; the pleasures and joys of life, indeed, are recalled to his mind, and his day-dreams become indeed "visions of beauty" not only to himself but to the reader who gazes on the picture.

THE TIME WILL COME.

"THE time will come!" these simple words
A world of varied meaning tell—
New merry as the song of birds,
Now mournful as a passing bell.
The child—who longing to be free
To roam the sunny woods and fields,
Where rippling streams flow on in glee,
And Nature store of fragrance yields—
When all his heart makes holiday,
And bees o'er blooming flow'rets hum,
Doth, heedless of all its fragrant, say,
"The time will come—the time will come!"

"The time will come!" aspiring cries,
With throbbing heart and soul aflame,
The ardent youth who vows to rise
Till he has won an envied name,
When his renown shall shall shine
Like some proud star above the sea,
To all the world a brilliant sign
That he hath gain'd the victory—
For ever to his eager soul,
Like sound of "spirit-stirring drum,"
These accents, full of promise, roll—
"The time will come—the time will come!"

"The time will come!" the maiden fair
Has mourn'd, in her bloom of youth,
In hope the future time to share
With one whom vow'd her life-long truth.
Alas, alas, that such things are!
Her idol proves but worthless clay,
Who, burning gold never prizing her,
Her priceless love has cast away.
But shall he scathless do this deed?
No, repentance never will be dumb;
For him repentance shall succeed;
"The time will come—the time will come!"

"The time will come," the patriot cries,
"When men shall do me justice here,
Which though my native land denies,
Not less is she my country dear.
When foes and friends around shall trample low
Her liberties amid the dust,
My life-blood in her cause shall flow,
And prove me worthy of her trust.
Those hearts shall do me justice then
That Falsehood now has stricken numb,
Yet shall they rue to truth again;
The time will come—the time will come!"

"The time will come"—a captive's hope,
Who, gazing through his prison-bars,
Surveys the distant azure cope
Where shine the soft and pitying stars.
He thinks of home, and those who pine
To hold him to their hearts once more;
Where wife and children's pray'rs combine
To hail his cruel bondage o'er.
Though hope, Death alone may be
His liberator, yet the sum
Of all his hopes thus whispers he—
"The time will come—the time will come!"

"The time will come!" the weary heart,
Worn by its conflict with the world,
Sighs, as though longing to depart
For realms where Sorrow's wings are furl'd,
Where Falsehood can not enter in,
Where love and friendship never grow cold,
But perfect truth and beauty win
Each heart within their tender fold.
To meet again the loved and lost,
To bear those tones Death hush'd to be dumb,
We pray—though here so tempest-tost—
"The time will come—the time will come!"

LETTERS PATENT.

RUTH RANDALL stood in the doorway of her mother's cottage; her graceful, slender figure clearly defined in the lingering glow of sunset, and her face turned aside, looking down the street to where the path wound over the brow of the hill and disappeared. It was a face not handsome or even noticeable but for the mouth, which in some way centred and expressed the other features. The firm line of Ruth's closed lips meant a strong, practical nature, but equal possibilities of womanly sweetness and tenderness were suggested by the flexile curves into which it broke as she spoke or smiled. It was a young, fresh face, of one little tried as yet, save by the common frictions of life, but whom any great test—strain of duty or suffering would not find unprepared—who could die for her ideal of right if need were, or live for it, which is sometimes the harder thing to do. Country-born and reared, Ruth's winsomeness was that of the good heart, without which the best results of breeding and culture are of little worth. She was not without - - romance, either; and was, in her way, as true a hero-worshiper as any maiden of the old Greek and Roman times.

Ruth's hero was Mark Barton. Their very unlikeness had drawn them together, like the attraction between opposite magnetic poles. How often, in their old school-days, she had looked on in a maze of admiration while the shy, dark-haired boy, sitting apart with his noisy mates in the long noon-time, whittled out little wheels and shafts, and pulleys, or fitted odd bits of wood together with persistent patience—a restless fire burning in his black eyes.

Genius is often but a perverse gift to poverty. Mark Barton had struggled up through an orphaned boyhood and a lonely youth to a manhood has, as yet, found no fitting environment to ease and comfort which men strive after. Others, who, like him, had their own way to make, were usually making a life with fair prospects; but how much nearer was Mark's work to any tangible result, capable of exchange into home and fireside currency, than when he and Ruth were first engaged three years ago?

Meanwhile some ridiculed and more blamed him. It availed little to plead the stern judgment of men of shrewd, practical common-sense that one half his small room was crammed with books whose contents he had transferred to his own busy brain, while all around were strewn parts of models, and complicated sketches of mechanisms. Their disapproval was all the more grave that one who had learned so much should have so little. It was the result of a refined sort of idleness—"shiftlessness" in the expressive local phrase. "A poor horse that can't earn his own oats," they said of Mark, looking at Mark's thin cheeks and threadbare dress. But Ruth—

"Her faith is fixed and can not move.
She darkly feels him great and wise,
She dwells on him with faithful eyes,
'I know not understand.' I love."

This cheery-faced girl, waiting in the twilight for her tardy lover, cared little for the sneers or pity of those who judged him. She saw him coming at last, but so slowly and wearily that she hurried out to meet him, in a fright lest he were ill.

"No, not sick," he said, in answer to her anxious question; then he added, in a voice that could not make itself quite steady, "It's all wrong, Ruth!"

"What is wrong, Mark?"

"The machine; oh, Ruth, to fail now, when I have worked at this so long!"

"Fail! No, no," said Ruth, laying her hand on his arm with a swift, caressing motion, "it's that's a new word for you, dear! Besides, how often I've told you that nothing is wrong where one is wrong is the very next thing to being right.

"It is not that, Ruth. My principle is a true one, and I know that in time I could find out some way to obviate this defective working; but Ruth—I really dare to tell you—I have spent more than my last cent on this model, and how I'm to pay my debts, even, without selling my books, I really can not tell. It was wrong to presumption to go on so; but I was so sure of success this time, and you know what success meant for you and for me."

He paused a moment, then he said, impetuously—

"You had best give me up, Ruth; I'm not worth the waiting for!"

Her hand was on his lips.

"Don't, Mark!" she said. "Come indoors, there's no one here."

They went in; she drew him into a chair and sat down beside him, holding his hand.

"Mark, how much money do you need to pay these debts and go on with your work?"

"More than I shall be likely to see very soon, little woman," he answered, trying to speak cheerfully.

"Would five hundred dollars be enough?"

"Five hundred! What would not five hundred dollars do? But why do you ask, Ruth? Your eyes shine as if you had found the philosopher's stone."

"It's just as well for you as if I had!" said Ruth, wisely; "you shall have that sum to-morrow—to-night, if you wish it!"

"Ruth!"

"Mark, dear, I have a secret; it's the first one I ever kept from you. You've heard me speak of uncle Randall, father's brother. Well, indeed, I don't remember him very well myself. He died a year ago, in California, and left me in his will five hundred dollars. I mean to appropriate you with it, and not come to you quite empty-handed, when—when we are married, Mark. But it will do as both a present and more good now than then, and— Oh, Mark, I'm so glad!"

Little, practical Ruth broke down, and hid her face in her hands.

"My darling girl!" cried Mark, lifting her face till he could look into her eyes, "girl, you don't think I could take that money?"

"Oh, Mark! indeed, indeed I do!"

"But I can not; it would not be manly or even right."

"Mark, listen to me!" Ruth was speaking now with a calm authority that forced him to hear. "Are there any questions of worldly usage between you and me? Are not our interests one? Can any good thing happen to you and not be mine too? Can you want to build up a home any more than I long to try to make it happy one for you? Does it make any difference whether you or I use that money, or when, only as one or the other can do the best with it for both of us?"

"I will take it," said Mark, solemnly, "and may God prosper me as I shall use it for us both!"

"Going to be married, eh! Ruth?" said Judge Markham next day, as Ruth presented the note he had given her for the amount of her secret.

"No, Sir; not yet."

"Well, well, child! It's none of my business what you want with your money"—signing a check and giving it to her with a glance at her rosiest cheeks—"here it is, interest and all; but it's my advice to you, and no fee asked, not to invest it too deeply with that hare-brained lover of yours."

Ruth drew her little figure up with sudden dignity.

"I'm much obliged to you, Judge Markham," she said, and went out, the current of her joy too deep and strong to be disturbed by any passing ripple of vexation.

Full of new courage, and with every nerve of hand and brain tensely straining for action, Mark found his little workshop a cell and went into the city, that he might have increased advantages for study, and be able to be initiated in person the construction of a new model.

Will Trafton, confidential clerk in the house of "Wilkes & Brown," had been Mark Barton's playmate in childhood. Meeting Mark on the street one day, he greeted him with the familiarity of old acquaintance, and at parting asked his address.

"I shall drop in upon you at my first spare hour," he said, when it had been given.

"Thank you, Will; but you won't find me very sociably inclined—I have other business."

"That's unfortunate, to say; but you were always an odd chap, and I sha'n't be vexed with you. I shall come all the same."

Trafton kept to his word. Again and again his calls broke in upon Mark's hours of close application; but despite all hindrances his work went on to completion. One by one the difficulties seemed to clear away before the perfection of his plan, and the future shone with the golden promise of success.

One day Trafton came in, bringing a friend with him, a Mr. Everett—"a man," according to Will's grandiloquent introduction, "after your own heart, Barton—can read your wheels, big and little, like a book; knows more of every thing worth knowing about machines than a good-for-nought like me in a lifetime!"

Mark caught the fascinating smile with which Everett laid out his bait, and the annoyance he had felt at the first entrance of his visitors was dissipated at once. To be appreciated was a very keen and burning sensation to one who had worked all his life under a cloud of censure and misconstruction. Here was a man, whose line of whose face showed intellect and culture, with the air of one well-versed in men and things, meeting him, poor, toiling inventor, with all the fine courtesy due an equal. If Mark had been a better physiognomist he might have thought the latter part of Will's speech a ruse, he felt so lack. The hour passed delightfully, and when Everett said at leaving, "I am very thankful to my friend Trafton for so pleasant an acquaintance—shall I dare to intrude again?" Mark answered, warmly, "I shall always be glad to see you."

Before many weeks had passed Everett had come to be a daily visitor, holding a place in Mark's confidence such as no other man had ever occupied. He entered with wonderful interest into all the plans of the young mechanist, and was as familiar with the minutest details of the invention from which Mark hoped so much, as its author himself. All the minor difficulties which temporarily obstructed the general design had been laid before him, as also the various ways by which Mark expected to accomplish their removal.

Ruth Kendall, in her little room at home, wept tears of joyful pride over the glowing letters which it became her part to express of the model and the growth of the new friendship.

Meanwhile the visits of Will Trafton at Mark's first failed with less frequency. But if Mark himself was too much preoccupied to notice the change, Ruth was not; and wondering across his friend's gay good-humor, and the fine eye expression which his eyes took on sometimes, as if they were English flint, and suspicious of the distrust of others, Everett was less blind. "Something is going seriously wrong with Trafton," he decided, in quiet certainty, and set himself the task of finding out the cause.

"Everett leaves town to-morrow," wrote Mark to Ruth one evening, in the midst of business—may be absent indefinitely. I scarcely dare to think how much I shall miss him."

At last the model was done. The model was complete and stood before him the child of his own brain, perfect in adaptation, fruitless as yet in success.

All other emotions seemed swallowed up in the full assurance of victory, and the thought of what that victory would be to the faithful heart that had waited and loved and trusted so long. Nothing now remained but to secure his patent, and the result was a foregone—sure—to, better for, to home and love—seemed open. Having taken the necessary steps through a friend at Washington whose business it was to aid at the Patent Office, he still remained in the city awaiting further communication. One night there came a telegram, brief but comprehensive:

"You are too late. A patent was granted only two weeks ago to Everett—model almost identical with yours. Claim was rushed through."

Mark never knew how long he sat without word or motion. In the space of thought seemed leaving him. He was conscious of but two emotions, the utter desolation of having been betrayed by his friend, and an intense longing for Ruth. At last he rose mechanically, and went out. He moved on aimlessly, turning corner after corner, until suddenly he heard the dizzy rush of a fire-engine past him, and found himself confused with a crowd surrounding a burning building. There was a cry of "The roof! the roof!" and the throng surged backward, as the whole structure fell in with a crash, throwing its blazing timbers out into the street. Mark heard something hiss toward him through the air, and fell blackened and bleeding under the feet of the people.

"Where am I?" It was Mark who spoke, looking about him feebly and uncertainly, as if groping for the lost thread of reason and memory.

"Here, Mark—at home."

"Oh, Ruth! is it you?" and at sight of her tender face bending over him, the past rushed upon him like a flood, and his scarred face contracted in a spasm of pain.

"It is I, Mark dear! but you must not talk—you are too weak."

"But tell me how I came here. I was hurt—I remember. Where did you find me, Ruth?"

"In the hospital, dear. You were carried there, and we found it out by the newspaper. So we went for you, brother John and I. You were very wild then, and the surgeons thought you would never be any better; but I knew that mother and I could nurse you. And now you are so much better—almost well!" She spoke eagerly, as if trying to persuade herself also.

"Now, Mark, not one word more!" she said, as he essayed to speak; "you must try to sleep."

"You won't leave me, Ruth?"

"I never leave you!" with a look more eloquent than words. He lay for a time with closed eyes; then he said weakly, "Ruth!"

"Yes, Mark."

"You know about it?"

"Yes, dear; I found the dispatch in your pocket. But you must not think of it now!"

"But I can't!" he replied, with sudden energy. "Ruth, it's all gone! Your money—my faith in humanity—our home that was to be—"

"No, no! Never say it, Mark!" What a subtle magnetism infused itself into his tired brain from the tender touches of her fingers-tips! "Not gone! my love! We have all these and more in our trust in God and in each other. Let us not take vows in vain, Mark, dearest, as it is! The victory is yours—God gave it to you, and with it that larger patent which He grants to His nobility!"

Mark's convalescence, so long delayed, was now proportionally rapid. His disease had been more the result of exhaustion and depression than the mere physical effect of the blow which was its immediate cause. The healthful tone once re-established, he steadily gained strength. As he became able to think connectedly, his mind was constantly occupied with the questions of the future, and successfully counteracting his claim with his false friend. One plan after another was entertained and rejected for want of some necessary link in the chain of evidence. He was astounded now at his own lack of foresight in neglecting to file a "caveat," which would have served him as a protection against Everett's claim. He determined, at last, so soon as he should be able, to lay the whole matter before a competent attorney, and abide by his decision of the possibilities of the case.

There was a sharp rap at the door one evening, and when Ruth opened it, Will Trafton stood there and asked anxiously for Mark. She showed him into the inner room, and left the two alone. Mark's surprise at his unexpected visit was more than equaled by his wonder at the change visible in him. Indeed, he scarcely recognized him at first, so utterly worn and haggard was his face, and every gesture so eloquent of discouragement mingled with a desperate determination to brave the worst. He would not help Mark's proffered hand.

"No, no!" he said, "if you knew all you would not offer it. I've been a perjured traitor at heart, though I am glad for your sake, Mark, that I have not gone too far to turn back. Mark, God knows that when I first brought Everett to see you I thought he was an honest man. I believed in him just as freely as you could have done. I never had a suspicion of what he meant to do until—"

"Why, Will!" interrupted Mark, "I never blamed you!"

"Hear me out! I had taken to bad ways—I was always a spendthrift, extravagant—he groaned. "I lived beyond my salary, and when every thing was on the brink of an exposure that would have left me my situation and nothing else away disgraced, Everett gained my confidence and saved me. It happened more than once, and at last, when I was deeply in debt to him, and could not pay, and was almost wholly in his power in other ways, he sprung this villainous plan of his on me. He would defend my losses and threats made me pledge myself, in case you should contest the patent, to help him by giving such testimony as he should dictate. Mark, Mark! you know it now, and I never can tell you what tortures I have suffered for it!" He buried his face in his hands with a great sob; then he lifted it again, and went on with nervous eagerness: "But, Mark, your case can be made clear as day, if you will. I can prove to you every bit of it, and more by and by, when you are more by some one here how long ago you began work on your first plan, can't you?"

"Yes, by Ruth and others."

"Well, there's Bill Cleary, the janitor of the building where you have your rooms, who will swear to Everett's being in your room so much. Better than that, I found out, by accident, where Everett had made his model. It was in a room over a shop in Philadelphia. I had to go there the other day on some business for Mr. Brown, and I went to see the man who owned it. I suppose he will call it a providence, Mark, that in an old white-basket we found a sheet of written instructions in your own handwriting, which Everett had given him. Then add my testimony to all the rest, and there can be no possibility of failure."

Mark was weak yet, and the shock was almost too great for him. A few tears, which he was not ashamed to shed, rolled down his cheeks. He held out both hands to Will, who took them now with an entirety for forgiveness, which was met before half uttered.

There is little need to tell what the reader has guessed already; how the Commissioner of Patents tried the case, deciding it in favor of the real inventor; how the proceeds of Mark's first sale were devoted, in part, to annihilating the baffled Everett's last hold upon Will Trafton, who emerged from the terrible shadow of his temptations and failures, having learned a lesson which would make him all his life a stronger and a better man; how there was a wedding in the country church, where all the town crowded to see, and Judge Markham gave away the bride; how not a few, who sneered at the poor inventor while the issue of his experiments trembled in the balance, now seek his counsel and patronage; how wealth has been to him no excuse for a vainglorious idleness, but the prosperous, happy years come and go, finding and leaving him a tireless investigator, a lover of truth for its own sake, a simple, earnest worker for God and man.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Now unfrequently some heroic deed, performed by some humble but noble spirit, comes to the notice of the public for a brief moment, and awakens a thrill of admiration. But it is soon swallowed up in the great vortex of daily news, and passes into oblivion. A good deed, worthy of remembrance and praise, was witnessed a week or two ago near Pier 51, North River. A one-armed soldier, attempting to throw a line to a vessel, lost his balance and fell overboard. Unable to sustain himself he had sunk once and was just going down for the third time, when a little fellow named John White, who was engaged in selling papers on the dock, dropped his stock in trade, threw off his coat and shoes, and leaped into the water after the man. Being a good swimmer he gallantly succeeded in holding the head of the maimed veteran above water until assistance was rendered and both were hauled out on the dock. John White deserves to meet with abundant patronage hereafter. And, indeed, news-boys in general exhibit in their daily work a most commendable degree of energy, perseverance, and patience, which many others older and wiser might imitate.

There is an opening for an inventor. An exchange says there has been too much of "the roasting business," and that stoves and coal-oil should be thrown out of railroad cars. Can not a safe mode of heating and lighting cars be discovered? While rural railroad horrors are fresh in the mind, it is well to agitate this question.

We have had some severe weather this winter, and may reasonably expect more. But in Canada the season is said to have been thus far the coldest experienced for eighteen years. Certain citizens of Maine have had some tough experiences. A short time ago a man went to get a piece of corned beef from a barrel. The pickle was frozen hard, and in breaking it with a crow-bar, the cold iron froze his fingers! A woman met with a still more extraordinary disaster. Going with her hands warm and wet from the wash-tub after the clothes-stick in the woodhouse, as she was about to take it up her hand was seized and held fast. Looking with some terror to see what strange monster had thus fastened upon her, she found that an iron crow-bar, standing near, had frozen fast to the back of her hand, and not merely held on like grim death, but was apparently drawing her whole arm into its chilling embrace. In her terror she called aloud for water, and her mother, thinking only hot water could be wanted in such weather, came with a dipper full of boiling water! Fearing that she was about to be scalded as well as frozen, the victim of the crow-bar, which still kept its grip upon her, cried louder than ever for cold water, which being poured upon her hand she was able to tear it away with the loss of the skin, which remained upon the inexorable iron. Her hand was blistered as badly as if it had been burned!

A new article of manufacture has just made its appearance in our market which promises to occupy a wide field. It forms a connecting link between glass and porcelain, extending largely into the domain of each. Its peculiar character is defined by its name—"Hot-cast Porcelain." While containing the ingredients of which porcelain is composed it is melted like glass, and can, like glass, be blown, pressed, or rolled into any desired shape. The reasons for naming the new material "Hot-cast Porcelain" is, that it is produced in a single operation while the ingredients are in a state of fusion. The manufacture of this porcelain is at present carried on in a factory of considerable extent in Philadelphia; but a movement is now making to greatly enlarge the production—a number of the leading business men of this city believe a decided interest in it. Samples of the material can be seen at 63 John Street, up stairs.

A most extraordinary story, of the Boron Mountchausen style, is told by a fireman who describes how he rescued a child from a burning house. He was on the fourth floor, and fled and cut off all access by the cage inside. The fireman called to the man who held the hose to turn on his largest stream. When the stream reached the window the fireman took the child in one arm, and clasping his legs and his free arm round the stream, slid safely down to the pavement.

A young woman living in Indiana, who is about seventeen years of age, has been the subject of a remarkable case, which lasted twelve hours. She fell very ill, and to all appearance died. Preparations were made for her funeral, but as the body retained its warmth it was delayed. When consciousness returned the girl told strange stories of her visit to other worlds, and of those she saw in heaven and hell. She also said she should have another trance, which happened as she foretold. During this strange phenomenon she appeared to be dead, but the pulse beat faintly and the body was not entirely cold. All conscious was gone. The girl is uneducated, but has always borne a good character for truthfulness, and is a member of the church. The physician in attendance is positive as to her condition during the whole time, and had it not been for him she would have been buried alive.

Illinois is a remarkable State, and contrives to startle the world with its strange proceedings pretty often. One of the latest sensations is the sale of a husband by a jealous wife. The lady in question finding that another woman was planning to elope with her husband, thought she ought to be paid for him! This was considered fair, and the man was valued at $130—doubtless more than he was worth. The money was paid, the various parties seemed satisfied, and the man departed with his new companion.

Skating is an ancient amusement, having originated probably at some unknown period among the dykes of Holland. It was first introduced into London about two hundred years ago, and was practiced by the cavaliers of St. James's Park as a genial novelty. As to skates, they have undergone wonderful changes—the Icelanders used the shank-bone of a deer or a sheep; and in a description of ancient customs in London it is remarked: "When the great frost or moore (which warreth the walls of the citie on the north side) is frozen, many young men play upon the yce, and sailing swiftly. Some tye bones to their feete under their heeles, and shoving themselves by a little pick staffe, slide as swiftly as a bird flyeth in the air, or an arrow out of a cross-bow." Time and ingenuity have wrought great changes, and the skates of to-day are highly finished articles, and command a high price.

In Philadelphia—and the fashion will soon be in New York—if it did not originate here—burglars are traveling around as peddlers, offering for sale a paste for burnishing silver. They produce the paste, and offer to polish the silver-ware for nothing, by which means they are enabled to know what silver is in the place they visit, and where it is kept. It is the height of the season for burglars now, and good care should be taken not to give them any special facilities.

A second Yelverton case has been brought up in London. One Sir Eardley married a New York lady in 1850, and she being still living, he has recently married an English lady. It was shown that the marriage in New York took place in Calvary Church in the presence of many witnesses. Sir Eardley, defended by eminent counsel, contended that the marriage was illegal, but the magistrate committed him without bail to take his trial. Sir Eardley seems to have imagined that he could repudiate his New York marriage because there was no ceremony before the British Consul. A very little investigation will convince English lords and lawyers that the law of New York does not suffer wives to be repudiated on the ground of a trivial irregularity in the marriage ceremony. In England, to be sure, if a man tucks in an extra letter as he signs his name to the marriage record, is the ceremony is not performed between certain established hours, and in certain established places, and according to certain established rules, why, when he wants a change of life, he finds it very easy to pick a flaw in the performance, and to have the marriage declared null and void. Not so in the State. As was shown in a recent case in the Court of Appeals, there may be a valid marriage in this State though not formally solemnized by a clergyman or consent declared before a magistrate. If parties, competent to contract, in the presence of witnesses agree together to be husband and wife, and afterward recognize each other as such, it is a sufficient marriage to sustain an indictment for bigamy in the event of one or the parties having before that time married another who is still living. Marriage in this State is a civil contract, and does not require the intervention of a minister or magistrate to make it legal. And although certain religious ceremonies are highly desirable and appropriate in connection with marriage, it is also desirable that the exact law be known, so that no one may be deprived of just rights through a false representation or construction of it.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHAT THE RECENT PENIAN EXPLOSIVE ELEVATIONS HAVE CAUSED.

ADVICE TO SKATERS.

1. Never try to skate in two directions at once. It always ends in sorrow.

2. Eat a few apples for refreshment after while skating, and be sure to throw the cores on the ice.

3. Sit down occasionally, no matter where. There is no law to prevent a new beginner from sitting down whenever he has an inclination to do so.

4. When you meet a particularly handsome lady try to skate on both sides of her at once. This is very pretty, and must create a sensation.

5. Skate over all the small boys at once.

6. If you skate into a hole in the ice take it coolly. Think how you would feel if the water was boiling hot.

7. If your skates are too slippery buy a new pair. Keeping new paint all your life and a pair that are not slippery.

8. In sitting down do it gradually. Don't be too sudden; you might break the ice.

9. When you fall headlong examine the straps of your skates very carefully before you get up.

10. If you bring your own cut or chalk till you get thoroughly warmed up, and then throw it off and let the world cool you.

11. After you get so that you can skate tolerably well, skate three or four hours—skate frantically—skate till you can't stand up.

WHERE TO LIVE.

All good men should live in Archangel; all angry men in Ireland.

All murderers in Aldine; all circus-men in Somerset.

All brokers in Stockholm; all cold men in Chili.

All cosmetricians in Cuba; all fools in Folly Island.

All gamblers in Constantinople; all sailors in Bay of Fundy.

All perfumers in Muscat or Cologne; all brewers in Malta.

All gluttons in Turkey; all beggars in Hungary.

All locusts men in Lacunia; all mourners in Siberia or Wales.

All confectioners in Candia; all children in the Crimea.

All oil-speculators in Greece; all gamblers in the Faro Bank.

All stumblers in Tripoli; all curlous men in Pekin.

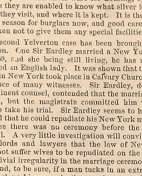
All smokers in Boodan; all soldiers in Arnawa or Warsaw.

CABINET CURIOSITIES.—Mr. Seward having purchased an iceberg, and secured the refusal of an earthquake, proceeds to negotiate for a volcano.

What rose is more brilliant than the toper's nose? Why, volca—no's, to be sure. Pat remarks that the chief glow of each comes from the "crater."

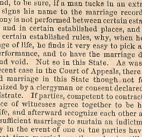
REFLECTIONS IN A FASHIONABLE CHURCH.

Rich notes from a contralto voice,
Loving, laughing eyes,
Some one sa'ntering to those notes—
Sunlight in the skies.



Sad notes from a contralto voice,
Tear-drops in the eyes,
None to listen to those notes—
Twilight in those skies.

No sound from that contralto voice,
Closed for aye those eyes,
Some one pitying for those notes—
Darkness in the skies.

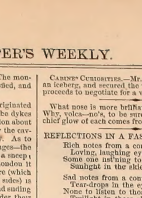


Glad notes from a contralto voice,
Glory in those eyes,
Some one dreaming hears those notes—
Dawn is in the skies.

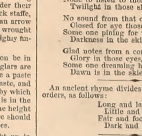
An ancient rhyme divides female beauty into four orders, as follows:

Long and lazy,
Little and loud,
Fair and foolish,
Dark and proud.

MY NEW-YEAR'S CALL.



1. It isn't very tempting out. No calls any where; but I must call on Penelope.



2. She'd never forgive the slight. It would prove a fearful blow.

3. I must call, or perish in the attempt. I call that man and brother in the distance.

4. Who for greenbacks conveys me pick-a-back to Penelope.

5. As we turn up the street we accidentally turn up Horror of Penelope.

6. Rescued by the hand of Love, I achieve my New-Year's Call.

THE "TIMES" ON THE "ALABAMA" CLAIMS.

Tearing the Civil War to Anarchs.—The idea is simply preposterous. That such claims for a moment should be entertained by a civilized power is only too clearly demonstrated, etc., etc., etc.

After the Conclusion of the War.—We have already expressed our opinion of the Alabama difficulty, and though, perhaps, according to the strict letter of other national law, a violation of rights has been committed; yet, etc., etc., etc.

Upon Application from the Government of the United States.—There is, after all, a great deal to be said in favor of the American view of this question. At the same time the dignity of this country, etc.

After the Persian Raid in Canada.—The course this matter is settled the better.

On Receipt of Peremptory Remonstrance from Washington.—John Bull is not the sort of individual to fight about L. S. D. A graceful concession, etc., etc.

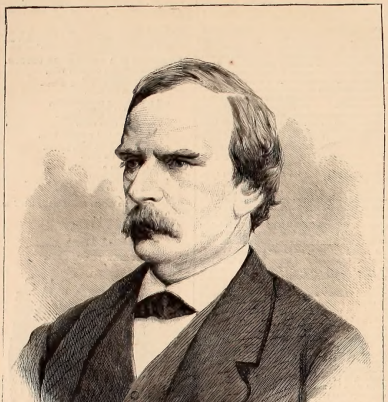
The Result of Mr. Seward's Last Communication.—Don't hit us, pleeze. We won't do so again. How much is there to pay? Book-ook-ook! We're so sorry!

Love is a pearl of purest hue,
But stormy waves are round it,
And dearly may a woman rue
The hour that first she found it.

One of a party of musical friends, referring to an exquisite musical composition, said, "that song always carries me away when I hear it." "Can any one sing it?" asked Jerrold.

HON. RICHARD BUSTEED.

IT was hoped that the race of Southern assassins had died with BOOTH and the slave oligarchy, and that we should never again hear of the hanging or shooting of Northern men and Government officials for the reason that they were of Northern birth and official position. The attempted assassination of Judge RICHARD BUSTEED, at Mobile, shows that this ignoble and mean spirit which leads men to resort to the commission of the highest crime to "preserve their honor and maintain their character" is not yet crushed out.



The facts of the attempt on the life of Judge BUSTEED are as follows: He has been for some years Judge, by appointment of MR. LINCOLN, of the United States Court for the Southern District of Alabama, and on December 28 was in Mobile in attendance on his court. The assassin who attempted his life is L. V. B. MARTIN, the District Attorney at Mobile. Charges had been preferred in Judge BUSTEED's court against MARTIN for malfeasance in office, and the Grand Jury had found a true bill against him. Judge BUSTEED refused, on the application of MARTIN and his friends, persistently made, to stay the proceedings against him, and thereupon MARTIN conceived that he had just cause of anger against the Judge. On the morning of December 28 he met Judge BUSTEED near the Mobile Post-Office, and accosted him by saying:

"Judge BUSTEED, do you intend to allow that indictment against me to take its course?"

"Of course, Sir," answered the Judge, "the law must take its course."

Without another word, the duly-elected Mobile prosecutor of criminals drew a revolver, and without a word of warning, shot the judge of criminals in the breast and subsequently in the leg. The victim has since lain in great danger of his life, and his recovery is yet doubtful.

Judge BUSTEED, of whom we give a portrait on this page, was born in Ireland. His father was a colonel in the British army, and at one time civil and military Governor of the Island of St. Lucia, West Indies, a dependency of the British crown. On returning to England, Colonel BUSTEED sold out his commission, emigrated to Canada, and established a newspaper strongly democratic in principle, where his sons learned something of "the art preservative of arts." On removing to this city the son became a compositor in the Commercial Advertiser office, and soon afterward entered himself as a student in the law-office of the late THOMAS ADDIS EMMET. In due time he was admitted to the bar, and soon secured a large practice. In September, 1856, he was appointed Counsel to the Corporation, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of LORENZO B. SHEPARD; and at the election following was elected to that office for the usual term of three years.

JUDGE BUSTEED OF ALABAMA.

At the outbreak of the rebellion he was commissioned a Brigadier-General. After serving for over a year he resigned, and was subsequently appointed to his present office.

Very few lawyers in the country possess greater powers as an advocate. As a judge he has made himself acceptable to the people and bar of Alabama, and his published charges to grand juries exhibit a high degree of legal acumen and strong practical sense.

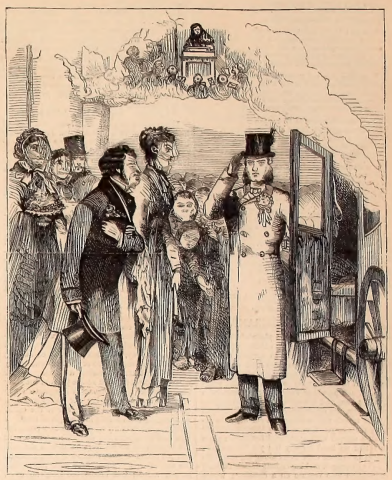
AMIDST THE ICE AGAIN.

IT is encouraging to know that just on the eve of the sailing of the several exploration fleets of England, France, and Prussia, in search of an Open Polar Sea, some important discoveries have been made in the same direction by American whalers. These discoveries have been less of an open sea than of a new polar continent; but they are important steps in Arctic exploration, and add considerably to the world's geographical knowledge as well as to the world's known surface.

The existence of the land lately discovered has been surmised for forty years or more, and was originally announced by Baron WRANGELL, a famous Russian explorer. He, however, never saw it, but learned of its existence from the Siberian Indians. It was first actually seen on August 14, 1867, from the bark Nile, and subsequently that vessel sailed for one hundred miles along its exposed coast. The land lies almost within sight of the northern shore of the most eastern province of Siberia, but is almost unapproachable. The southeastern cape of the new territory is in north latitude 71° 10', and west longitude 176° 46'. The southwestern cape is in north latitude 70° 50', and west longitude 178° 15'. From these points and this southern coast it stretches indefinitely northward. This land could be distinctly seen in August last from the Nile. Along the south coast it looked quite elevated, and near the centre has an extinct crater cone, which is estimated to be 2480 feet high. This coast appears to be nearly straight, with high, rugged cliffs, and entirely barren. The northeast coast appears to run from the southeast cape in a northwesterly direction for about fifteen or twenty miles, and then turns to the north and northeast. Captain BLIVEN traced it much further north, and has seen others who traced it to north of latitude 72°. There is no doubt that it extends much further to the north, and that there is another island to the east of it. The Captain of the Nile named it Wrangell's Land, after the noted Russian explorer. The west point he named Cape Thomas, after the seaman on his ship who discovered it, and the southeast point Cape Hawaii, after the port from which he had last sailed.

Our engraving on this page shows a vessel amidst the ice of the Arctic Ocean, and illustrates one of the many dangers to which whalers in extreme northern latitudes are frequently subjected. Numberless are the ships which have been destroyed by the immense icebergs which form in the Arctic Ocean and float occasionally southward until they dissolve under the rays of our summer suns. The vessel in our illustration appears to have just escaped from being crushed between two large mountains of ice which were bearing down upon it.

AMIDST THE ICE—A VESSEL ESCAPING FROM ICEBERGS.



THE ILLUSTRATED ALPHABET OF LIFE.

A. B. C!

PRETTY, and only playing!
Playing; yet as you bend
The twig, so runs the saying,
The tree will grow. Worth weighing,
That bent—its aim—its end!

Feed every whim. No measure
To selfish thoughts—Ah me!
Why poison life with pleasure?
Why waste the young hearts' treasure!
Why?—This is A. B. C.

L. S. D!

Alas! that youth entices
Such things as these—yet gold
Will blind the world, and vices,
Like maidens, name their prices—
While truth is bought and sold.

Happier those around her;
Happier—they are free!
For a golden snake has bound her,
In its fatal coil his wound her—
Cursed, venomed, L. S. D.

I. O. U!

Ruin, that's all—to-morrow,
Ruin? God help them then!
To starve, to beg, to borrow,
Their lot? Well, wherefore sorrow—
Are we not gentlemen?

What "fraud and theft?" oh! no, Sir,
Such charges are not true!
A duty, you must know, Sir,
That to ourselves we owe, Sir,
But laugh at I. O. U.

R. I. P!

Tears, loving tears, have started
From every eye; be still—
For we are broken-hearted,
We miss the dear departed,
God bless him!—Where's his Will?

What! nothing? Not a penny!
The miser!—Hush! you see
He cuts up well for many—
Who cares? I've not got any—
Ah who! Well—R. I. P.

THE SINGER'S PLACE.

You would pass it among the rest,
Careless world, as you haste along,
The tiny, secret joy possessed,
The heart of life and the fount of song,
Kept securely above your wrong.

Safe as a bird's nest high in a tree,
On the outermost twig, where it beads and swings,
Out of reach if any one see,
And safe for the dweller, without his wings,
Because the lightest and smallest of things.

They may look and listen interested,
When leaves are thick in the festal June,
And think the old tree all shrouth,
If trembles at the silliest tune
With the overflow of the ruptured tune.

As if the spirit were in its boughs
That sings and sways in the air at about:
The tiny singer in his great house
Swelling for wish in his tireless throat,
More than a bird's joy in the note.

For all that the glorious tree receives,
When spring her beautiful robe lets fall,
Crowns of blossoms and wealth of leaves,
A pillar in earth's great banquet-hall,
There is only one voice for all.

Sing, sing on, glad heart, sweet mouth!
The precious burden is all for thee;
What did it were best and wisest of the south
Else the boughs of the happy tree
Where Joy is mated with Harmony.

Keeping its summers with music rife,
Its winters warm with the empty nest;
Through the shedding and sending life,
Still the home of the singing guest,
Blessed always above the rest.

CARL SPENCER.

TERRIBLE TELEGRAMS.

I AM of opinion that some place of residence should be provided for quiet, old-fashioned people who find it impossible to keep accustom themselves to the rapid and to them most obnoxious changes (misnamed "improvements") which are supposed to be essential to what is called progress. Such people as myself, for instance, who can not run, and are equally unable to get out of the way of those who are being knocked down by the wheels of the triumphal car of the nineteenth century. I am not the Government set apart a locality for our special benefit; a place to which no local railway has yet penetrated; where no tramcars clang along the roadways; for the purpose of making furious dashes at timid pedestrians who venture on a crossing; where a steam and steam only may be hired at a civil stable-keeper; and a couple of sedan chairs, retained for ordinary evening visitations in the neat street, to be kept by the carpet-bedder and general odd-man and messenger, assisted by the son of the small-coal man or the green-grocer if he may be replied that there are suburbs already in existence where such a condition of things might easily be inaugurated—suburbs, or, at all events, adjacent though outlying country places, where there are as yet no railway stations. I can only say, I don't know one in which, directly a new select inhabitant take quiet possession in the hope of remaining undisturbed by the restless, soulless, mechanical activity of the age, a speculative builder does not run up hideous streets of semidetached villas, and form a colony of stockbrokers' clerks and aspiring tradespeople, who leave their dens behind daily at five o'clock. The consequence is, that to take these people to town every morning there is no omnibus competition which entirely excludes the original residents from all the inside seats; and, finally, a branch railway is soon launched, horribly new stone-and-stucco station destroys the place; the best walks are cut up and spoiled; the streets are infested by bands of navvies, who demoralize the laboring population and increase the number of the beer-shops, and we are all starved by the high prices necessary to pay the scream and rattle of the trains. The whole scandalous proceeding is consummated by the arrival of a telegraph wire apparatus and the hoarding of meaty, closely-printed, unwieldy, great broadsheets, from which, if my body ventures to read them—and it is not my fault if my head bring my mind to do—the ink all comes off upon one's gloves and soils one's muslin dress. It is to the telegraph that I peculiarly have the greatest aversion, however; not that there is any objection whatever to the curious discovery of the powers of electricity. The wonders of science, as exhibited at the Polytechnic, where I make a point of going once a year, have ever been a source of gratification to me; and I would have them made useful in the instruction of youth at half-price: I only object that one is too high or too sacred for trade; or, as those who are not content to call it by its right name say, "for the advancement of commercial interests." Of all the modern inventions which have served to encourage sentiment among us, to abolish refinement, and to use the intellect of a high material civilization for the purpose of establishing a mental and spiritual barbarism, I regard the Electric Telegraph as the most complete. It is worse than useless. I am told, a barbarous and illiterate jargon) the illustrative of what is called modern progress —of the progress which seems every thing but worth having behind, and for the sake of living further, enjoy nothing. If they have not almost abolished writing, they have at least nearly put an end to epistolary correspondence. We get no letters now: only brief, uninteresting, and frequently ungrammatical communications, scrawled illegibly on a tiny scrap of flimsy tissue note-paper. Who ever received a good, honest, earnest letter nowadays?—a letter which the writer has sat down to as to a labor of love, and warming with the task, has extended over a fair sheet of gilt-edged post, and then crossed? In a few more years there will be nobody left who keeps packets of letters tied up with ribbon in secret nooks and drawers of their desks and bureaus. There will be no desks and bureaus, perhaps; no letters certainly: it will all be done by telegram, and an invitation will be sent an hour before dinner-time, with just "4.30 sharp" upon it; and the reply will be, "Yes, thanks." This, however, is sarcasm. It ill becomes me to satirize that which should rather be regarded with serious grief; for consider how much letters have had to do with the lives of people like myself: how almost every epoch in our existence has been marked by epistolary correspondence. I never received but two of those dreadful telegrams in my life, and more than one offered to me in mistake for somebody else. It contained only these words:

"All right. A girl. Both doing well."

It gave me a dreadful shock, for I remembered how the advent of a little stranger in our family had always been accompanied by a series of observances which indicated that an immortal being had been ushered into the world. There was first a white kid glove on the street door, then a cushion stuck with pins of welcome, next the solemn whispering reception of visitors by the young mother, who sat up in a lace cap and a large white shawl; and of half-crowns by the nurse, who assiduously produced light refreshments and the occasional glass of wine the christening, with white favors and a quiet party; and a silver mug, a pusher, a coral and bells from godfathers and godmothers. All these ceremonies were the occasion of letters which kept alive family affection, and made one acquaintance more than a mere passing reminder, and time worth a better record than the mere memorandum of a railway ticket.

Letters were a part of the observances of society in those days. There were proper seasons and occasions for them, right observances of any thing happening which required to be communicated—at Christmas-tide especially, and on New Year's Day, and Valentine's Day, and hearing accidentally of some piece of good fortune or any sorrow which had overtaken a friend. I hope the love of letter-writing is not dying out altogether with letters, written just before breaking-up days, wherein we were supposed to write the sentiments of our hearts, and which we did in Latin "exercises," and declaring our hope that we should ever be remembered with the tenderest love and care bestowed upon us by our dear friends, and "of the inestimable advantages to be derived from the pursuit of the studies which, now we were likely rected by those to whom the care of our education was intrusted. How well I remember the last formula! I have one of those letters written in my desk now, along with those others—those mournful, deep-black-bordered ones that came to me with the first grief that touched me as old maid. Yes, I have none of those other letters in my secretary—letters that tell of the heart's dedication, and of which some of us have received so many, and have allowed me to participate in their joy, not always lasting. I might have had, and I am not to be. The reason cause to me one day a black-bordered messenger instead of a white-covered one, and the page that might have been opened in the light of day was closed forever. I will not think of that now; not that the thinking of it can pain. But I have gone quite away from the subject of telegrams. I said I had only received two. The second was from my dear uncle Jacob, who travels five in the country, and I have ever tried to act by as though she had been my own daughter. She is a fiery, copious creature, for she is a spoiled child always, and very, very beautiful, I think. So William thought: for she no sooner left school than he wanted to marry her, and married they were before she was twenty years old. I thought: it would have been better for her to have had some household or domestic training first; but that, it appears, has gone out of fashion too. At all events, as her future husband had a good business in the city, they obtained her parents consent; and my only fear was that her passionate temper might be a trouble to her. Fortunately William is a man of immense good-humor, but with an amiability that nothing could ruffle, and a fine constitution. They were a handsome couple, and I gave them a silver tea and coffee service, and the best spoons, for a wedding-present.

They have been married now very little above six months, and I have more than once had occasion to scan my self-control to give way to her temper, or to try her husband's amiability to indulge, then, of my surprise, my almost horror, when, the day before yesterday, I received a "telegram" from Bertha, saying no more than—"Dear Aunty, come to me at once; I am so miserable."

You might have knocked me down with a feather; but I sent Hannah for a fly—she brought a cab, and it was full of muddy straw, and somebody had been smoking tobacco inside it—and drove off to Barbarossa-villas at once. What could have happened? When I got in Bertha flew into my arms and became hysterical.

"What—what is the matter, child?" I exclaimed. "Nothing between you and William, I solemnly hope and trust?"

"—I was very wicked, and behaved so badly to him this morning; and I deserve it all, and I am a wretch. But oh! how could he be so cruel?" she sobbed.

"Why, what has he done?" said I, in dismay.

"He went away without a word, or, at all events, I didn't listen, for I went into my own room, and banged the door; but look—look there!"

I saw what it was—a telegram. Oh, how I loathed the sight of the wretched scrap of blue paper, with its red letters! This was it:

"It is too heavy for me. I can not come; but it will be brought home to you, and you will have to pay for it."

What was to be done? I tried to cheer her; told her to hope for the best; that he had sent that hateful message in the heat of passion, which would have subsided over the rational employment of writing a letter. It was with difficulty that I could get her to take a cup of tea. Wearily the hours went on—eight, nine, ten, eleven, midnight—and she sat there dumb, weeping, almost heart-broken.

Suddenly there was the sound of a key in the lock of the outer door, a hoot upon the stair, and her husband burst into the room. He looked with surprised inquiring glances from one of us to the other. Then he spied cry Bertha sprang into his arms, her face upon his shoulder.

"So you have forgiven me, dear William! you have come back to me, and all is well, is well—"

"Come back!" he replied; "of course I have. What ever is the matter, my love?—you got my message, then?—and the turkey's in the passage, I see. You've paid for it, haven't you?"

"Paid for it!—oh, William! Yes! no—what do you mean?"

"Please, ma'am," said the servant-girl, who came in at that moment, "I wished to tell you as the man that hire brought the turkey he's very fast-cousin, and I asked him to step into the kitchen, and he's there now as you was received sufficient for to pay for it."

"I'll go and see to it," said I, and went out of the room, leaving the young couple together.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A NEW VOLUME—Look out for the January Pictorial double number of the ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, with portraits of Kings, Queens, and Emperors; also of Patrick Henry, Edward Everett, F. W. Robertson, and others: leading "Signs of Character;" Races of Men; Science of the Soul; Social Relations, Love, Courtship, and Marriage; Education and Self-Improvement; Choice of Pursuits, with other matters all ought to know, to be found in no other publication. Only $3 a year, or 30 cents a number. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

WORKING MODELS OF STEAM ENGINES, various styles and sizes. Illustrated Catalogues sent on receipt of a postage stamp by O. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau St., New York.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

FEMALE CANVASSERS SPECIALLY WANTED. A superb subscription book—"WORLD-NOTED WOMEN: or, Types of Womanly Attributes of all Lands and Ages." 40 Steel Engravings, and elegant Wood Engravings. Agents wanted in all parts of the country. "It is a work specially suitable for Lady Agents." Address D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers, New York.

BARD & BROTHERS,
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES, SILVER, BUBBER, and GOLD-PLATED PENCILS, GOLD PEN-CASES, TOOTH-PICKS, &c., &c.
JAMES D. BARD, Agent,
No. 22 Maiden Lane, New York.

BAKER'S CHOCOLATE AND COCOA
PARIS EXPOSITION, 1867.

W. BAKER & CO'S
American, French,
Homœopathic
and
VANILLA CHOCOLATE
PREPARED COCOA,
BROMA,
Cocoa Paste, Homœopathic Cocoa, Cocoa Shells, Crushed Cocoa, etc.

Leaf, Flower and Fruit of the Cocoa, with a pod opened.

THESE Manufactures, to which FIRST PREMIUMS have been awarded by the CHIEF JURIES, VOTES and PAIRS of the UNION, and at the PARIS EXPOSITION, 1867, are an excellent diet for invalids and for such persons in health, stay rather than tea or coffee. Sold everywhere. A tendant upon the use of tea or coffee. Sold are recommended by the most eminent physicians.

For sale by the principal Grocers in the United States.

WALTER BAKER & CO.
Dorchester, Mass.

GIVEN AWAY. A Photograph will be sent to you free, on receipt of your address and two postage stamps, by O. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau St., N. Y.

CHASE'S IMPROVED DOLLAR MICROSCOPE. Adapted to all trades and professions. Agents wanted. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1, with directions. Address O. N. CHASE, 81 Washington St., Boston, or FOWLER & WELLS, New York City.

EMPLOYMENT! $16 A DAY and EXPENSES PAID. Circulars free. O. T. GAREY, Biddeford, Me.

$225 A MONTH! 10 new articles for Agents. Address H. E. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

No. 25 Maiden Lane,
New York, Dec. 14, 1867.

In my Card of November 1, 1865, I stated that "for the purpose of more fully supplying the wants of the public, and in order to prevent unscrupulous dealers from palming off inferior and worthless goods as the Morton Gold Pens, I shall hereafter sell no goods at wholesale except only to duly appointed and authorized Agents," &c. To this plan I have since strictly adhered.

In accepting agents great care has been exercised to appoint those who are, by long-continued fair dealing, have acquired a reputation for honesty, responsibility, and probity—men in whose word the public have learned to place confidence. These agents have agreed to keep a full assortment of my pens, and to sell them at my published prices. Hence the public can depend on them with just such pens as they want, either as to writing of price, and get a full equivalent for the money paid.

No agent is appointed to travel from place to place, or canvass the country, so that all who want a Morton Gold Pen must get it from the Local Agent or from headquarters.

None need apply for the Agency except in conformity to the above, the liberal discount "To Clubs" being sufficient inducement to all others.

A. MORTON.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE

THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.

The best and cheapest Gold Pens in the world.
For sale by dealers and upward.
Call at No. 25 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.

THE BEST HOLIDAY PRESENT,
because the most enduring, and a constant remembrance of the giver.

PERMANENT, PERSONAL, AND BEAUTIFUL.

HOTELS AND RESTAURANTS.

The best and cheapest Gold Pens in the world.
Prices, $3 per dozen and upward.
Call at No. 26 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE
O. T. Y. KELLEY & CO., 30 Vesey St., New York, are now supplying families throughout the country with TEAS, warranted in all cases perfectly pure as imported, by purchasing their teas, owing to their six prints of middle-men, which average from 50 cents to $1 50 per pound. Clubs can be formed in city or town, by any person, male or female, and to such as will take the trouble, we will furnish Teas and Coffees for their own use free of charge, to the amount of five per cent of the order they procure. For information, we send, by mail, circulars containing price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club plan submitted to Agents in detail.

We Deliver all goods, collect on delivery, by the Express Company, and members of the Club can divide the Express charges among themselves.

PRICE LIST.

Oolong (black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Mixed (green and black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Young Hyson (green), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Imperial (green), 90, $1 00, $1 25.
Gunpowder (green and black), 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20.
Japan, 90, $1 00, $1 25.
Coffee, 25, $1 50.

We import a very superior quality of Ningpo Oolong and Moyune Young Hyson Tea, put up in original Chinese packages, which we sell at $1 00 the Oolong and $1 00 the Young Hyson, per package.

Ground Coffee, 35c., 38c., 40c. per pound. Best Old Government Java, Ground, 40c.

All goods put up by us bear our trade mark, and no others are genuine. Remember the place,

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of
O. T. Y. KELLEY & CO., 30 Vesey Street,
P. O. Box 574. New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, you can do all your own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen sheet of work, 10 cents. Address, for the present, DAVID WATSON, Agt., Adams Press Co.,
No. 29 Courtlandt Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED.

To sell a new, elegant, perfumed STATIONERY CASE; also ENGRAVINGS, WATCHES, and JEWELRY. Great chance to make money.
HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman St., New York.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

RUPTURE CURED by wearing Wells's Patent Lever Truss pressure on the back), and using Dr. Greene's celebrated Arnica Lotion. A radical cure is warranted. Send a 10 cent stamp for pamphlet.
WELLS'S PATENT LEVER TRUSS CO., 609 Broadway.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

COLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 p lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 p lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 p lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 p lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 p lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 p lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 p lb, best $1 25 p lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrants to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of Clubbing together consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they resided near one of our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much he desires to have, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail. We will put each party's order up in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution —each party receiving his package and paying us the money. We will then forward the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The Rules by which the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be liberal as we can afford. We will be pleased to receive applications for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a paper number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all persons that advertise themselves as connected with this establishment. We have no name either wholly or in part, as they are buyers or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, substitute the name of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

A Beautiful Complexion and Soft Fair Skin is secured by using WRIGHT'S ALCONATED GLYCERINE TABLET OF SOLIDIFIED GLYCERINE.

For sale by all Druggists.

R. & G. A. WRIGHT, Philadelphia.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $65; Eighth Page (or one inch), any for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

VALUABLE AND INTERESTING WORKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the following Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Price.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE and HARPER'S TRADE-LIST sent by Mail on receipt of Five Cents.

Motley's History of the Netherlands.

History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

Fertile as the present has been in historical works of the highest merit, none of them can be ranked above these volumes in the grand qualities of interest, accuracy, and truth.—Edinburgh Review.

Mr. Motley has added to his historian of the United Netherlands—we owe him English homage.—London Times.

This story Dr. Motley has narrated with increase of his old brilliancy of power, and scarcely a page, volume and other by-ways the story is so glowing, nervous, and interesting as in the main details of the marvelous contest.—Athenæum.

This noble work.—Westminster Review.

One of the most fascinating, as well as important histories of the century.—Cor. N. Y. Evening Post.

Mr. Motley's prose epic.—London Spectator.

Its pages are pregnant with instruction.—London Literary Gazette.

His living and truthful picture of events.—London Quarterly Review.

His history is as interesting as a romance, and as reliable as a Government report.—Dublin Review.

A more faithful disciple. We advise every reader whose patriotism is not sufficiently robust to read the inspiriting volumes, assuring him that he will never regret the investment.—Christian Intelligencer.

One of the most fascinating, as well as important histories of the century.—Cor. N. Y. Evening Post.

Mr. Motley's prose epic.—London Spectator.

Its pages are pregnant with instruction.—London Literary Gazette.

His living and truthful picture of events.—London Quarterly Review.

His history is as interesting as a romance, and as reliable as a Government report.—Dublin Review.

A more faithful disciple. We advise every reader whose patriotism is not sufficiently robust to read the inspiriting volumes, assuring him that he will never regret the investment.—Christian Intelligencer.

Smiles's History of the Huguenots.

The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. With an Appendix relating to the Huguenots in America. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled, $1 75.

The wonderful story is told with spirit and accuracy, and in a manner more than ever needed at the present time. The reader is enabled to follow the course of events with pleasure, as lively and effective is the style of the whole narrative. Seldom has so much valuable matter been found between the covers of a single volume as we find in this: and the opinions of the author are as sound as his sentiments are noble. Mr. Smiles's work is written in a philosophical spirit, and helps the reader to a right understanding of the bearing of the great events the history of which is told on other and later times, that are even more interesting. Such an instructive work it would be difficult to name the equal of this.—Boston Traveller.

A most important contribution to a most interesting portion of modern history.—N. Y. Tribune.

An invaluable volume.—N. Y. Tribune.

The author has given his subject the most thorough investigation, and has taken the position among the standard historians of our race.—Methodist.

A most interesting book.—Presbyterian (Phila.).

We can not take leave of the work before us without expressing our satisfaction at finding that the laborious avocations of Mr. Smiles do not preclude him from the careful historical and social subject with the care and study which it demands.—N. Y. Times.

A thoughtful book from a man who has really something to say.—Church Review (N. Y.).

It is one that deserves a wide circulation.—Presbyterian Advocate.

Such an exhaustive, honest, fair, and masterly discussion has been the great want of the Church for some years past.—Presbyterian (Chicago).

The style is dignified, the arguments are conclusive, and the book is an armory of defense against the skepticism and philosophy of the present day.—Protestant Churchman.

Barnes's Evidences of Christianity.

Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in Brick Presbyterian Church, New York, January 21 to February 21, 1867. On the "Ely Foundation" of the Union Theological Seminary. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

We do not remember to be a treatise in the English tongue which goes more thoroughly into foundation principles and which so impartially weighs evidences and disposes once handling them with such inviting perspicuity.—Journal of Presbyterian (Philadelphia).

The subject is handled with great logical vigor.—N. Y. Tribune.

Clearly and powerfully written.—Commercial Advertiser.

He carries on the discussion with his accustomed vigor and sobriety of statement, and with an affluence of learning and knowledge that will make his book a valuable mine for younger clergymen.—S. S. Times.

Will deservedly attract attention, both from the well-earned fame of their author, and from the peculiar tone which is given to the discussion by the fact that the subject is treated with reference to the special demands of the present time.—Congregationalist.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in handling cases made at our own Factory, from the most materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled with 7 rubies, and in all respects such a watch as the best results in regard to time and finish for appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled. Watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time for one year. Price $18. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, but can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. D. COLLINS & CO., 42 and 44 Nassau Street, New York.

525 MILES

OF THE

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD,

RUNNING WEST FROM OMAHA

Across the Continent,

ARE NOW COMPLETED.

This brings the line to the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains, and it is expected that the track will be laid thirty miles farther, to Evans Pass, the highest point on the road, by January. The mountain grade from the foot of the mountains to the summit is but eighty feet to the mile, while that of many Eastern roads is over one hundred. Work in the rock-cuttings on the western slope will continue through the winter, and there is now no reason to doubt that the entire grand line to the Pacific will be open for business in 1870.

The means provided for the construction of this Great National Work are ample. The United States grants its Six Per Cent. Bonds at the rate of from $16,000 to $48,000 per mile, for which it takes a second lien as security, and receives payment to a large extent to the full extent of its claim, in services. These Bonds are issued as each twenty-mile section is finished, and after it has been examined by United States Commissioners and pronounced to be in all respects a first-class road, thoroughly supplied with depots, repair-shops, stations, and all the necessary rolling stock, and fully equipped.

The United States also makes a donation of 12,800 acres of land to the mile, which will be a source of large revenue to the Company. Much of this land in the Platte Valley is among the most fertile in the world, and other large portions are covered with heavy pine forests, and abound in coal of the best quality.

The Company is also authorized to issue its own First Mortgage Bonds to the amount equal to the issue of the Government and no more. Hon. E. D. Morgan and Hon. Oakes Ames are Trustees for the Bondholders, and deliver the Bonds to the Company only as the work progresses, so that they always represent an actual and productive value.

The authorized capital of the Company is One Hundred Million Dollars, of which over Five Millions have been paid in upon the work already done.

EARNINGS OF THE COMPANY.

At present the profits of the Company are derived only from its local traffic, but this is already much more than sufficient to pay the interest on all the Bonds the Company can issue, if not another mile were built. It is not doubted that when the road is completed the through traffic of the only line connecting the Atlantic and Pacific States will be large beyond precedent, as there will be no competition, it can always be done at profitable rates.

It will be noticed that the Union Pacific Railroad is in fact a Government road, and is under the supervision of Government officers, and to a large extent with Government money, and that its Bonds are issued under Government direction. It is believed that no similar security is more carefully guarded, and certainly no other is based upon a larger or more valuable property. As the Company's are offered for the present at 90 CENTS ON THE DOLLAR, they are the cheapest security in the market, being more than 15 per cent. lower than U. S. Stocks. They pay

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

SIX PER CENT. IN GOLD,

or over NINE PER CENT. upon the investment, and have thirty years to run before maturity. Subscriptions will be received in New York at the Company's Office, No. 20 Nassau Street, and by

CONTINENTAL NATIONAL BANK, 7 Nassau St.,
CLARK, DODGE & CO., Bankers, 51 Wall St.,
JOHN J. CISCO & SON, Bankers, 33 Wall St.,

and by the Company's advertised Agents throughout the United States. Remittances should be made in Drafts or other funds par in New York, and the Bonds will be sent free of charge by return express. Parties subscribing through local Agents will look to them for their safe delivery.

A NEW PAMPHLET AND MAP, showing the Progress of the Work, Resources for Construction, and Value of Bonds, may be obtained at the Company's Office or of its advertised Agents, or will be sent free on application.

JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer,
New York.

November 23, 1867.

ARCHITECTURAL

IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings in every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

The Best are the Cheapest.

MASON & HAMLIN, having been awarded a GRAND PRIZE FOR THEIR CABINET ORGANS, and the only Prize Medal for Cabinet Organs at the Paris Exposition, in competition with the best makers of instruments of this class from all nations, and having been unanimously awarded the Highest Medals at the only other Exhibitions of Industrial Products of a series of years, with scarcely any exceptions, HAVE CAUSED TO PLACE THEIR INSTRUMENTS IN CONSERVATORIES at such exhibitions. They respectfully announce this fact that the public may not receive wrong impressions from announcements of premiums taken by other makers. Many celebrated European Organists have added their testimony to that of the great majority of the most eminent musicians of this country in the unequaled excellence of the Mason & Hamlin Cabinet Organs. Prices, $55 to $600 and upward, may be uniform and invariable; and but little higher than those of greatly inferior instruments. Circulars with full particulars to any address.

Warerooms,—274 FREMONT STREET, BOSTON.
596 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

HOFF'S
MALT
EXTRACT.
A Luxury and HYGIENIC BEVERAGE
BASE FOR MALT WINES
WONDERFULLY IN PA-TIENTS suffering from DYSPEPSIA
TION HERE BUT A SHORT TIME AGO, IT RECEIVED THE UNQUALIFIED APPROBATION OF THE FACULTY, AND IN PRESENTING HAS VOLUMES OF CREDENTIALS ALREADY FROM THE LEADING PHYSICIANS AND PHYSI-CIANS OF THE COUNTRY AS TO ITS HEALTH-
GIVING AND REJUVENATING QUALI-TIES." HOFF'S MALT EXTRACT BEVER-AGE OF HEALTH IS ALSO A VERY GOOD REMEDY FOR DYSPEPTICS, CONVALESCENTS, AND PERSONS
AFFECTED WITH COLDS,
DISORDERS, &c., AND SHOULD BE SOLD AT THE DEPOT,
No. 542 BROADWAY,
N. Y., AND EVERY WHERE.
HOFF, No. 542
BROADWAY.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

JANUARY, 1868.

In the present Number is commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by DINAH MULOCK CRAIK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 will be commenced the first of "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated, Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Creese," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, well deserves become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR, will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $2 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, each containing the Numbers for Three Months, for $1 00, sent by mail, postage paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly in advance, quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

SKETCH ON BROADWAY.

OLD GENT FROM NEW JERSEY. "Hold up, Matilda! Here comes a Procession!"

OLD LADY. "Lor, so it is! Well now, them must be the Odd Fellows what we been a-hearin' tell of."

Our Entire Stock

IS NOW OFFERED AT

REDUCED PRICES,

In view of our REMOVAL up town in the Spring. WHITE CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 145 pieces, $20.

PLATED WARE FROM ROGERS, SMITH & CO.

GOLD-EDGE TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $11.

DECORATED TEA SETS, $15.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 479 Broadway. 4 doors below Broome Street.

Chickering & Sons' American Pianos.

FIRST GRAND PRIZE, THE HIGHEST AWARD, THE LEGION OF HONOR, FOR THE CHICKERING PIANO.

MARKING SIXTY-THREE FIRST PREMIUMS DURING THE PAST FORTY-FOUR YEARS.

WAREROOMS:
652 Broadway, New York;
246 Washington St., Boston.

GOLD PENS,

Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Repointing at 50 cents each by mail. Manufactory 15 Maiden Lane. E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

NOTICE.

TO

"ALL MEN WHO USE PLANE IRONS."

We hereby authorize all "HARDWARE DEALERS" to allow their customers to try our "CLOVER-LEAF PLANE IRONS," and, if not PERFECTLY SUITED, take them back, refund price paid, and charge same over to us.

WE WANT MECHANICS AND DEALERS TO RUN NO RISK IN BUYING OUR PLANE IRONS.

See that our

TRADE MARK

Is on each Iron.

REYNOLDS, BARBER & CO.,
STEEL TEMPERING WORKS,
AUBURN, N. Y.

PRINCE & CO'S. AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.

Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

A POSITIVE CURE is to be found in WHITE PINE COMPOUND for all troubles of the Throat, Lungs, Chest, and Kidneys. Try it and be convinced.

Popular Goods

at

Popular Prices

FOR BOYS AND MISSES.

BALMORAL AND ROB ROY STOCKINGS.
CLOTH AND FANCY KNIT GAITERS.
MERINO UNDER VESTS AND DRAWERS.
CLOTH, KID, AND BEAVER GLOVES.
FANCY GLOVES AND INFANTEES.
COMFORTERS, SCARFS, HOODS.
GARIBALDI AND CARDIGAN JACKETS.

A LARGE VARIETY OF ELEGANT GOODS AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway.

TURNER'S TIC DOULOUREUX OR Universal Neuralgia PILL.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.

Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cents. Six do., $5.00, postage 24 cts.; twelve do., $10.00, postage 48 cts. Sold by druggists.

TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,

And others would send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

WANTED, AGENTS, $75 to $200 per month; every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner.

Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We say agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURG, Pa., or BOSTON, Mass.

Caution.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties selling off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap family machine manufactured.

DOLLAR & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum goods, 27 John St., near Nassau, and 627 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 3846.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.

ENGINEER'S TRANSIT $150
Y LEVEL 100
NORRIS COMPASS, 6 inch 75
" " 5 " 40

Other Instruments reduced in proportion, and each one guaranteed as usual. Send for a circular.

BLUNT & NICHOLS,
179 Water Street, New York.

Parlor Fireworks.

New, Brilliant, and Harmless. Splendid Evening Amusement. Boxes assorted. From the reliable XLCR Firework Manufactory.

W. R. SCOFIELD, 9 Dey St., New York.

$2 and $3 per Box.

$25 PER DAY. Agents wanted in every city to sell Patent Porcelain-lined Gaslight Reflectors, for store windows. Excels all others. Never tarnishes nor grows dull. Four lights equal to any other eight lights. For further particulars, address

GREAT AMERICAN REFLECTOR COMPANY,
Office, 312 and 314 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.

New Designs, $1 50 postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,
ARCHITECT, 191 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

J. C. HULL'S SON,
New York.

BAY RUM SOAP

Over 100 Styles Toilet Soaps. NONE BETTER IMPORTED.

NO ONE NEED BE IN THE DARK.
ALL TRAVELERS SHOULD USE THE

Pocket Lantern

VERY LIGHT, STRONG, AND DURABLE. Can be folded and carried in the pocket or traveling-bag with safety and convenience, occupying the space of a cigar-case, and are opened and closed as readily. They contain, whether open or closed, matches and extra candles, and, being always ready for use,

Are most Appreciated in the Greatest Emergencies.

Dealers and canvassers supplied at following rates, on receipt of orders accompanied with remittances:

	Part doz.	Part two.	1 gross.
No. 1—2 Candles in ea.	$1 00 ea.	$8 50 doz.	$8 00 doz.
No. 3— "	75 "	6 50 "	6 00 "

PURE SPERM CANDLES.

	Less than 12 lbs.	12 lbs.	40 lbs. (1 case.)
No. 1—20 to the lb.	$1 00 lb.	$0 75 lb.	$0 70 lb.
No. 3—30 " "	1 25 "	95 "	90 "

JULIUS IVES & CO., 49 Maiden Lane, New York,
Manufacturers and Dealers in Kerosene Goods generally, and Importers of Lamps.

IVES PATENT LAMPS,

THE SAFEST, MOST CONVENIENT, AND IN EVERY WAY THE BEST LAMP EVER USED.

CHANDELIERS, BRACKETS, HANGING, AND TABLE LAMPS OF ALL KINDS, CAN BE LIGHTED AS QUICKLY AS GAS, FILLED AND TRIMMED SAFELY AND NEATLY ALL WITHOUT REMOVING THE SHADE, GLOBE OR CHIMNEY, OR UNSCREWING THE BURNER.

$20. Gold Coin. $20.

The new business cards, to imitate $20 gold pieces. Ornamental and useful, and the best advertising medium, as each one looks exactly like them. Manufactured by W. T. & J. MERSEREAU, 62 Dunne Street.

AGENTS WANTED.

NEW CYCLOPÆDIA of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature. By Drs. M'Clintock and Strong. A complete Theological Library, embracing the features of all Biblical and Theological Cyclopædias extant.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS wanted in all parts of the country to canvass for this valuable work. Sold by subscription only. Address

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

LIST OF

NEW BOOKS.

I.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By John Lothrop Motley, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

II.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By Samuel Smiles, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

III.

DUFF'S BOOK-KEEPING, by Single and Double Entry. Practically Illustrating Merchants', Manufacturers', Private Bankers', Railroad, and National Bank Accounts, including all the late Improvements in the Science. With a Copious Index. By P. Duff, formerly Merchant, Founder and Proprietor of Duff's Mercantile College, Pittsburgh, Pa. 26th Edition, Enlarged and Revised. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

IV.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By Lucy Randall Comfort. With Engravings. Square 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

V.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 21 to February 21, 1867. On the "Ey Foundation" of the Union Theological Seminary. By Albert Barnes, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

VI.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dreams, Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $2 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

VII.

MACÉ'S FAIRY BOOK. Home Fairy Tales (Contes du Petit-Château). By Jean Macé, Author of "The Servants of the Stomach," &c. Translated by Mary L. Booth, Translator of "Martin's History of France," "Laboulaye's Fairy Book," &c. With Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

VIII.

THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By Goldwin Smith, Author of "Lectures on the Study of History," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

IX.

AGNES STRICKLAND'S QUEENS of ENGLAND. Lives of the Queens of England. From the Norman Conquest. By Agnes Strickland, Author of "Lives of the Queens of Scotland." Abridged by the Author. Revised and Edited by Caroline G. Thayer. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. (Uniform with the Student's Histories.)

X.

HASWELL'S ENGINEERS' AND MECHANICS' POCKET-BOOK. Twenty-first Edition, revised and enlarged. By Chas. H. Haswell, Civil and Marine Engineer. 663 pages, 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $3 00.

Just adopted by the United States Navy and Treasury Departments.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By Annie Thomas. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

GUILD COURT. A London Story. By George Mac Donald. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE BROTHERS' BET, or, Within Six Weeks. By Emile Eayaré Carlen. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By Sarah Tytler. 12mo, Cloth, $1 20.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the Author of "Paul Music." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CARLYON'S YEAR. By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

STONE EDGE. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

CIRCE: or, Three Acts in the Life of an Artist. By Babington White. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE TENANTS OF MALORY. By J. S. Le Fanu. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BIRDS OF PREY. By M. E. Braddon. Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE CURATE'S DISCIPLINE. By Mrs. Eiloart. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 578.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE LATE EARTHQUAKE AT ST. THOMAS.

We have before given some account and illustrations of the effects of the late earthquakes and tornadoes which lately visited the West Indies. Among other illustrations was one showing the effect of the great tidal wave which accompanied the earthquake upon the United States steamer Monongahela. It will be remembered that this vessel was washed out of the ocean, over the warehouses of the town of St. Croix to the market-place, and again carried back over the same warehouses, and landed high and dry on a coral bank on the edge of the town. We give below an illustration showing this same disastrous tidal wave at the moment it struck the English steamer La Plata while lying at Water Island, three miles from St. Thomas. This tidal wave is described by those who saw it as "a monstrous breaker, or rather a sea-wall, variously estimated at from thirty to sixty feet high, and flowing at a rate of at least fifty miles an hour."

The La Plata had a very narrow escape. She had commenced coaling and taking cargo on board from three large hulks alongside, 100 or 200 negroes being employed upon the work, with their usual clatter and noise. When the earthquake occurred, it was felt quite as strongly in the ship as ashore. Some thought the boiler had burst; some that the ship was struck by whales. But the excitement was great, and the negroes were as wild with panic as those ashore. The alarm had scarcely subsided when there was a cry of "It's coming: it's coming!" The negroes swarmed on deck, the sailors rushed up the rigging, and the great wave was seen sweeping along in unchecked fury and stretching the whole width of the horizon. There was a roar like thunder. Captain REVETT seized the wheel and endeavored to present the stern of the ship to the advancing wall; but it struck her on the starboard quarter. Though she reeled, groaned, and staggered with the blow, the wave passed her with no more serious injury than a shattered bulwark and a few tons of salt-water on her decks. The passengers were landed for safety at Water Island, and sent round to St. Thomas, where the La Plata subsequently had to proceed for repairs and to coal. A complimentary address was subsequently presented to Captain REVETT by the passengers, for his conduct and that of his crew under the trying circumstances they were placed in. It will be remembered that over eighty vessels were lost by the earthquake and hurricane at St. Thomas.

THE WEST INDIA EARTHQUAKES—EFFECT OF THE TIDAL WAVE AT ST. THOMAS ON THE STEAMER "LA PLATA

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1868.

LEAVE WELL ENOUGH ALONE.

THE Reconstruction Act is already in active operation, and any essential change in it would inevitably awaken suspicions which would endanger the purpose contemplated by the bill. The country fully understands the necessity and the principle of the course pursued by Congress. The late rebel States could be reorganized only by those who rebelled or by the whole body of their people. To say that the United States were compelled to intrust reconstruction exclusively to those who were disaffected, when there was an immense loyal population at their sides, is the sheerest folly. The Constitution which authorized the war does not demand the abdication of common-sense in regulating reconstruction.

We were constantly told during the war, and certainly nobody familiar with our political history, and who reasoned from observation of human nature, doubted that the great multitude of the old political class in the Southern States heartily and sincerely sustained the rebellion. They believed in the righteousness of slavery, and in the constitutionality of secession. Their belief has not changed. They have simply seen that they are not able to put their faith into practice, and they have ceased to try. That is all. We ought to be supposed to be very angry with it. But we should be unspeakably silly if we acted as if this were not the fact.

In dealing with it certain grave risks must be taken. That was inevitable. The question was bent from the moment of the full of the rebellion upon the speediest reconstruction. Instinctively it rejected the plan of the President to authorize only those who rebelled to reorganize the States. The opposite plan, that of vesting political power in those States in all the people here they are always loyal, with certain not numerous exceptions, has become familiar in all its details, and is accepted by the dominant party of the country. In that plan there are certain obvious and necessary risks, and in some of its details it has been wisely corrected. But if is in operation; it is fully recognized; it is seen to be neither impracticable nor extravagant; it is opposed only by those who deny the power of Congress to intervene at all, and who insist that the old political class in the late rebel States, and those only, are the authorities, are the sole rightful voters to whose mercies the whole body of the population must be subjected. All these things are evident. The country understands perfectly well that the Democratic opposition to the present national policy is founded upon the fact that it tends to impair the political disaffected strength of the South, which is, as it always was, Democratic. The Republicans are willing to risk the disaffected vote, with the exceptions named, upon condition that the loyal people are not excluded.

It would be a great mistake, therefore, essentially to change the Reconstruction law, unless it became evident that its purpose could not be secured by its present provisions. It is the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and in such matters Congress may prescribe in the laws. If he fails or refuses, it is the duty of Congress to impeach him. But if his conduct, in the opinion of Congress, does not justify impeachment it is not wise to attempt to create another executive, or to arouse even a suspicion of such an attempt. The great mass of the loyal Union men in the country is the earliest restoration of the Union lately in rebellion to their practical relations in the Union, upon condition of the security of the equal rights of their citizens. The risk to be taken is, that with this condition these States might vote with the Democratic party, which is a standing menace to the Union. But this is a necessary risk. When the political power of all citizens is secured in the Southern States this risk must be taken. The defense against it, provided by the Reconstruction Bill itself, is the 14th Constitutional Amendment. There can be no other permanent security of the political power of the whole people in any State, except by a Constitutional Amendment forbidding disfranchisement on account of color, or by a law of Congress to the same effect.

We are not aware that any large number of persons once enfranchised in this country have afterward been deprived of the ballot; and we doubt if the good sense of the American people will allow the experiment to be tried upon so tremendous a scale, and with so enormous a risk, as it would be in the Southern States. A class or race which has no political power is really at the mercy of that which has; and this condition is peculiarly perilous where one class has an especial hostility toward the other. This is, from obvious causes, the case in the Southern States, and of itself would forbid the disfranchisement of the Freedmen. Besides, their share in political power is now felt to be a national necessity, and should any State restored to the Union, with a constitution securing equal rights, undertake to disfranchise a virtual half of its population, a Constitutional Amendment settling the point forever would be passed by the other States. In some of the Southern States, also, the vote of those sought to be disfranchised would defeat such a proposition.

We trust, therefore, that no serious change will be attempted in the Reconstruction policy. It presents plainly the real question before the country; and, unless the political reaction is to be as overwhelming as that which brought back CHARLES THE SECOND to the throne of his father's throne, and which naturally and inevitably ended in another revolution that secured the result which the rebellion had delayed, it is safe to say that the new citizens in the Southern States will remain voters.

THE STATE AND NATIONAL CONVENTIONS.

THE Republican Convention of this State to elect delegates to the National Convention will meet in Syracuse on the 6th of February. The State Convention in 1864 expressed its unanimous preference for ABRAHAM LINCOLN for the Presidency. It did so obedience to the conviction of the great body of Republicans in the State that while there might be many worthy men, he, under all the circumstances, was the best man. Hitherto the Republicans who assent to the Convention as peculiarly the proper candidate as ABRAHAM LINCOLN seemed in 1864, we hope it will not fail to say so.

The National Convention will certainly nominate no man of whose sympathy with their principles and purpose the delegates are not fully assured, although the choice of the whole convention may be very various. The nomination will be the expression of a profound conviction that the candidate is not only a man of sagacity and executive ability, but of fidelity to the, in the words of General GRANT, a man who "is universally and deservedly beloved by the people who have sustained this Government through its trials, and feared by those who would still be the enemies of the Government." Such a man or necessity is politically a Republican, because every man in the country who, in the language of GRANT'S words, would still be an enemy of the Government adheres to the Democratic party, and votes for the Democratic candidates and policy.

The Convention will not forget that the office of the President is executive. This fact has been sternly illustrated during the present term. Because the President is to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States" MR. JOHNSON has an absurd idea that he is in some mysterious manner the representative of the popular will than Congress, and may assume in the name of the people to maintain his theory of constitutional requirement against Congress. A very few words explode this pretense. The President is to defend the Constitution constitutionally, and not otherwise; and the Constitutional powers conferred with his veto, and his veto has been constitutionally overcome, his constitutional interference is exhausted, and his constitutional duty is to execute the laws within the directions of Congress. This is a government of checks and balances, but they are very precisely defined and by express terms are intended to be fixed than the executive, because "the fathers" foresaw exactly the Presidential assumption which we daily see. They meant, of course, that he should execute the laws, but emphatically should reside somewhere, and they properly vested it at last in the immediate representatives of the people.

A President with a "policy" therefore is an anomaly and an absurdity in our system. He will, of course, have his preferences and opinions; he will be bound to give them in the figure and of official duty: and he will not hesitate to veto whatever measure he disapproves. But beyond this the President can not constitutionally go. When he spreads his "policy" before to the people against these representatives, the only proper reply, if any body chooser to reply at all to a suggestion who so studiously misconceives his office, is that upon his own ground the opinion of two hundred representatives of the people ought to prevail against that of one representative. A President who, like JOHNSON, prostituted their office to the basest purposes, but in what may be called a legitimate way. That is, who used the enormous policy of their party majority in Congress. But MR. JOHNSON, bred in the same school—but who should have been warning enough so the Republican party—has endeavored to him to familiarize the country with the theory that the President is not so much the executive of the people will in Congress as the immediate representative of the sovereignty of the people, and that therefore Congress should in its some way accountable to him as it is to them.

Of this theory and its consequences the country has had enough, and except for the preposterous assertion of it by the President the Southern States would now be peacefully restored to the Union. We anticipate, therefore, from the National Convention the nomination of a man who holds the simple, Constitutional view of the Presidency: who sees in the policy of the people's representatives the will of the people: whose sagacity and firmness will be the pledge that whatever he recommends will be wise and conciliatory, and that whatever the people in Congress decree will be done. That is to say, we expect the nomination of General GRANT.

DOUBLE ALLEGIANCE.

IT is pleasant to see that sensible Englishmen perceive the absurdity of the English theory of indienable allegiance, and wish a friendly and reasonable settlement of the question. "Historians," which is the signature in the Times of Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, has written a letter in which he calmly discusses the subject, and we commend his temper and candor to the orators who may be expected at the American meetings upon the same topic. "If modern civilization means any thing at all," says Historicus, "it surely means that nations should be enabled, in free and friendly debate, to adjust in the spirit of their laws to the necessities of modern society and the accommodation of conflicting claims."

It seems that the English doctrine of allegiance is even more absurd than we had supposed. All persons born within the British dominions are British subjects, whether their parents are or not; and the children and grandchildren of all such persons, wherever born, are equally British subjects. So, if the wife of a Frenchman who has never been out of France, nor any of his ancestors before him, should chance to be passing a week in England, and to be confined there, her son, although taken home to France as soon as the mother can travel, and never leaving France again, is a British subject. Moreover, his son in turn is also a British subject, and, in any French war against England, he should bear arms for his native land, and be taken prisoner, he could be tried and executed in England for high treason! This is a fully conceivable case that the simple statement disposes of it.

The doctrine of indissoluble allegiance is derived from the feudal system, when every man was connected with a superior, and in the Middle Ages, when he left the realm, he was supposed to be evading an obligation. Modern society, with its facilities of travel and intercourse, and the immense currents of emigration, have entirely changed the principles upon which the old doctrine was founded. This is plainly felt in England, and the daily practice recognizes it the fact and not to the theory. Even when it has threatened to carry out the theory it has failed to do it. An American overcomes the case of MACDONALD, who, although born in England, lived always in France, and being taken prisoner while acting under a French commission, was convicted of high treason, but finally pardoned on condition of leaving the kingdom forever. In 1812, also, England asserted the doctrine of indissoluble allegiance against the United States, but the United States asserted several British officers and held them as hostages for the men, naturalized in this country, whom England threatened to hang as traitors. Of course, they were not hung; and although in the Treaty of Ghent England did not agree to relinquish her claim, it was perfectly well understood that she would not attempt to enforce it.

The true doctrine of citizenship Historicus thinks is laid down in the Code Napoleon, "that naturally expatriation from the dominion of the Roman law and accommodated with rare sagacity to the conditions of modern civilization." The French code requires any Frenchman to renounce his citizenship by acquiring naturalization in a foreign country, or by the acceptance of public service in a foreign state without authority from his own. But a French subject can always regain his allegiance by returning with permission to France, and declaring his intention to reside there, or with re-establishing his foreign citizenship. In the spirit of this system Historicus proposes that British citizenship should belong as of course only to persons born of British parents domiciled in the British dominions. Children born to foreigners in such dominions should have the right to choose their nationality, and so will the children born to British parents domiciled abroad. Every British subject should be able by a formal act to renounce his allegiance; and, as in France, absence for ten years should constitute in themselves a forfeiture of citizenship.

Meanwhile the views of this great subject held by the United States and Great Britain are so totally unlike each other that collision must inevitably lead sooner or later to the very gravest difficulty, unless Great Britain wholly renounces her theory in practice. And if she does, why should she delay harmonizing them? It is a subject in which no powers in the world are so much interested as the two which speak the same language, have similar political and legal systems, strive to extend the limits of individual liberty. The character and the civilization of both demand that so serious a question be settled without delay and without acrimony. The necessity of such a settlement is emphasized by the present disturbances in England, often arising from the conduct or connivance of those whom both Governments claim as citizens. As Historicus truly says, the more plainly Irish naturalized citizens of the United States are recognized by Great Britain the more distinct is the responsibility of the United States for their indemnification while as offenders against the British local law there is no question of their liability. Indeed nothing is gained by further postponement of the question, and much is endangered; while every thoughtful citizen of the world must earnestly wish to deprive demagogues every where of the opportunity constantly offered them in the present condition of the subject of doing a great and fatal mischief.

ENGLISHMEN UPON IRELAND.

AN article in an English magazine, supposed to be written by an American Fenian, has created some attention as a candid statement of the Irish side of the Irish question. It asserts unqualifiedly that what the Fenians desire is Ireland for the Irish and that they look upon all the promised reforms as bribes to seduce true patriots from a righteous purpose. The English, argues the writer, have no more right in Ireland than the Austrians had in Italy, or than Russia has in Poland; and if England sympathized with the Italians struggling to throw off the Austrian yoke, and with the Poles battling ineffectually with Russia, with infinitely more reason ought it to understand the suffering of Ireland caused by a similar foreign domination. The writer declares that the science of KELLY and the killing of BRETT were merely acts of war; and if committed by illadvised and desperate men they do not affect the merits of the cause. "The Irish race," the article, "pretends to think the worse of Poland because a crazy youth fired a pistol at the Russian Emperor in the Bois de Boulogne, and why should Fenianism be condemned because a man wearing a felt-hat shot a bandsman in London?"

There is no doubt that the public mind in England is extremely troubled by the Fenian operations. They show a deliberate purpose to inspire a general terror. The London Times denounces them as horrible and repugnant to every manly generous and just sentiment of the Irish, or of the Fenian Irish, as a race beyond hope of true civilization. A writer in the Pall Mall Gazette declares that it is impossible to contest the Fenian Irish; that "you may satisfy material interests, you can never fulfill a romantic idea." It contends that there are two nations in Ireland, that the English could not leave one to the mercy of the other, and that nothing remains but to redress every real grievance and remove every rational cause of irritation, to put down settled rebellion with promptitude and severe determination, and trust to time. MR. GOLDWIN SMITH, who, as a supporter of political change, and a special student of Ireland, must always command serious attention, writes that, in his judgment, the peril of Fenianism is great. "We seem," he says, "to be on the brink of a tremendous struggle with the Irish of the two hemispheres, and this at a moment when English society itself presents some very sinister appearances, and when organic change, involving a great transfer of power, is being carried on by such hands as never before, I believe, held the destinies of this nation."

GOLDWIN SMITH does not think that it is possible to do what extreme Fenianism demands. The remedy of the difficulty, in his judgment, is such a policy of decentralization, short of actual dissolution of the union between England and Ireland, as will satisfy the national aspiration. He would give the county and municipalities at Dublin to make that city a real capital; then he would have a session of Parliament, say one in every three years, in Dublin; and finally a liberal system of local self-government, such as a council in each province, subject to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, which should be elective and legislate on all subjects not essential to the political and legal unity of the empire. Of course he would have the Irish church establishment abolished, and allow each provincial council to deal with the own portion of the endowments. This general policy, MR. SMITH thinks, ought to satisfy all but the violent enemies of the Union.

MR. GLADSTONE says that in his opinion Ireland will for a long time be the most difficult and anxious problem of British statesmanship. He, too, confesses to sympathy in Fenianism with the cause of Ireland, but insists that the recent crimes of Fenianism shall not warp justice. MR. GLADSTONE himself is very just in his views of Ireland, and is most considerate and generous in his words. He declares that England ought to set herself right in the management of Ireland; that the present Irish tenure, the system of education, the land tenure, and the church establishment must all be radically reformed, and reformed now. He alludes to Scotland, and to the different attitudes of that country resulting from a different and a wiser policy; and although he does not enter into details, it is plain that his views are not seriously different from those of GOLDWIN SMITH.

JOHN BRIGHT also, in a most forcible speech, declares that the Irish question has within it perils such as England has not known for a long time, and which he does not dare publicly to discuss. If there is yet to be what, he says, there never has been, a United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, it is to be founded upon great measures of statesmanship and justice, and it is because the British Government has not been a Government of statesmen that Irish affairs have become so difficult and dangerous.

It is evident that one of three courses must now be adopted by England: Either the present situation must be maintained, which no sensible man desires; or the Union must be repealed, and Ireland suffered to become as independent a nation as France, which England will not permit; or there must be so generous and prompt a radical redress of the undoubted grievances of the island that the real intelligence and character of the people will positively assert the supremacy of the Union, and so make it one of cordial assent. This is the policy advocated by the English Liberals, to whom the wisest Irish ought to look as their best friends. Meanwhile we shall not be surprised by the most radically Liberal proposition from Mr. DISRAELI, for the last consideration which will occur to him is that of Tory precedent. He will not hesitate to be more liberal than the Liberals in an Irish policy as he was in a Reform policy. It seems, indeed, as if England had begun to see that she had to be as wise in the management of Ireland as she was in that of Scotland, the Irish Union would now be as firm as the Scotch. It is time for us to be done with the errors of the past as no justification of future errors.

WAGES.

On the principle that "misery loves company," it may console us to reflect that the condition of trade in England and the Continent is even less encouraging than in the United States. It may afford some selfish satisfaction to know that the distress there is mainly due to commercial derangement here, so much are foreign nations dependent upon the course of the American market for a full measure of prosperity; and that an inconsiderable increase in our imports would set the machinery of nearly of the Old World in active motion again. We may congratulate ourselves that we have had few failures compared with other countries, and no panic, notwithstanding the universal depression. As Commissioner WELLS affirms, our credit stands as high as that of any other nation.

But our immediate concern is, not so much how others may fare, as how to keep distress from our own doors—how to prevent further accretions to the industrial army of the idle and unemployed whom the United States is at present compelled to subsist. Mechanics, laborers, operatives, and all who depend upon wages and salaries for a livelihood, should take a comprehensive common-sense view of the situation. For several years past they have enjoyed a compensation out of all proportion to the ordinary awards of labor, but they can not expect, under present circumstances, any longer to receive the extraordinary wages of the past. It is no time to "strike" when mills are running at a loss or barely paying expenses. A reduction of wages must be philosophically submitted to, or workmen will inevitably be thrown out of employment. This has happened in numerous instances already.

We instance the case of the HOOSIER carpet establishment in this city, which was closed recently, and several hundred operatives thrown out of employment because they would not concede the very small reduction of ten per cent. of their wages. We see in mind a recent large newspaper office in New York where the printers recently threw up their situations because the proprietors would not submit to their conditions. This was only a few weeks ago, and now the present employés of the same establishment threaten a "strike" unless higher wages are paid them, although present wages are nearly double what they received before the war.

We were about to congratulate ourselves upon the absence hitherto of all labor disorganization, the absence hitherto of all attempts at a realizing sense of innate human folly by a procession of masons in Brooklyn, demanding a reduction of time and the addition of a dollar per day to their wages! Six dollars per day of eight hours' labor! Why, half the men in business would be glad to be assured as much profit as that. The difference between prices and wages is already so great that capital is obliged to be idle because it can not afford to employ labor. It is easy to see that such demands can not possibly be conceded in the present state of affairs. Business necessity is inexorable. The day of advancing wages is past, and the tendency must be downward for some time to come, unless business should suddenly revive.

We could enumerate many manufactories in this city which are now either running on short time or paying reduced wages. In the country at large they number a majority of the whole. It is more than probable that the pinch will be still tighter before spring. It is foreshadowed by the movements of mill-owners and capitalists, who are meeting in convention to devise plans for relief.

It is true that there are indications which encourage the hope of a general improvement; but so much depends upon Congressional legislation that the present aspect of the horizon seems darker from the very uncertainty that broods over it. In the present critical emergency, employés who still retain their places should feel thankful, while those who are threatened with reduced wages should bear ever in mind that "half a loaf is better than no bread." Indeed, we may regard ourselves fortunate if we are not brought to that pass, now so common in Paris, where hungry thousands are daily fed as charitable soup-houses.

EARLY FRUIT.

THE fruit of the "Great Reaction" is rapidly ripening. The Ohio Democratic Convention nominated for the Governorship, in a "burst of enthusiasm," the Honorable GEORGE H. PENDLETON, who voted against every war appropriation, and insisted that the erring Southern should depart in peace, and who—since his advice was not taken—now advocates a virtual repudiation of the national debt. In the same State, and by the same party, the claims of the Honorable CLEMENT L. VALLANDIGHAM to a seat in the United States Senate are enthusiastically urged upon all friends of the "Great Reaction," by persons who have no "Reaction" being that he was as good a secessionist as the Honorable JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The Indiana Democratic Convention also resolved "that language is not adequate to express our abhorrence and condemnation" of Radicalism; and the enthusiastic body instantly proceeded to nominate Mr. HENDRICKS for the Presidency; and listened to a speech of congratulation from that distinguished Knight of the Golden Circle, or the friend of that fraternity, Mr. VORHEES; and, after crying aloud for payment of a part of the national debt in paper, and protesting unconditionally against foreign suffrage, and eulogizing General GRANT as a second WASHINGTON, the enthusiastic body adjourned.

In West Virginia, also, the disciples of the "Great Reaction" have a Convention, and the nominating of the resolutions from Ohio "indorsing PENDLETON for the Presidency * * * created the wildest excitement. Business was suspended, the Convention becoming perfectly uncontrollable."

Besides all this luscious fruit from the teeming boughs of the "Great Reaction" there was the delightful 8th of January dinner in Washington, at which Mr. JEREMIAH BLACK, who advised Mr. BUCHANAN that he had no authority to prevent secession, proposed that General JACKSON who resisted nullification have left the weight of the General's finger during the late unpleasantness; and that a crowning grace might not be wanting, Governor FISHER, who wrote a letter to JEFFERSON DAVIS in the winter of 1861, assuring him that the war would be fought out at the North, wrote a letter congratulating the company upon the good time coming.

The resuscitation of every notorious Copperhead to control the Government against the Union party, and to express his warm sympathies during the war, is the beautiful plum which the "Great Reaction" offers the country.

STOVES AND SEATS IN CARS.

Editor Harper's Weekly:

NEW YORK, Jan. 3, 1868.

Your very sensible and seasonable article in the Harper's Weekly of the 11th instant headed "The Tragedy of Travel" suggests as a means of relief to the draught about feet and legs that double doors at each end of the cars would remedy the difficulty.

I am glad the suggestion has been made through your very interesting Weekly; but I think the following plan would be better than the double-door system. It is based upon the fact that stoves under the bottom of the seats and the floor of the car, that will effectually stop all currents and draughts, and rid the passenger of the pitiful misery.

Double doors would only partially remedy the difficulty, at the same time it would have the undesirable effect of stopping ventilation of the very limited amount of fresh air that is now allowed to enter the cars.

Now to have the stove question in connection with railroading, I would suggest, as an immediate improvement that should be adopted till something better can be introduced, that stoves for passenger cars should be made out of light boiler-plate iron. They should be strongly riveted together, and the floor should be so made and arranged that when closed it would be as strong as the body of the stove; and the passage to the smoke-pipe should not be the same large hole as now made, but the top of the stove where the pipe joins should be contracted to a small hole of the regular size to give the required area for draught.

Now, Mr. Editor, I assert as an engineer that a stove so constructed will successfully resist all the jamming and crushing that can be administered by the severest accident that can happen on a railroad without rupturing or bursting open and scattering the fire broadcast among the kindling-wood of a demolished passenger coach and consequent fire. That being the case, it would be impossible to have a repetition of the recent Lake Shore tragedy.

If the Railroad Companies will not adopt a safety-stove as above described they should be compelled to fit a small steam-pump to the locomotive, with a sufficient length of hose to reach the rear coach of the longest train. Then, in case of fire, the water from the tender tank could be used to extinguish any fire that might take place. Still, I would advise the use of the stoves as above described, as it might happen that the tank might be empty, or nearly so, at the critical moment.

NAVAL ENGINEER.

A LITTLE TESTIMONY.

THE breaking up by a mob of a loyal meeting in TEXAS, and the shooting of a Republican orator, make the following letter of A. J. HAMILTON, the first Provisional Governor, peculiarly significant and timely. In a late speech at AUSTIN he said, and General GRANT has well to forget the Presidency for a moment and ponder ex-Governor HAMILTON'S words:

"Those managers of the Confederate armies you all felt that you had lost the rights that you once enjoyed under the Constitution. When I entered the State as Provisional Governor in 1865, citizens flocked to meet me in LYNCHBURG, and the condition of the country; and from my landing in Galveston until I reached the capital, I was met by delegations of your successionists. They said frankly that they had tried to set up a government and had failed. They had done their best. They threw themselves upon the clemency of the President, and he would be content if their lives were spared, and what was left of their property and their liberty. They thought it right that the work of reconstruction should be committed to the friends of the Federal Government. They were willing to remain in the back-ground. All who have me know that I am not brutal. And you know too, that it was but a little time until all this was changed. And so much for the faith between the President and the party that elected him to office between the party that encouraged your foes. I am speaking now to successionists. And when the policy of the President ripened into what you thought was a determination on his part to form a political alliance with your former leaders, and denunciatory to the loyal Union men; so much so that you proclaimed openly, before I left the State, that the President of the United States constituted the best claim to official position."

SKATING—OVERDOING IT.

SINCE a deal has been said and written of late years about the necessity of bodily exercise, and so great heed given to the subject by certain people, who, with more than ordinary discretion, are obviously taking "too much of a good thing," which, according to the old proverb, "is worse than none."

It is quite a mistake to suppose that physical exercise can be indulged in without limit as to time and degree. On the contrary, it is true, under a proper system of training, be rendered capable of great force and endurance. Men have been taught to run and leap and hurdle their arms and fists into sledge hammers, and using their abdomens for anvils to beat out iron horse-shoes upon. But it is not necessary to insist that the human frame was never intended by nature for a locomotive smiley; for such a misconception of the purpose of the human body is not likely to become popular. But there is a good deal of similar error in regard to the proper use and abuse of exercise and occasional dangers and to demand an effort for its removal.

The muscles are so closely connected with the many delicate nerves, and internal and external organs of the body that it is impossible to move the former without communicating their motion to the latter. And it is moderate the labor or exercise is favorable to the generation of nervous power, the circulation of the blood, the process of digestion, and the other bodily functions. If excessive, however, it unduly stimulates the action of these, and produces congestion, inflammation, disease, or the delicate structures of the internal organs and their vessels.

One of the most eminent of English surgeons has lately made an emphatic protest against the excessive physical effort engendered by the University boat-races. He declares it as his own experience and that of many others of his profession, that the young men engaged in these ardent contests suffer for the entire remainder of their lives from the effects of strain, often become affected with diseases in consequence, such as aneurism and other fatal affections of the heart and blood-vessels.

It is to be feared that we may also in this country, with the usual tendency to excess, overdo the matter of boat-racing, which is becoming an established institution in our colleges. As an exercise nothing can be better than rowing, and an occasional competitive spirit for a short stretch might do no harm, but a long struggle, stimulated to excessive effort by a nervous expectation and eager strife, can not be safe.

Our young girls too are overdoing it, we suspect, in their skating. We should be sorry to say any thing against an amusement productive of so much innocent pleasure, and an exercise so favorable to health when properly regulated. It is essential, however, that the temptation to excess should be carefully guarded against. The conspicuous fact of a young face often dead to a prolonged and excessive strain of the muscles, full of risk to the peculiar organization of women, and we know of many fatal results in consequence.

It is seldom that our young girls are properly advised for the strong physical exercise of skating. Nothing can be more picturesque than the fur-trimmed jackets, the looped-up skirt, and the full revelation of thickly-ankled petticoat. We have nothing to say against the taste of the costume, but we have a warning to utter in regard to its make. Don't let it be so tight about the waist, and don't wear that corset or bodice which binds the upper part of your frame into an immovable shell. If a woman will thus constrict herself, she had better take no exercise at all, for the least violent effort under such circumstances is dangerous. In skating there is necessarily a strong action of the muscles of the lower part of the body which will be concentrated there in undue intensity if the chest and waist, deadened by corset or bodice, is unable to share it. The whole movement and effort thus intensified and confined to the lower portion of the frame are sure to give rise to those diseases to which the peculiar organization of women render them particularly liable.

GOVERNOR FENTON'S MESSAGE.

GOVERNOR FENTON, in his Message to the Legislature, which assembled at Albany on January 7, strongly advocates the payment of New York's share of the gubernatorial of the United States in coin. In speaking of the general finances of the country he states that there are 1600 National banks in existence, with a capital of $419,000,00, and holding deposits of $500,000,00. The debt of New York State on September 30, 1867, was $46,114,675, from which all appropriations not yet drawn out of the Treasury. He speaks very sanguinely of business prospects, and the ability of the State to pay the bonuses resting upon it. He calls attention to the office as Governor, which, 1800, the three first banks made loans to the amount of $122,000,000, while their loans in 1867 were $548,000,000, or double the increase of 1866 and he adds, "Happily for the agriculture, it not in so great a ratio, is the advance in most of the departments of business and avocations as will be found by reference to the tables of commerce and tonnage, manufactures, mercantile, mechanical, manufacturing, and mechanical employments, and the value of real and personal estate."

The debt due from the State for war expenses is $690,786 only. The National Guard of the State numbers 48,000.

THE INDIAN TREATY.

"THE official report of the Indian Commission, which lately concluded the war with the Indians, which cost the United States about $2,000,000, and in which we paid twenty-five lives for each Indian slain, declares that the Indian war exists only because of treaties and the commission of hostilities on our part. The commissioners say that we have made too many treaty reservations for the Indians. The first reservation should be bounded north by Kansas, east by Arkansas and Missouri, south by Texas, and west by the 100th or 101st meridian. The other should be bounded north by the 46th parallel, east by the Mississippi River, south by Nebraska, and west by the 104th meridian. The country should be used for various tribes of Sioux, Crows, Dakota, and New Mexico. The Kansas tribes, however, and the Winnebagoes, Omahas, Otoes, Sauks, Foxes, and perhaps a few others, the Commissioners think it may be advisable to let remain where they are. The Commissioner incorporated in their treaty with the citizens of Kansas and the latter with those of Nebraska. They also recommend that hereafter the stipulated annuities shall be paid to the Indians, not in money, but in agricultural implements, food, and clothing, that is, as they express it, in everything except "it is cheaper to civilize than to kill," unbridled extravagance, and a desire to promote civilization among the various tribes; that, in view of the conflict of security and economy, the control of the Indian Department and the Department of the Interior, the Indian Bureau be reorganized as a special, separate department; that the Governor of Leadenham and Senators or Territories be permitted to call out and apply troops for the purpose of carrying on war against the Indians.

SECRETARY STANTON'S RESTORATION.

THE report of Senator HOWARD on the removal from the office of Secretary STANTON, and the corresponding resolution restoring him to his place, was promptly taken up in the Senate by Executive Session on January 13. The resolution restoring Mr. STANTON to the office as Secretary of War, and the report concurring in his removal by President Johnson, was adopted by a vote of 35 to 6. The President, General GRANT, and Secretary STANTON were notified of the action of the Senate on the same day.

If General GRANT will decline to give him possession, or, if after obtaining control of the office, he should be again suspended by the action of President Johnson, Mr. STANTON will be compelled to seek relief and his rights through a mandamus or the Supreme Court. Should Mr. STANTON be restored he would eventually come before the Supreme Court of the country in Military Commission. The action on January 13 reported the bill previously adopted by the House declaring what shall constitute a quorum of the Supreme Court, but somewhat amended. The original bill declared that "Any number of the Judges of the Supreme Court, not less than five, being a majority thereof, shall constitute a quorum. The Senate Judiciary Committee have had under investigation the action or effect of any law of the United States, or any resolution of the Congress of the United, to be decided adversely to the validity of such law without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the Court." The bill thus amended passed the House by a vote of 116 years to 39 nays; and now goes back to the Senate for concurrence.

RECONSTRUCTION MEASURES.

THE Reconstruction Committee of the House on January 14 reported a new Reconstruction Bill of a very important character, and having for its purpose a more thorough reconstruction of the Southern States by all obstacles on the part of the President and the late rebel citizens of the South. First of all it declares that no civil governments at present exist in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Florida, and Arkansas. Secondly, the General commanding the army in any district to enforce all the reconstructive laws of Congress, is empowered to remove from command all officers who refuse to obey, and he may not be in command at the South, as well as all civil officers who refuse to obey the several provisional governments of the Southern States, and to appoint others to the same positions. Thirdly, the authority to detail military commissions to the Southern departments, conferred on the President by all former acts, is repealed, in short, the powers vested by Congress in General Grant, by the President is forbidden to order any part of the troops or navy of the United States to assist by force of arms the authority of either of the present provisional governments of the States, or to maintain by the authority of the United States.

This bill was read in the House on January 13 and recommitted to the Reconstruction Committee for further consideration.

General Meade, commanding the Department of Georgia and Alabama, on January 13 removed Charles T. Jenkins from the provisional Governorship of Georgia, and John Jones from the provisional Lieutenant-Governorship of Georgia, in consequence of their refusal to cooperate with the military commander of the Department. General Roger was appointed Governor in Jenkins's place, and Captain Sackwell ordered to the duty of Treasurer of the State.

"WINTER"—A SKATING SCENE.—Drawn by Winslow Homer.—[See Page 51.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER VIII.

HERE, for one moment, I find it necessary to call a halt.

On summoning up my own recollections—and on getting Penelope to help me, by consulting her journal—I find that we may pass pretty rapidly over the interval between Mr. Franklin Blake's arrival and Miss Rachel's birthday. For the greater part of that time the days passed, and brought nothing with them worth recording. With your good leave, then, and with Penelope's help, I shall notice certain dates only in this place, reserving to myself to tell the story day by day, once more, as soon as we get to the time when the business of the Moonstone became the chief business of every body in our house.

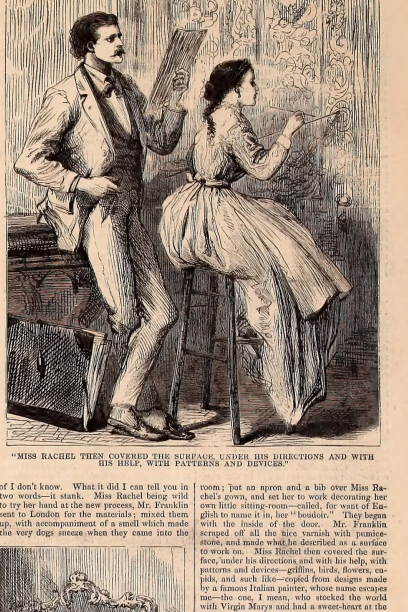
This said, we may now go on again—beginning, of course, with the bottle of sweet-smelling ink which I found on the gravel-walk at night.

On the next morning (the morning of the twenty-sixth) I showed Mr. Franklin this article of jugglery, and told him what I have already told you. His opinion was, not only that the Indians had been lurking about after the Diamond, but also that they were actually foolish enough to believe in their own magic—meaning thereby the making of signs on a boy's hand, and the pouring of ink into a boy's hand, and then expecting him to see persons and things beyond the reach of human vision. In our country, as well as in the East, Mr. Franklin informed me, there are people who practice this curious hocus-pocus (without the ink, however); and who call it by a French name, signifying something like brightness of sight. "Depend upon it," says Mr. Franklin, "the Indians took it for granted that we should keep the Diamond here; and they brought their clairvoyant boy to show them the way to it, if they succeeded in getting into the house last night."

"Do you think they'll try again, Sir?" I asked.

"It depends," says Mr. Franklin, "on what the boy can really do. If he can see the Diamond through the iron safe of the bank at Frizinghall, we shall be troubled with no more visits from the Indians for the present. If he can't, we shall have another chance of catching them in the shrubbery before many more nights are over our heads."

I waited pretty confidently for that latter chance; but, strange to relate, it never came.



Whether the jugglers heard, in the town, of Mr. Franklin having been seen at the bank, and drew their conclusions accordingly; or whether the boy really could see the Diamond where the Diamond was now lodged (which I, for one, flatly disbelieve); or whether, after all, it was a mere effect of chance, this, at any rate, is the plain truth—not the ghost of an Indian came near the house again, through the weeks that passed before Miss Rachel's birthday. The jugglers remained in and about the town plying their trade; and Mr. Franklin and I remained waiting to see what might happen, and resolute not to put the rogues on their guard by showing our suspicions of them too soon. With this report of the proceedings on either side, ends all that I have to say about the Indians for the present.

On the twenty-ninth of the month, Miss Rachel and Mr. Franklin hit on a new method of working their way together through the time which might otherwise have hung heavy on their hands. There are reasons for taking particular notice here of the occupation that amused them. You will find it has a bearing on something that is still to come.

Gentlefolks in general have a very awkward rock ahead in life—the rock ahead of their own idleness. Their lives being, for the most part, passed in looking about them for something to do, it is curious to see—especially when their tastes are of what is called the intellectual sort—how often they drift blindfold into some nasty pursuit. Nine times out of ten they take to torturing something, or to spoiling something; and they firmly believe they are improving their minds, when the plain truth is, they are only making a mess in the house. I have seen them (ladies, I am sorry to say, as well as gentlemen) go out, day after day, for example, with empty pill-boxes, and catch newts, and beetles, and spiders, and frogs, and come home and stick pins through the miserable wretches, or cut them up, without a pang of remorse, into little pieces. You see my young master, or my young mistress, poring over one of their spiders' insides with a magnifying-glass; or you meet one of their frogs walking down stairs without his head; and when you wonder what this cruel nastiness means, you are told that it means a taste in my young master or my young mistress for natural history. Sometimes, again, you see them occupied for hours together in spoiling a pretty flower with pointed instruments, out of a stupid curiosity to know what the flower is made of. Is its color any prettier, or its scent any sweeter, when you do know? But there! the poor souls must get through the time, you see—they must get through the time. You dabbled in nasty mud, and made pies, when you were a child; and you dabble in nasty science, and dissect spiders, and spoil flowers, when you grow up. In the one case and in the other the secret of it is that you have got nothing to think of in your poor empty head, and nothing to do with your poor idle hands. And so it ends in you're spoiling canvas with paints, and making a smell in the house; or in keeping tadpoles in a glass box full of dirty water, and turning every body's stomach in the house; or in chipping off bits of stone here, there, and every where, and dropping grit into all the victuals in the house; or in staining your fingers in the pursuit of photography, and doing justice without mercy on every body's face in the house. It often fails heavy enough, no doubt, on people who are really obliged to get their living, to be forced to work for the clothes that cover them, the roof that shelters them, and the food that keeps them going. But compare the hardest day's work you ever did with the idleness that splits flowers and pokes its way into spiders' stomachs, and thank your stars that your head has got something it must think of, and your hands something that they must do.

As for Mr. Franklin and Miss Rachel, they tortured nothing, I am glad to say. They simply confined themselves to making a mess; and all they spoilt, to do them justice, was the panelling of a door.

Mr. Franklin's universal genius, dabbling in every thing, dabbled in what he called "decorative painting." He had invented, he informed us, a new mixture to moisten paint with, which he described as a "vehicle." What it was made of I don't know. What it did I can tell you in two words—it stank. Miss Rachel being wild to try her hand at the new process, Mr. Franklin sent to London for the materials; mixed them up, with accompaniment of a smell which made the very dogs sneeze when they came into the room; put an apron and a bib over Miss Rachel's gown, and set her to work decorating her own little sitting-room—called, for want of English to name it in, her "boudoir." They began with the inside of the door. Mr. Franklin scraped off all the nice varnish with pumice-stone, and made what he described as a surface to work on. Miss Rachel then covered the surface, under his directions and with his help, with patterns and devices—griffins, birds, flowers, cupids, and such like—copied from designs made by a famous Italian painter, whose name escapes me—the one, I mean, who stocked the world with Virgin Marys and had a sweet-heart at the baker's. Viewed as work, this decoration was slow to do and dirty to deal with. But our young lady and gentleman never seemed to tire of it. When they were not riding, or seeing company, or taking their meals, or piping their songs, there they were with their heads together, as busy as bees, spoiling the door. Who was the poet who said that Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do? If he had occupied any place in the family, and had seen Miss Rachel with her brush, and Mr. Franklin with his vehicle, he could have written nothing truer of either of them than that.

"MISS RACHEL THEN COVERED THE SURFACE, UNDER HIS DIRECTIONS AND WITH HIS HELP, WITH PATTERNS AND DEVICES."

The next date worthy of notice is Sunday, the fourth of June.

On that evening we, in the servants' hall, debated a domestic question for the first time, which, like the decoration of the door, has its bearing on something that is still to come.

Seeing the pleasure which Mr. Franklin and Miss Rachel took in each other's society, and seeing what a pretty match they were in all personal respects, we naturally speculated on the chance of their putting their hands together with other objects in view besides the ornamenting of a door. Some of us said there would be a wedding in the house before the summer was over. Others (led by me) admitted it was likely enough Miss Rachel might be married; but we doubted (for reasons which will presently appear) whether her bridegroom would be Mr. Franklin Blake.

That Mr. Franklin was in love, on his side, nobody who saw and heard him could doubt. The difficulty was to fathom Miss Rachel. Let me do myself the honor of making you acquainted with her; after which, I will leave you to fathom her yourself—if you can.

My young lady's eighteenth birthday was the birthday now coming, on the twenty-first of June.

If you happen to like dark women (who, I am informed, have gone out of fashion latterly in the gay world), and if you have no particular prejudice in favor of size, I answer for Miss Rachel as one of the prettiest girls your eyes ever looked on. She was small and slim, but all in fine proportion from top to toe. To see her sit down, to see her get up, and specially to see her walk, was enough to satisfy any man in his senses that the graces of her figure (if you will pardon me the expression) were in her flesh, and not in her clothes. Her hair was the blackest I ever saw. Her eyes matched her hair. Her nose was not quite large enough, I admit. Her mouth and chin were (to quote Mr. Franklin) marvels for the gods; and her complexion (on the same undeniable authority) was as warm as the sun itself, with this great advantage over the sun, that it was always in nice order to look at. Add to the foregoing that she carried her head as upright as a dart, in a dashing, spirited, thorough-bred way —that she had a clear voice, with a ring of the right metal in it, and a smile that began very prettily in her eyes before it got to her lips—and there behold the portrait of her, to the best of my painting, as large as life!

"SHE CAUGHT ROSANNA AT MR. FRANKLIN'S DRESSING-TABLE, SECRETLY REMOVING A ROSE," ETC.

And what about her disposition next? Had this charming creature no faults? She had just as many faults as you have, ma am—neither more nor less.

To put it seriously, my dear pretty Miss Rachel, considering a host of graces and attractions, had one defect, which strict impartiality compels me to acknowledge. She was unlike most other girls of her age, in this—that she had ideas of her own, and was stiff-necked enough to set the fashions themselves at defiance, if the fashions didn't suit her taste. In little, but important matters of importance it carried her (as my lady thought, and as I thought too for she pleaded for herself, as few women of twice her age judge in general; never asked your advice; never let you believe beforehand what she was going to do; never came with secrets and confidences to any body, from her mother downward. In little things and great, with people she loved, and people she hated (and she did both with equal heartiness), Miss Rachel always went on a way of her own, sufficient for herself in the joys and the sorrows of her life. Over and over again I have neard my lady say, "Rachel's best friend and Rachel's worst enemy are, one and the other—Rachel herself."

Add one thing more to this, and I have done. With all her secrecy, and all her self-will, there was not so much as the shadow of any thing false in her. You remember her declaring her word; I never remember her saying No, and meaning Yes. I can call to mind, in her childhood, many an occasion when the pride of the girl-the soul took the blame, and suffered the punishment, for some fault committed by a play-fellow whom she loved. Perhaps I ever have been or confess to it when the thing was found out, and she was charged with it afterward. But nobody ever knew her to tell a lie, either. She looked you straight in the face and shook her little saucy head and said plainly, "I won't tell you"—or she hid behind any thing else, while she got ready for saying "won't," but, bread and water notwithstanding, never told you. Self-willed—devilish self-willed sometimes—I grant; but the finest creatures, nevertheless, that ever walked the ways of this sinful world. Perhaps you think you see a certain contradiction here? In that case, a word in your ear. Study your wife closely for the very opposite reason home. Your good lady doesn't exhibit something in the shape of a contradiction in that time, Heaven help you! you have married a monster.

I have now brought you acquainted with Miss Rachel, which will (I am told) put us to no fact, next, with the question of that young lady's matrimonial views.

On June the twelfth, an invitation from my mistress was sent to a gentleman in London, to come and help to keep Miss Rachel's birthday. This was the fortunate individual on whom I believed her heart to be privately set! Like Mr. Franklin, he was a cousin of hers. His name was Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite.

My lady's second sister (don't be alarmed; we are not going very deep into family matters this time!—my lady's second sister, I say, had a disappointment in love; and taking a husband afterward, on the sack or nothing principle, made what she herself considered a sacrifice. I have never been let the work in the family when the honorable Candace insisted on having plain Mr. Ablewhite, the banker at Frizinghall. He was very rich and very good-tempered, and he begot a prodigious large family in his first year, or so. He had had presumed to raise himself from a low station in the world—and that was against him. However, time and the progress of modern enlightenment put things right; and the misalliance passed master very well. We are all getting liberal now, I am persuaded you can scarcely say, if I scratch you what do I care, in or out of Parliament, whether you are a Dustman or a Duke? That is the modern way of looking at it —and I keep up with the modern way. The Ablewhites lived in a fine house and grounds, a little out of Frizinghall. Very worthy people, and greatly respected in the neighborhood. We shall not be much troubled with them in these pages—because Mr. Godfrey, to my lady Ablewhite's second son, and who must take his proper place here, if you please, for Miss Rachel's sake.

With all his brightness and cleverness and good-nature, however, Mr. Franklin's chance of topping Mr. Godfrey in our young lady's estimation was, in my opinion, a very poor chance indeed.

In the first place, Mr. Godfrey was, in point of size, the finest man by far of the two. He stood over six feet high; he had a powerful red and white color; a smooth round face, shaved as bare as your hand; and a head of lovely long flaxen hair, flowing prodigiously over the collar of his neck. But why do I try to give you this personal description of him? If you ever subscribed to a Ladies' Charity in London, you saw Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite as well as I do. He was a barrister by profession; a ladies man by temperament; and a good Samaritan by choice. Female benevolence and female destitution could do nothing without him. Maternal societies for confining poor women; Magdalen societies for rescuing poor women; strong-minded societies for putting poor women into poor men's places, and leaving the men to shift for themselves—he was vice-president, manager, referee to them all. Wherever there was a table with a committee of ladies sitting round it in council, there was Mr. Godfrey at the bottom of the board, keeping the temper of the committee, and leading the dear creatures along the thorny ways of business, hat in hand. I do suppose this was the most accomplished philanthropist (on a small independence) that England ever produced. As a speaker at charitable meetings the like of him for drawing your tears and your money was not easy to find. He was quite a public character. The last time I was in London my address gave me two treats. She sent me to the theatre to see a dancing woman who was all the rage; and she sent me to Exeter Hall to hear Mr. Godfrey. The lady did it with a bond of music. The gentleman did it with a handkerchief and glass of water. Could both handkerchief and glass of water. Could with a handkerchief and glass of water. Could at the performance with the legs. Ditto at the performance with the tongue. And with all this the creature was so good-natured (as was Mr. Godfrey)—the simplest and pleasantest and easiest to please—you ever met with. He loved everybody. And everybody loved him. That chance had Mr. Franklin—what chance had any body of average reputation and capacities—against such a man as this?

On the fourteenth came Mr. Godfrey's answer.

He accepted my mistress's invitation, from the Wednesday of the birthday to the evening of Friday—to "meet dear Rachel," whom he always would oblige him to return to town. He also inclosed a copy of verses on what he elegantly called the coming of age of "Our Rachel." As I was informed, joined Mr. Franklin in making fun of the verses at dinner; and Penelope, who was all on Franklin's side, declared, to Franklin's triumph, what I thought of that. "Miss Rachel has led you off on a false scent, my dear," I remember her saying to me, on the nineteenth. Wait till Mr. Ablewhite's verses are followed by Mr. Ablewhite himself!"

My master replied, that Mr. Franklin might strike in and try his luck, before the verses were followed by the poet. As he was sure to do, he must acknowledge that Mr. Franklin left no chance untried of winning Miss Rachel's good graces.

Though one of the most inveterate smokers I ever met with, he gave up his cigar because she said, one day, the smell of tobacco stuck to all his clothes. He slept so badly, after this effort of self-denial, for want of the composing effect of the tobacco, that he was well pleased to come down morning after morning looking so haggard and worn, that Miss Rachel herself begged him to take to his cigar again. But he would listen to nothing again that would cause her a moment's annoyance; he would fight it out resolutely, and get back his appetite, and his sleep, by force of patience in waiting for it. Such devotion as this, you may say (as some of them said down stairs), could not fail to produce a favorable effect on Miss Rachel—backed up, too, as it was, by the decorating work every day on the door. All very well—but what was the opinion of Mr. Godfrey in her bedroom; represented speaking at a public meeting, with all his hair blown out by the breath of his own eloquence, and his eyes, most lovely, charming the money out of your pockets! What do you say to that? Even morning—as Penelope remarked to me—before there was the man whom the women couldn't do without, looking on, in effigy, while Miss Rachel was losing the Battle of Waterloo by not looking on, in reality, before long—that was my opinion of it.

June the sixteenth brought an event which made Mr. Franklin's chance look, to my mind, a worse chance than ever.

A strange gentleman, speaking English with a foreign accent, came that morning to the house to inquire for Mr. Franklin Blake—on business. The business could not possibly have been connected with the birthday, for the two reasons—first, that Mr. Franklin told me so—and, secondly, that the unanimated Penelope, who was eagerly on the look-out for any thing that looked like a wedding present, declared, for the two reasons—first, that Mr. Franklin told me nothing about it; secondly, that he communicated with the gentleman (who was staying in the house again) to my lady. She probably hinted something about it next to her daughter. At my lady's request, the stranger was shown into one of the severe things to Mr. Franklin, at the piano that evening about the people he had lived among, and the principles which he had taught in his early parts. The next day, for the first time, nothing was done toward the decoration of the door. I saw Miss Rachel walking in the shrubbery, with the Continent—with a woman or a debt at the bottom of it—had followed him to England. I saw Mr. Franklin walking, in the same way, only Mr. Franklin, but my lady too, for a wonder, left me in the dark.

On the seventeenth, to all appearance, the cloud passed away again. They returned to their old occupations, and the door seemed likely to be as good friends as ever. If Penelope was to be believed, Mr. Franklin had seized the opportunity of the reconciliation to make an offer to Miss Rachel, and had neither been accepted nor refused. My girl was sure (from signs and tokens which I need not trouble you with) that her young mistress had fought Mr. Franklin off at declining to be refused, but was in earnest, and had then secretly regretted treating him in that way afterward. Though Penelope was admitted to more familiarity with her mistress than maids generally are—for the two had been almost brought up together as children—still I knew Miss Rachel's character too well to believe that she would show her mind to any body in this way. What my daughter told me on the present occasion, was as I suspected, more what she wished than what she really knew.

On the nineteenth another event happened. We had the doctor in the house professionally. He was summoned to prescribe for a person whom I have had occasion to present to you in these pages—our second house-maid, Rosanna Spearman.

This poor girl—who had puzzled me, as you know already, at the Shivering Sand—puzzled me more than once again in the interval time of which I am now writing. Penelope's notion that her Fellow-servant was in love with Mr. Franklin (which my daughter, by my orders, kept strictly to herself) seemed to me just as absurd as ever. But I must own that what I myself saw, and what my daughter saw also, of our second house-maid's conduct began to look mysterious, to say the least of it.

For example, the girl constantly put herself in Mr. Franklin's way—very slyly and quietly, but she did it. He took about as much notice of her as he would of a cat. It never seemed to occur to him to waste a look on Rosanna's plain face. The poor thing's appetite, never much, fell away dreadfully; and her eyes in the morning showed plain signs of waking and crying at night. One day Penelope made an awkward discovery, which we hushed up on the spot. She caught Rosanna at Mr. Franklin's dressing-table, secretly removing a rose which Miss Rachel had worn him in a button-hole, and putting in another rose like it, of her own picking, in its place. She was, after that, once or twice impudent to me, in the way of a well-meant general hint to be careful in her conduct; and, worse still, she was not over-respectful now on the subject of occasion when Miss Rachel accidentally spoke to her.

My lady noticed the change, and asked me what I thought about it. I tried to screen the girl by answering that I thought she was out of health; and it ended in the doctor being sent for. He was examining, on the nineteenth. He said it was her nerves, and doubted if she was fit for service. My lady offered to remove her to change of air to one of our farms in Cumberland. She begged and prayed, with the tears in her eyes, for leave to be tried in an evil hour! I raised my lady to try her for a little longer. As the event proved, and as you will soon see, this was the worst thing we could have given to her. I could only have looked a little way into the future, I would have taken Rosanna Spearman out of the house, then and there, with my own hand.

On the twentieth, there came a note from Mr. Godfrey. He proposed to stop at Frizinghall that night, having occasion to consult his father on business. On the afternoon of the next day (as my lady's eldest sister would ride over to us on horseback, in good time before dinner. An elegant little casket in china was presented to Miss Rachel by Miss Blake, with her cousin's love and best wishes. Mr. Franklin had only given her a plain locket not worth half the money—but he had remembered it, nevertheless—such is the obstinacy of women—still hooked him to win.

Before I have done, we have arrived at the eve of the birthday at last! You will own, I think, that I have got you over the ground, this time, with remarkable speed by the way. Cheer up! I'll ease you with another new chapter here—and, what is more, that chapter shall take you straight into the thick of the story.

CHAPTER IX.

JUNE twenty-first, the day of the birthday, was cloudy and unsettled at sunrise, but toward noon it cleared to bright sun.

We, in the servants' hall, began this happy anniversary, as usual, by offering our little presents to Miss Rachel in the regular speech-making order, and by receiving those of the chief. I follow the plan adopted by the Queen in opening Parliament—namely, that of saying much the same thing regularly every year. Before it is delivered, my speech (like the Queen's) is looked for to eagerly as if nothing of the kind had ever been heard before. When it is delivered, and turns out to be what was expected, it is anticipated, though they grumble a little, they look forward hopefully to something newer next year. An easy people to govern, in Parliament and in the Kitchen—that's the moral of it.

After breakfast, Mr. Franklin and I had a private conference on the subject of the Moonstone—the time having now come for removing it from the bank at Frizinghall, and placing it in Miss Rachel's own hands.

Whether he had been trying to make love to his cousin again, and had got a rebuff—or whether the bad weather had failed to allow himself at his best on the morning of the birthday. He was in twenty different minds about the Diamond in the course of the hour my part, I think, that by the plain facts as we knew them. Nothing had happened to justify us in alarming my lady with the subject at present; and nothing could alter the legal obligation that now lay on Mr. Franklin to put it in his cousin's possession. That was my view of the matter; and, when I put it to me, he might, he was forced in the end to make it his view too.

We arranged that he was to ride over, after lunch, to Frizinghall and bring the Diamond back, with Mr. Godfrey (if he was young enough), in all probability, to keep him company on the way home again.

This settled, our young gentleman went back to Miss Rachel.

They consumed the whole morning, and part of the afternoon, in the everlasting business of decorating the door. Penelope standing by to mix the colors, as directed; and my lady, as luncheon-time drew near, going in and out of the room, with her handkerchief to her nose (for they used a deal of Mr. Franklin's vehicle that day), and trying vainly to get the two artists away from their work. It was three o'clock before they took off their aprons, and released Penelope (much the worse for the vehicle), and cleaned themselves of their mess. After they had done what they wanted—they had finished the door on the birthday, and proud enough they were of it. The griffins, cupids, and so on, were, I must own, most beautiful to behold; though so many in number, so entangled in flowers and devices, and so temptingly in their actions and attitudes, that you felt them unpleasantly in your head for hours after you had done with the pleasure of looking at them. If Miss Clack and Penelope ended her part of the morning's work by being sick in the back kitchen, it is in no infirmity of mind on the vehicle. For I, and a lot of stinking when it dried; and if Art requires these sort of sacrifices—though the girl is by my own daughter—I say, let Art have them!

Mr. Franklin snatched a morsel from the luncheon-table, and rode off to Frizinghall—to escort his cousin, as he told my lady. To fetch the Moonstone, as was privately known to himself and to me.

This being one of the high festivals on which I took my place at the side-board, in command of the attendance at table, I had plenty to occupy my mind while Mr. Franklin was away. Having seen to the wine, and reviewed my men and women who were to wait at dinner, I retired to collect myself before the company came. A whiff of—you know what, and a turn at a certain book which I have had occasion to mention in these pages, composed me, body and soul. I was aroused from what I am inclined to think must have been, one of the best naps I ever had in the hour of house-hours outside; and, going to the door, received a cavalcade comprising Mr. Franklin and Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, escorted by one of old Mr. Ablewhite's grooms.

Mr. Godfrey struck me, strangely enough, as being like Mr. Franklin in this respect—that he did not seem to be in his customary spirits. He kindly shook hands with me as usual, and was most politely inquiring after the Shivering Sandstage waiting so well. But there was a sort of cloud over him, which I couldn't at all account for; and when I looked how he was getting on further in health, he answered rather shortly, "Much as usual." However, the two Miss Ablewhites were cheerful enough for twenty; and the more than restored the balance. They were nearly as big as their brother; spanking, yellow-haired, fine lasses, overflowing with animal spirits and blood; bursting from head to foot with health and spirits. The legs of the poor horses trembled with the thumps they gave, when they jumped from their saddles (without waiting to be helped), I declare they bounced on the ground like a ball. I only mention this to show, that, if every thing the Miss Ablewhites said began with a large O; every thing they did was done with a large and free action, and accompanied, in season and out of season, on the smallest provocation. Boun cers—that's what I call them.

Under cover of the noise made by the young ladies, I had an opportunity of saying a private word to Mr. Franklin in the hall.

"Have you got the Diamond safe, Sir?"

He nodded, and tapped the breast-pocket of his coat.

"Have you seen any thing of the Indians?"

"Not a glimpse." With that answer, he asked for my lady, and, hearing she was in the small drawing-room, made there straight. The hall song, before he had been a minute in the room, and Penelope was sent to tell Miss Rachel that Mr. Franklin Blake wanted to speak to her.

Crossing the hall about half an hour afterward I was brought to a standstill by the sight of a quiet sneak of screams from the small drawing-room. I can't say I was at all alarmed; for I recognized in the sequel a sort of hostile charge by the Miss Ablewhites. However, I went in (on pretense of asking for instructions about the dinner) to discover whether any thing serious had really happened.

There stood Miss Rachel at the table, like a person bewitched, with the Diamond in Jacky Diamond in her hand. There, on either side of her, knelt the two Bouncers, devouring the jewel with their eyes, and screaming at intervals every time it flashed on them in a new light. There, at the opposite side of the table, stood Mr. Godfrey, chipping his hands like a hen just after laying-ing out softly. "Exquisite! exquisite!" There sat Mr. Franklin, in a chair by the book-case, sipping the Madeira, and looking uncommonly like a fool. There, at the window, stood the object he was contemplating—my lady, turning the correct form of a statue, with her hand, and keeping her back turned on the whole of the company.

She forced me when I asked for my instructions, and I saw the family frown gathering over her eyes, and the family temper twitching at the corners of her mouth.

"Come to my room in half an hour," she answered. "I shall have something to say to you then."

With those words she went out. It was plain enough that she was vexed by the same difficulty which had posed Mr. Franklin and me in our conference at the Shivering Sand. Was the legacy of the Diamond a present that she had treated her brother with cruel injustice? or was it a proof that he was worse than the worst she had ever thought of him? Serious questions those for my lady to determine; while her daughter, innocent of all knowledge of the Colonel's character, stood there with the Colonel's birthday gift in her hand.

Before I could leave the room, in my turn, Miss Rachel, always considerate to the old servant who had been in the house when she was born, stopped me. "Look, Gabriel!" she said, and flashed the jewel before my eyes in a ray of sunlight that poured through the window.

Lord bless us! it was a Diamond! As large, or nearly, as a plover's egg! The light that streamed from it was like the light of the harvest moon. When you looked down into the stone, you looked into a yellow deep that drew your eyes into it so that they saw nothing else. It seemed unfathomable; this jewel, that you could hold between your finger and thumb, seemed unfathomable as the heaven themselves. We set it in the sun, and then shut the light out of the room, and it shone awfully out of the depths of its own brightness, with a misty gleam, in the dark. No wonder Miss Rachel was fascinated; no wonder her cousins screamed. The Diamond had such a hold on me that I burst out with as large an "O!" as the Bouncers themselves. The only one of us who kept his senses was Mr. Godfrey. He put an arm round each of his sisters' waists, and, looking compassionately backward and forward between the Diamond and me, said, "Carbon, Betteredge! mere carbon, my good friend, after all!"

His object, I suppose, was to instruct me. All he did, however, was to remind me of the dinner. I hobbled off to my army of waiters down stairs. As I went out Mr. Godfrey said, "Dear old Betteredge, I have the truest regard for him!" He was embracing his sisters and cogging Miss Rachel while he honored me with that testimony of affection. Something like a stock of love to draw on there? Mr. Franklin was a perfect savage by comparison with him.

At the end of half an hour I presented myself, as directed, in my lady's room.

What passed between my mistress and me on this occasion was, in the main, a repetition of what had passed between Mr. Franklin and me at the Shivering Sand—with this difference, that I took care to keep my own counsel about the juggulers, seeing that nothing had happened to justify me in alarming my lady on this head. When I received my dismissal I could see that she took the blackest view possible of the Colonel's motives, and that she was bent on getting the Moonstone out of her daughter's possession at the first opportunity.

On my way back to my own part of the house I was encountered by Mr. Franklin. He wanted to know if I had seen any thing of his cousin Rachel. I had seen nothing of her. Could I tell him where his cousin Godfrey was? I didn't know, but I began to suspect that Cousin Godfrey might not be far away from Cousin Rachel. Mr. Franklin's suspicions apparently took the same turn. He tugged hard at his beard, and went and shut himself up in the library with a bang of the door that had a world of meaning in it.

I was interrupted no more in the business of preparing for the birthday dinner till it was time for me to smarten myself up for receiving the company. Just as I had got my white waistcoat on, Penelope presented herself at my door, on pretense of brushing what little hair I have got left, and improving the tie of my white cravat. My girl was in high spirits, and I was the bad something to say to me. She gave me a kiss on the top of my bald head, and whispered, "News for you, father! Rachel has ridden a horse!"

"Who's him?" I asked.

"The ladies' commitee—man, father," says Penelope. "A nasty, sly fellow. I hate him for trying to supplant Mr. Franklin!"

If I had had breath enough I should certainly have protested against this indecent way of speaking of an eminent philanthropic character. But my daughter happened to be improving the tie of my cravat at that moment, and the whole strength of her feelings found its way into her fingers. I never was more nearly strangled in my life.

"I saw him take her away alone into the rose-garden," says Penelope. "And I waited about in the hall to see how they came back. They had gone out arm in arm, both laughing. They came back, walking separate, as grave as grave can be, and looking straight away from each other in a manner which there was no mistaking. I never was more delighted, father, in my life! There's one woman in the world who can resist Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, at any rate; and, if I was a lady, I should be another!"

Here I should have protested again. But my daughter had got the hair-brush by this time, and the whole strength of her feelings had gone into that. If you are bald, you will understand how she scarified me. If you are not, skip this bit, and thank God you have got something else to the way of a defense between your hair-brush and your head.

"Just on the other side of the holly," Penelope ran on, "Mr. Godfrey came to a standstill. 'You prefer,' says he, 'that I should stop here as if nothing had happened?' Miss Rachel turned on him like lightning. 'You have accepted my mother's invitation,' she said; 'and you are here to meet her guests. Unless you wish to make a scandal in the house, you will remain, of course!' She went on a few steps, and then seemed to relent a little. 'I am sorry to get what has passed, Godfrey,' she said, 'and let us remain cousins still.' She gave him her hand. He kissed it, which I should have considered taking a liberty, and then she left him. He waited a little by himself, with his head down, and his heel grinding a hole slowly in the gravel-walk; you never saw a man look more put out in your life. 'Awkward!' he said between his teeth, when he looked up, and went on to the house—very awkward!' If that was his opinion of himself, he was quite right. Awkward enough, I'm sure. And the end of it is, father, what I told you all along," cries Penelope, finishing me off with a last scarification, the hottest of all. "Mr. Franklin's the man!"

I got possession of the hair-brush, and opened my lips to administer the reproof which, you will own, my daughter's language and conduct richly deserved.

Before I could say a word the crash of carriage-wheels outside struck in, and stopped me. The first of the dinner-company had come. Penelope instantly ran off. I put on my coat, and looked in the glass. My head was as red as a lobster; but, in other respects, I was as nicely dressed for the ceremonies of the evening as a man need be. I got into the hall just in time to announce the arrival of the guests. You needn't feel particularly interested about them. Only the philanthropist's father and mother—Mr. and Mrs. Ablewhite.

THE DEVIL-TREE.

A DEVIL-TREE, as might be expected, is of different aspect from any other tree that grows. It is usually a tree of gigantic growth, and sound and green as any of its forest brethren. It is its fruit that makes so singular a spectacle. Anywhere in the vegetable productions of the dominion of the King of Mountains and wonders to behold. Little bushes are bowed to the ground with scarlet, orange-shaped fruit as large as cocoa-nuts; and trees bigger than English beeches present the appearance of a giant bouquet, being literally covered with tiny, waxen-white flowers, delicate as the pencil and fragrant as the rose. Imagine like bunches of delicious looking fruit festoon the highway hedges in far greater abundance than blackberries on English bushes, and hung and not for so deadly poisonous are they that a bullet through the head would not be more fatal than one of these grapes in the mouth.

But the most curious tree of all is the one that from its bole to its topmost branch is festooned with rags and scraps and flinders of every possible description. Little parcels of dried grass, screws of matting pinned through with a thorn, scraps of cock-boating, broken bits of sacking, of wood, old pots and pans, wisps of straw, fragends of rope, and a hundred other things besides.

This is the "devil-tree." Every traveler of Zanzibar possesses one; indeed, its existence is as essential to the lives of the inhabitants—that is, the native inhabitants—as that of the palm-tree. There is no such thing as doing without the devil-tree; and yet the jet-black, woolly-headed believers in it pass by it with fear and trembling, and rags scarcely look on it without a shudder. And no wonder; it is a hive of imps. Of the thousand devils that afflict the good people of Zanzibar, there is not one but has its representative housed in this tree. Imps of plague live there, imps of famine, small-pox, fever, yellow fever imps, and imps that affect men with raving madness. These are there, and many more, all alive, and ready to leap down and begin their evil tricks anew, if ever they should grow dissatisfied with their lot. That innocent-looking stone bottle, handsomely painted, and with a great rent in its side, is the house of an imp, whose disbelief in it as to break men's limbs. That bit of crooked iron hoop, adhering to you by no means perfectly harmless, but invisibly astride it, or on it, or somewhere about it, is an imp of the blackest dye, no less indeed, than a murder imp. His history is soon stated. He took possession of a man and caused him to break his wife's head with a club, and then strangle his wife's children and throw them into the river. True, they hanged the man for it, but they could not hill the wicked imp that still lurked within his immortal body: so his friends conxed the dead man of the hangman, and conjured the dreadful little murderer out of the bit of iron hoop, and hung him up in the devil-tree. The bit of iron hoop was not so withered-looking at the time the man was hanged as it is now. It was quite a new bit of hoop, and the imp must have procured it for a prisoner out of the king's store. At all events, they had caught the wretched imp, to the amazing of his execution, and he had ground it as sharp as a razor against a stone, for the purpose of taking his own life, it was thought, for his courage failed him. When his friends fetched the body home they were a little perplexed as to what to do with the corpse as for future abode—the club with which he had killed his wife or the bit of iron hoop. They had both implements in the mind many breast, and the sorcery-man and the musicians, with their reed whistles and their copper bangers and their tom-toms, sat down and played till the greatest tunes they knew. It was plain, from the length of time the imp kept the musicians at work, that he was undecided as to whether the choice of the bit of iron hoop should be his future abode; but presently the mystery-doctor observed the bit of iron hoop quiver, and of course that settled the question. So every rag, tag, and flinder attached to the devil-tree has its story. Some are so very old that the particular charm by which the imp dwelling therein was captured and condemned to the evil tree is forgotten; but the tree is of gigantic size, and the imps' houses may be counted by hundreds.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

GOOD BACKERS.

A correspondent writes to know whether rabbits, fond of mulberries may not be said to inhabit the "Mulberry world."

THE HUMAN THERMOMETER.—"And clasped him to her bosom"—see my novel. Is it not rather derogatory to man to be treated as an article of jewelry?

A DEBAUCHED RACE—Drunkards.

WHO NOSE?—We hear a good deal about the fruits of intemperance: do they succeed the "blossoms" on the nose which intemperance produces?

"MEN WHO HAVE BEEN"—Acronauts.

ART CRITICISM.

Among some attractive pictures now on exhibition are:

"A Study from still Life"—The seizure of a whisky manufactory.

"The Happy Planter"—A man burying his mother-in-law.

"Realization"—Brigadier-Generals handing in their commissions. You needn't.

"The Last Rose of Summer"—A Senator stumped.

"How happy I could be with Either"—Scene in a dentist's rooms.

"True to the Core"—Eve eating the apple.

"Enjoying the first Weed"—A widow in her new black.

"Aiming at the Text"—A parent chastising a child.

"Patience on a Monument"—Bilious-looking person sitting on the High Rock Spring at Saratoga.

A young man, who is desperately in love, says that he has been electrified with a pet-cock battery.

A THOUGHT BY A TEETOTALLER.

At dinner none do entreat
A blessing, ere they crave their meat;
But for, if you, ever thank
To ask a blessing on their drink.

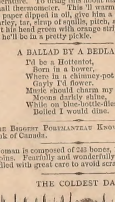
The question whether hanging should be abolished was recently discussed by a debating society. Sam Wood was adverse to the suspensory process, as may be inferred from his proposition: "Mr. President, talk of hanging for stealing! Why, Sir, where would I have been, where would you have been, where would we all have been, if hanging were the penalty for that offence? Let the plagiarists answer."

ALL IS THE TASTE.—One Tobacconist, who has literally retired to a little villa in the outskirts, speaks of it as his Snuff-Box.

ASSOCIATIONS' TOAST AND SENTIMENT.—May we never want a patient, nor a bottle to give him!

A FOGY ON THE FREEZING POINT.

"In bitter cold, and lo, the mercury
In Fahrenheit's thermometer has gone
Down below thirty-two. Ah, me, quicksilver!
Now, in the frosty winter of mine age,
Would that I could do the same!



HOW TO PICKLE PORK.—Get the hog into a proper temperature. To bring this about make him swallow a small thermometer. This will warm him. Rub him with paper dipped in oil, give him a uniform coating of barley, fair, sleep of pebbles, pitch, and gold-leaf. Paint his head green with orange stripes, and by that time he'll be in a pretty pickle.

A BALLAD BY A DEDLAMITE.

I'd be a Hottentot,
Born in a hollow,
Where in a chimney-pot
Gayly I'd lower.
Maybe should charm my eyes,
Moons darkly shine,
While on blue devil-fishes
Boiled I would dine.

THE BIGGEST FORMIANTZAF KNOWN—The Grand Trunk of Canada.

THE COLDEST DAY.

Mr. Jinks is surprised to find room full of icicles.

Puts on four coats, five pair of pants, and starts off.

Is alarmed to find huge ball on his mouth, his breath having congealed.

Rushes home to find Wife and Children as above.

Catches up a hatchet and cuts off the icicles, and releases the Cat.

MAYHEMENT MADE EASY.—A young lady is in want of a husband. She is handsome, amiable, and accomplished, but not pretty. She advertises for a blind man.

THE FORCE OF HABIT.—A literary friend was overheard the other evening respecting his landlady to put clean proof-sheets on his bed.

A man in New Jersey advertises to repair broken pitchers: hollow brains fill on the premises by contract hands, and marble halls furnished on the shortest notice. Bad memories taken in exchange for heart-strings furnished at short notice, hard tempers melted down, black hearts regilt without cost, old Roman noses new vamped, gray hair curled and dyed, parched lips made rosy, and wrinkles pressed out, all on the most reasonable terms.

"SOUND" LOGIC.—Ginger Pop.

A love-lorn poet thus gives vent to his feelings:

Were I court-plaster I would be
A patch upon her fin,
And vyed my life in ecstasy,
And sip, and sip, and sip.

Were I a pair of spectacles,
How dearly would I prize
A situation on her nose,
To gaze into her eyes!

A certain doctor asked Diogenes which he thought the best way to die. "Surely," he replied, "you might have learned that much from your patients."

FLOATING CAPITAL.—Venice.

The height of politeness is passing around upon the opposite side of a lady, while walking with her, in order not to step upon her shadow.

APPEARANCES ARE DECEITFUL.

BY WINTHROP SARGENT.

I saw a jewel gleaming in the light
Of the young moon, and as it lay afar,
It seemed unto my dim, old eyes a sight
Invested with the glory of a star.
I hastened on to prove the gaining prize,
But when I stooped to take it up,
What late so radiant to the distant eyes,
I found was but a chip of bottle-glass!

I saw a form, fair as the lily's bell,
"That shinest with a glory passing bright,
Could we but closer scan the mystery well,
Thou'dst shine no brighter, maybe, than that vase.
So, too, my form, as ruthless as the sage
Might prove a lay-form merely—a sort of penumbra—
Inlay matter of some unlikely character,
Of which there are too many about, on which to display some new candidate or case.

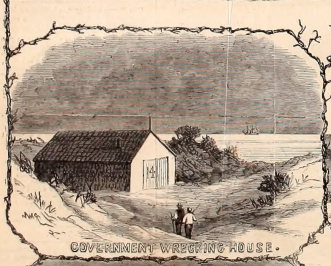
PROVERBS.

Don't swoop with your relations unless you kin afford to give them the big end of the whole.

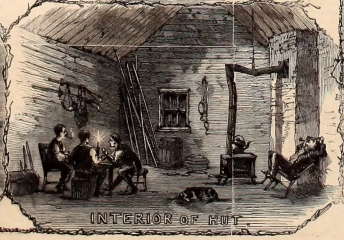
Marry young, and, if circumstances permit, often.



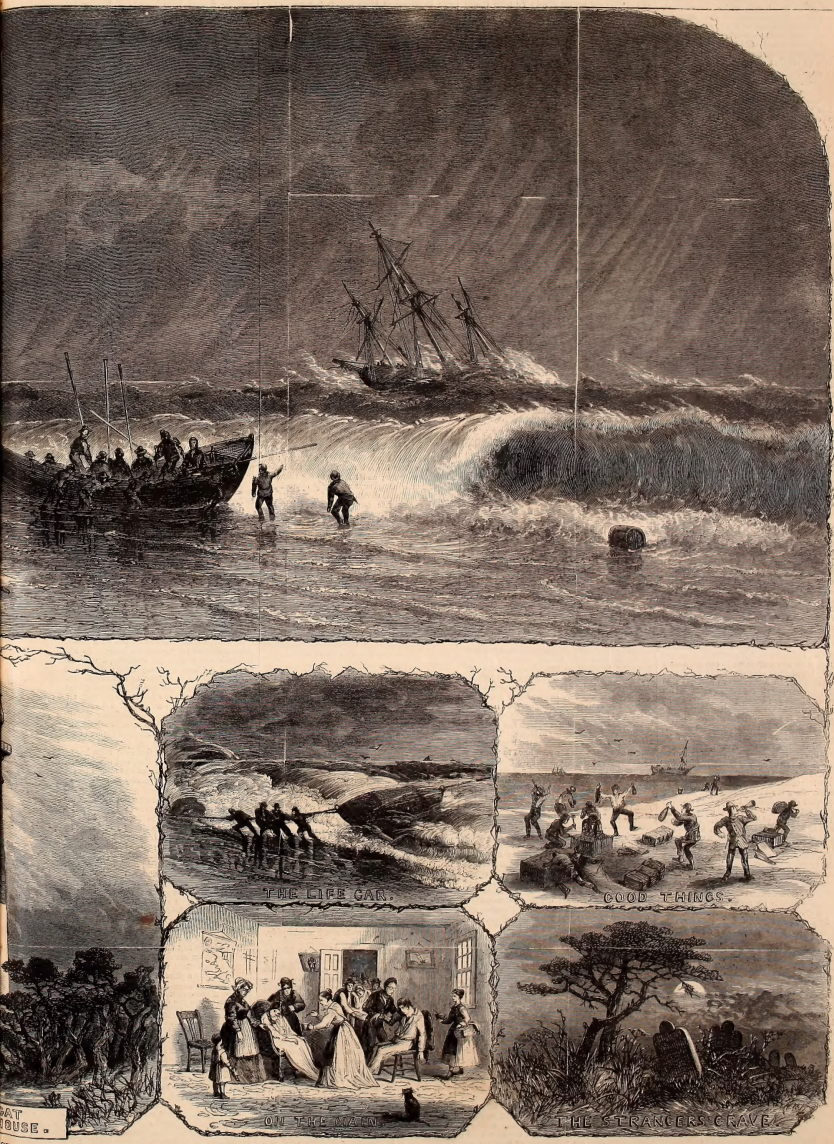
If you can't get good clothes and education too, get the clothes.

Be charitable—one cent pieces were made on purpose.

Keep both ize open, but don't see more'n half you see.



Young man, be more anxious about the pedigree you going to leave, than you are about the wun somebody's going to leave yu.



AMONG THE WRECKERS OF THE NEW JERSEY COA

ST.—Drawn by Mr. Granville Perkins.—[See Page 58.]

AMONG THE WRECKERS.

THE wrecks at sea which attract the attention of the public, and horrify entire communities, though of too frequent and sad occurrence, are but a small proportion of the number of such disasters which really occur. Those appalling wrecks of each year by which large numbers of lives are lost, or great untransmitable interests affected, can be counted on one's fingers; and it is those only which, displayed in the public prints, attract the attention of the busy multitude. But if one desires to fully comprehend the great number of wrecks which annually occur on our coasts let him glance over the shipping list of any "ship news" column of any New York daily paper for a year or even half a year; or, better still, let him spend a short time in our noble inner bay, among the wreckers of the New Jersey coast, or those of the still more dangerous Florida Keys, and he will become convinced of the great dangers to which those who go down to the sea in ships are continually exposed. It is impossible to give any thing like accurate statistics of the number of vessels annually wrecked on our coasts, for unfortunately our Government is very loose in its figures. England is a little more exact in this matter, and for the benefit and guidance of her mariners publishes annually what is known as the "Wreck Chart," and which not only gives the number and values of vessels lost, and the lives sacrificed, but also informs on what part of the coast each disaster occurred, thus pointing out the most dangerous points of the English shores. On this chart, which is an outline map of the United Kingdom, each wreck is indicated by a black dot, and in the chart for 1866 this dismal body is observed to be thickly and deadly spread as in half-mourning. The accompanying statistics show that the number of vessels wrecked on the English coasts in 1866 was 1,109, the number of lives lost 898, while the loss in money is estimated at about $15,000,000, as our dollars go nowadays. But these figures do not tell half of our casualties we can not say; but it is believed that in the matter of dangerous coasts and the number of wrecks annually thereon England —and long may she enjoy!—an undisputed supremacy.

The causes of shipwrecks are not less curious than the statistics. The natural causes are many. Besides dangerous coasts, shifting sands, sudden squalls, lightning, fogs, icebergs, and hurricanes of the torrid zone, the floating icebergs of the frigid and temperate zones, the Gulf Stream and other ocean currents, the currents of the rivers there are other natural causes of wrecks; but strangely enough it is calculated that the largest proportion of the loss of life is brought about through the villainy of man! This at first may seem incredible, but nevertheless it is charged in all seriousness as a good authority.

One of the chief causes of the many wrecks on the English coast, as before enumerated, is said to be "the cupidity of the poor shore people" or the owners of the vast navy of coal-carrying vessels of England. These vessels are always overloaded, and thus are lost in consequence. The same good authority makes Marine Insurance answerable for a large proportion of this loss, as, under the present system of insurance, owners and masters are encouraged to wreck their vessels in order to secure the insurance money. Moreover, according to the present terms of insurance, a captain is often led to convert a mere casualty happening to his ship into a total loss. If, for instance, he manages to wreck his ship totally, his owner gets the benefit of the whole amount of insurance effected upon her. If he is on the other hand, the captain only runs her aground, and is seaman enough to get her off again, the owner has to bear one-third part of the costs of repairs. Under these circumstances, can it be wondered at that many captains have orders, in case of a heavy sticking to the bottom to her fate? It is even charged further that many new ships are built for the purpose of being lost! The truth is this fact prevails in America, where the Florida Reef is at hand for the purpose of the dishonest skippers," says the English authority, "a dishonest shipowner is not the only bad set which it seems abounds here as well as in England, if we are to believe our English informant, "but the so-called 'humane' pilots' and 'rescuals' lighthouse keepers' conspire to throw and lure valuable vessels into the hands of the owners and professed wreckers who infest the shores of the great oceans.

Wreckers and longshoremen have had a bad name from time immemorial. They are a peculiar trade class—there is no doubt of that—and are lured to their avocations and supported occupation by the hope of gain, not the love of human life; but, after all, what class of mankind can boast of any higher motive than to get gain? The virtue of the wreckers is not superior to their culture, but who of us shall stand forth and throw stones at them? Not I! Well, our pictures, they have naturally sought wild, exciting occupations, and if there be some bad ones among them, who can wonder at it? Upon conjecture I. They can not be organized; they have a rude government of their own, cemented by the mutual interests and the dangers suggested, but all attempts at disciplining them have failed. The New York Board of Underwriters some years ago tried the experiment of disciplining wreckers by fitting out a wrecking-schooner of their own, and sending her to Key West in the hope of a gain to their interests. But the experiment signally failed. The wrecking service is one which can not be maintained by ordinary rates of wages and compensation. The underwriters' vessel consequently remained idly, or laggardly at best, in port, while the independent wreckers were braving the storms and hardships of a most trying business. England has an organized Coast Guard and a National Life-boat Service and other paid and disciplined salvors of property, of great efficiency, but the French of late years have complained that they are little better than wreckers in their depredations. The efficient organization of wreckers has always failed; no good substitute has been suggested for the present system, and, with all its faults, there is no doubt that under it the wreckers of our coast save many lives and much property, and do, in their rough way, a great deal of good.

The incentive to prompt action on the part of a wrecker is saving property on the enormous rate, the danger which actuates and cements the Democratic party, "the cohesive power of public plunder." To the underwriters or Board of Underwriters, not to the wreckers, belong the spoils rescued from a wreck. The wrecker gets only a certain per centage on what he saves—unless he chooses to appropriate such small matters as may be rifled from the ship's safe or a dead man's pocket. For all salvage is always high—sometimes extravagantly so—but as it is fixed by a court appointed to try each case no angry passion is always just. The "appropriations" are often very great also, and not uniformly so just. There is no reward laid out or paid for the rescue of life but by the laws which guide the court it is necessary that each wrecker, to establish his claim for salvage, shall prove that he made no efforts to secure property until all the endangered passengers were aided as far as lay in the wrecker's power; and no property is ever promptly made, and so proven, or the claim for salvage is not allowed. There is one notable exception to the statement that no award is ever made to a wrecker for saving human life. The decision was made at Key West many years ago, and under the following circumstances: A ship laden with sugars, bound from Havana to a European port, was wrecked upon a reef in the vicinity of Key West. Besides the vessel, besides the crew, were four or five passengers. Only one boat remained from the wreck, and in the state this was too small to hold the entire company in escaping from the wreck. A raft was constructed and the party divided, the passengers on the wreck and the abandoned raft. The wrecker went immediately in pursuit of the raft and its freight of human life, and kept it in sight closely and anxiously cruised for it until it was found and the people upon it were rescued. Then, and not until then, did the wrecker attend to the wreck. Of the perishable cargo nothing could of course be saved; and after stripping the wreck of the available portions of her hull, and other furniture were carried into Key West.

"In this case," said the Judge of the Admiralty Court, "I award to the wrecker the value of the articles saved, in value not over three or four hundred dollars, as a just though inadequate compensation for efforts to save human life." And this was the first and only instance in which he ever gave an award for such an object.

We promised to give a wood-cut or two engraving on the preceding page to tell to the intelligent reader its own story. MR. GRANVILLE PERKINS, the artist, is quite a noted sketcher and painter of maritime views, and his drawings in this instance are from actual studies among the wreckers about Barnegat Inlet. The large picture shows the wreckers at work preparing to aid the passengers and crew of the vessel which, on the right background, has got aground in a rough sea, and in appearance is rapidly going to pieces. They have hastily launched and manned a boat, which is to carry the rope which has been fixed to the shore to the doomed ship; others have arrived with the life-car on its trolley, and are getting ready to launch it as soon as the cable is stretched from ship to shore; while others build lights on the higher ground along the beach. Even in this pursuit—pure to catch the person who is being washed toward them by the sea, while a woman and man are already in the hands of the wreckers. The accessory pictures are not less interesting though hardly as exciting as the main subject. On the "Coquettish" Jersey coast, which is one of a number of buildings erected at intervals along the coast and maintained by the Government. They contain life-boats, life-lines and lamps, and a few medicines, intended for the relief of wrecked persons; but the service is much neglected, and is performed only when the aid and assistance in the huts of the wreckers, as shown in the sketch entitled "On the Main." Other pictures show the wreckers at the interior of a wrecker's hut. The manner of operating the life-car is also shown. This car is water-tight, and persons from the wreck are placed in it and dragged through the surf to the shore. "Good Things," and "Morning Round," and the "Stranger's Grave" need no explanation. The engraving shows, we believe, all the principal features of pictures, their own story of a wrecker's life.

THE "WALLED LAKES" OF IOWA.

MR. WHITE, the State Geologist of Iowa, has explained away the mystery of the "Walled Lakes" of Iowa, of which so much has been said and written, by showing that "these immense structures of a lost and forgotten race" were constructed solely by the action of the ice which covers these lakes every winter. The "walls," or more properly "embankments," which surround these lakes vary much in height and width, as well as in the materials which compose them; sometimes they are principally of boulders, but more often of sand, gravel, and earthy material thrown out of the bed of the lake. When the embankments are composed principally of boulders they are deeply thrown up from two to four feet high, and from five to fifteen feet wide, and imbedded in sand, gravel, and earth, the outside of the embankment being usually as steep as the inner or lake side; and the latter often faintly resembles an artificial levee. Although they sometimes have a degree of regularity the boulders which compose them are never arranged in any order, nor is there an appearance of any work of art upon them.

The cause which produced these walls is the ice. Whenever the ice becomes frozen to the bottom of the lake it would freeze fast to, and in many instances inclose, the boulders and gravel which were strewed upon the bottom. When spring returned the ice being raised by the rains and melting snows, would be carried with its burdens to the high-water shore by the prevailing wind. This action continued year after year has resulted in the removal of the boulders and gravel to the shore, where they are left where the force of the ice ceases to act. The constant dashing of the waves against the beach in summer has resulted in imbedding the boulders and washing up the sand, thus producing a strong, compact wall encircling each lake.

COUSIN BOB'S FIRST LOVE.

I WAS staying last winter with a relative who understands comfort. Until he married and settled in the country, a couple of years ago, he had been a confirmed bachelor, and profited by his opportunities to such an extent that he has lain down a railway on his dining-room mantle-piece, and furnished the apartment with several small but firm and solid tables, which are placed round the fire at dessert-time; and his whim is, that his guests shall not be put to ingenuity about the hearth, with a table for every pair, and that the decanters should travel by hand, like a gentleman in a drawing-room. He says he says, from one chimney-corner to the other, and then take the rail across the chord of the arc to their starting-point. And it is a curious illustration of the saving of fatigue in modern traveling, that the rapid journey across has no apparent effect upon their constitutional vigor. He conveys people from table to table takes a great deal out of them. He has another fancy, arising probably from a ten years' solitude in chambers, which is, that when the party is small and sociable, the ladies should not retire; and I regret to say that this innovation is not always so highly appreciated by either sex as it should be.

As a general rule, however, the experiment is a success. In fact, it is an unmistakable fund of animal spirits, and a talent for drawing people out of their shells.

One evening we were particularly cozy. There were eight of us, all relations or intimate friends.

"Let us put out the gas and tell stories," said the youngest of the party.

"Good, as to the stories; but why put out the gas?"

"Oh, because stories go better with fire-light; besides, people tell things about themselves more plainly the less clearly they are seen. At school the girls would tell us no secrets of secrets after we had gone to bed."

"Liddy is right. I will turn off the gas —There! Now, who will do a bit of secular confession?"

Liddy looked mischievously round, and said, "Cousin Bob."

"Yes, of course; he has hardly spoken all the evening, and must have been meditating.—Come, Bob, tell us what has occupied your thoughts."

"I was reflecting upon the folly of mankind, which values turkeys in proportion to their largeness, whereas a small turkey is infinitely nicer than a large one. I was also speculating as to whether a cassowary could digest a mince-pie. I think not."

"Come, come, Bob, though you are an old bachelor, an epicure, and a lawyer, you must have an interesting reminiscence for us. What romantic attachment have you become acquainted with in the course of business, for example."

"Well, I am not exactly in the habit of betraying the confidences of my clients; but if you would like to hear an outline of the case of Doddy and Glover, I will make an exception in your favor. It is a case which will see Doddy in trustee for a burial-ground, and the vicar—"

"Oh, oh! No, no!"

"It is of no use, I fear; Bob has no romance in him."

"Romance! I have done with that the last twenty years."

"Then you were romantic once!" cried Lyddy. (Sharp girl that.) "Tell us."

"Yes, do tell us, Bobby, I was an inhabitant of an ideal world, for I knew nothing of the real one. My parents lived in a most secluded manner; and as they had peculiar notions on the subject of education they never sent me to school. My father had an idea that it ought to be the good boy of his life to watch my mind open just as if it were an oyster!—By-the-by, you are right to serve them in the top shells, Morton.—I was taught to love not all round Spenser's Fairy Queen, at least not quite through; and as for Annals of Good, I will bet even that some of you have never opened its pages. Those two books were my favorites; I knew great parts of them by heart. I wrote a little poetry myself, and some of it was thought rather pretty: my Field Mouse, and Stanzas to an Autumnal Fly, for example. Would you like to hear my Autumnal Fly?—No? That is fortunate, for I fear that it is obsolete. I was sent at last to a private tutor, who was to pry that mind of mine open a little more, and stow what was needful for matriculation at the university into the gap. Here, as last, I might have had a chance of a glimpse at the True, one would have thought; but, unfortunately, my tutor was a poor and hard-working curate in a thinly-populated district; a good man, who, when he was not conching me or walking over the moors to outlying parishioners, was entirely preoccupied with coal-tickets, tracts, sore legs, rheumatisms, twins, and such like. And I had no fellow-pupil. So, if possible, I got rather worse instead of better, and commenced an epic in six books.

"Likewise, I fell in love."

"Hurrah! Pass the bottle before he begins. Empty and take a back-hander, Bob. Now, then."

"It really was rather a romantic affair. I was walking out alone one day, in search of an appetite and an inspiration, when I came to a house and garden surrounded by a high wall at the foot of a hill. The appetite I had little difficulty about in those happy days. The inspiration hung fire, and the epic poem could not for the life of it get over the third stanza of the first canto, where it had stuck for weeks. To soar above the world a bit might help me, so I turned to the hill and tried the Excelsior plan. When I had mounted a couple of hundred feet of slippery grass I was out of breath, throbbing at the temples and damp; so I turned about and sat down on a convenient sheep-path to see if the Muse was inclined to strike up yet. The Muse was not inclined. But I made a capital bird's-eye view of the garden beneath me, which was large, and laid out with thick and shady shrubberies, and in a walk which intersected one of these I caught the glimpse of a female robe.

"Now, a poet who catches sight of a petticoat while he is in the very crucible of composition is bound to become enamored, unless, indeed, it is on a clothes-line, or he is already in love with some one else—and I am not sure that he is not always be safe even in those contingencies. I was clean bowled on the instant. However strapoyable a man may be, man would have paralyzed Ajax saw whether she had a hump or a wooden leg, or was nearest sixteen or sixty; but my instinct told me that she was young and pretty. In half a minute she emerged into a clear space, and faith! my instinct was right. Though she was rather far off, I was long-sighted and could tell that.

"As when the sportsman, intent on shooting a rabbit or crow, watches the direction in which he expects the furred creature to appear next, so did I gaze on the gaps in the trees through which the stylish-like form would presently glide, and then I watched her till we once more disappeared beneath the leaves, and I had to look for it in the setting further on.

"At length she happened to turn her eyes toward the hill, and so became aware of my presence. There was only one point of sympathy between us established already; she too must be long-sighted, for she could evidently distinguish that I was a man. Shepherd, at least, had the natural sense of tending sheep—in the Arcadian meaning, I was a little in that line—for she would not otherwise have taken so much notice of me; standing still and looking full at me; walking on, and stealing hurried side-glances; reaching the most accidental spots where she fancied I could not detect her.

"After playing at bo-peep for about a quarter of an hour, during most of which we kept moving, and she hurried off toward the house. As she took one last look in my direction, I rose up, and laid my hand upon my heart, and waved my her handkerchief in answer, and vanished. On the following day I returned to the same spot at the same hour, and saw her again. She took off by my hat; she waved her parasol; I kissed my hand, she kissed hers. The flirtation was as desperate as it could be under the circumstances distance between us, and the insecure nature of my footing.

"I continued to haunt that hill; sometimes I saw the divinity of the garden, and sometimes I did not; but when I did, she was always alone, and we exhibited our ingenuity in exchanging sentiments by signs.

"However timid and respectful a lover may be, he does not long remain at a greater distance than a hundred yards to the object of his affections, and that was the closest I could get to mentioning my name the lowest speech we commanded a view over the wall. Besides, to enable a telegraph to work satisfactorily, the parties communicating by it should seem to be nearly beckoned to me. I ran down the hill and was under the wall in half a minute.

"'Are you there?' asked the soft and sweetest voice (present company always excepted) that I ever heard.

"'I am, dearest fairest, I am.'

"Bang came something on the top of my hat. It was a large stone, with the following note attached to it by a piece of string:

"'Mysterious unknown, are you another foe or a friend? A secret instinct inclines me to deem you the latter. Are you my guardian angel? If so, why not sought me out, and come to my rescue? Or have you been driven by a mysterious magnetic power to the foot of these walls, ignorant of whom they contain? If the latter, you are not of others, but your questions excite suspicion. There are spies every where. I depend upon you for information. Answer quickly if time and place. Speak not, but adopt my method of communication.'

"The style was, to my then taste, charming. The ('Shakspeare') was rather eccentric perhaps; but did it not show a sweetly tender conscience, only too rare in these days of wholesale plagiary?

"I should have liked to have returned an answer in poetry, but there was not time for an impromptu. So I tore a leaf (there were plenty of blank ones) out of the note-book intended for my epic (which indeed eventually proved to be all blank verse), and wrote the following letter:

"Fair and afflicted lady, you are right: I am indeed a friend; and I know not who you are. An almighty influence—need I name it?—has drawn me toward you. I know nothing, I seek to know nothing, but that I am your blind and devoted slave."

"Pretty, was it not?" Well, I tied that to the stone, and remembering my own accident, and that my charmer did not wear a tail, still hat, I uttered a warning-cry, and tossed the missive over the wall. Then I ran up the hill, to see how she liked it, and ascended high enough in time to observe with the keenness of reading the note, which she did holding it at arm's-length, clutching it with both hands, lips parted. If she had striven to look like a cork-lipsolette painter, she could not have done it better.

"What I had said seemed to be satisfactory to her, for whereas she had read it she kissed the note twice, and thrust it into her bosom; looked up at the sky, clasped her hands, and walked rapidly off toward the house, without attempting to communicate with me further.

"Immediately after that commencement of a correspondence I went to bed, or sat in, and I did not see the mystery of my heart for a week: at the end of that time the sun reappeared, and on mounting guard on my hill I perceived that she was once more in the garden. She appeared glad to see me, and motioned me down to the foot of the wall again, and when I was there tossed me over another letter:

"I can not fully trust you till I have scanned your features more closely. Swim the moat and scale the battlements, so shall we converse at ease."

"What did she mean by a moat? Was it a playful allusion to the quantity of rain that had fallen? Or a sarcastic intimation that the difficulties I had to overcome were trifling indeed to those which lovers in the good old times thought nothing of? Or was she merely indulging in a poetical license? I left all this for future consideration: I thought perhaps we could display the wall, and her meaning was sufficiently plain for immediate practical emergence.

"'I come,' I wrote. 'I come!' I cried, looking about for a good climbing situation. But the wall had been newly pointed, and there were no cracks or projecting stones. Not enough toe or hold tips could be insinuated. A smooth surface was presented to me, up which a cat might possibly have run, though I doubt it, but before which a clawless creature was helpless.

"I was now well provided with writing materials, and I wrote, 'Fear not, adorable one, a ridged, tinted, and scented note-paper, promising, however, to get over it and up the wall next day, or to perish in the attempt, though by some other alternative was to be accomplished I could not for the life of me imagine.

"But the fair one had right counsel; and on the following morning I procured several large nails, or staples, and a mallet; and going to the place earlier than usual, I drove the staples, straight up, and then, standing on the lowest and holding on to the other with my left hand, I knocked a third in still higher; and so, after many strokes and bruises of the skin, I contrived a series of points of advantage which enabled me to scramble high enough to get a hold of the top of the wall, and then I was all right, for there were no broken bottles along the coping.

"The last I saw of my charmer she stood on the ground and ran up the hill to the post of observation, and there I sat till the lady made her appearance: then I waved my hat, and, in triumph, sailed over, sprang up the wall, and seated myself on the top of it. Beneath me stood the object of my affections, so close that I could scan her every feature, each her tiniest sigh. That was a great trial, for I had let my imagination take the bit between its teeth upon the subject of her charms, and a coarse complexion, irregular teeth, or large ears, would have disenchanted me. But she really was a remarkably handsome girl, with as soft and anxious, distressed look in her eyes, which appealed strongly to the sympathies. There was a certain eccentricity in her dress, for with her, ordinary weddings might have taken exception at, but which only served to rivet my chains the faster.

"'Tis well,' she said, when she had gazed on me in silence for a somewhat embarrassing minute. 'Now descend, face sideways, and so again well. Your features recommend you, but they are sometimes deceitful. Can I really, truly trust you?'

"Loveliest and dearest, you can,' I replied from the top of the wall. 'I will lay down my life to serve you.'

"I accept,' she said in solemn tones, which gave me rather a chill. 'One does not expect one's words to be taken up in that literal way.'

"I had some live for you, though, I hastened to add; and here was a fine opportunity of adapting to the spirit of the original utterer of that joke for the theft.

"Thanks! thanks!' she explained. 'And what will you do for me? How prove that devotion which I doubt not?'

"It was more convenient for a youth under age, entirely destitute both of resources and experience, and situated in a precarious position on the top of a wall, to deal in generalities than to propose any definite course of action. I was puzzled for a moment, but suddenly remembered with relief that I was in complete ignorance as to who she was and what she wanted, and that it was only reasonable that the direction in which my chivalrous path was to be should be pointed out by her.

"'True,' she said, when I mentioned this fact. 'I must trust you with my sad secret. Know, then, that I am not what I seem. Doubtless, you take me for an Englishwoman, for I speak your tongue with fluency and correctness; but no: I am a Russian princess. A cruel and wicked cousin coveted my estates, to which he was the next heir. He sought to acquire them by the lawful mode of marriage, but being a man of ungovernable temper, he one day had a serf knouted to death before my eyes; and I feared for myself. The sting of outraged vanity was then added to his cupidity, and he determined to dispossess me. But I was a favorite with the Czar, the Czarina, and all the royal family: and while I remained in Russia I was safe. But a sad infatuation tempted me to travel, and the moment I crossed the Prussian boundaries I was seized and hurried to this place, where I have been incarcerated ever since. Doubtless my villainous relative has spread the report of my death, and is squandering my property upon his minions.'

"But, cried I, with an enthusiasm which nearly made me lose my balance, 'the matter is simple. I will go to the nearest magistrate; I will seek the aid of the police—I will—'

"Pray—pray, do nothing of the kind!' she exclaimed with alarm. 'My enemy is connected by the strictest ties with my own prime minister and the chief of your police is in his power. One word to the authorities, and my cause is lost for ever! No; flight is the only resource. And my escape; fly with me; bring me to my native land, and I am saved. Eternal gratitude and countless treasures shall be yours.'

"And may I not presume to a higher reward?' I asked.

"What mean you?' she replied, bashfully.

"I fear lest my temerity should offend you,' said I: 'but love is ever presumptuous. And if I could only hope that my devotion might one day meet with a return, I should be inspired with valor before which all obstacles would melt away.'

"This was pretty well for a bashful lad, was it not? I do not believe I could have spoken such words in an ordinary drawing-room now, but I am dependent upon it; but from the top of a wall it was different. Retreat, therefore was impossible, and retreat so easy! And yet, when one comes to think of it, to make an offer of marriage to a princess on a first interview was a prodigious proceeding. It was successful, however, for I was accepted then and there, and all that remained was to make arrangements for flight, but it will not do, on an empty stomach: counsel and admonition may be cheap and good for the patient, but they do not reach the heart, if a hungry body longs for food.

"Mr. Van Meter, the projector of the Howard Mission, was a remarkable man in his line. A few words can be conceived a scheme for the benefit of station-house lodgers. The intention was the application of several of the police station-houses, and, with their approval, cards of invitation were issued, inviting somebody unknown to attend the meeting. Mr. Van Meter on Sunday morning—the name of the invited being left to be inserted according to the judgment of the police. Accordingly those to whom it was considered judicious to extend the invitation were dismissed from the station-house on each Sunday morning, and conducted to the Howard Mission-house. The first Sunday about one hundred and fifty responded to the call, and a number of the four hundred unwashed creatures partook of a bountiful breakfast of substantial food and hot coffee. Besides this, as the first thing, after a few pleasant words of welcome; then the guests of the Mission were prepared to listen to a religious and moral address instruction, adapted to their condition. Gentleness and kind words melted the hardened, softened the hardened men, and as the short and simple prayer was offered many a tear dropped from eyes unused to weep. Then, in personal conversation, sympathy and helpful advice was extended to those who were not unwilling to tell their story, and a friend was found in friendless. And finally—various small articles of clothing, such as scarfs, collars, shoes, etc., having been sent in by friends of the Mission—the guests were dismissed as were in want were supplied according to their immediate necessities.

Such a simple statement of this can not fail of accomplishing some good—how much no one will ever be known to those who labor than in Christian love: but the good seed was scattered, and the fruit must appear in kinds of soil, will spring up and bear fruit in strange places years hence.

A few weeks ago yellow-fever of the most malignant type broke out on board the United States steamer Dee, at Vera Cruz. Twenty-three men were seized with it, and several died. The commander landed the sick, and then, clearing the hatches of the berth-deck and between-decks, he caused a fire in the steam heater in each, and kept them filled with steam for two hours. At each time the thermometer indicated a temperature of 90° in the ward-room, and 110° in the berth-deck. The hatching was then discontinued for the night, and the work was effected: there were no more cases of yellow-fever.

In some of the cars on the New York and New Haven Railroad there has been placed, running under the seats, and connected with a heater at one end of the car, by means of which a circulation of hot water is kept up. This is a useful improvement upon the ordinary method of warming cars, since the heat is greatest where it is most needed, in the region of the feet.

It has been ascertained that sixty per cent. of the weight of cocoons is lost in the silk-mill. In Calcutta, it is said, they obtain from every one hundred pounds of husks twenty pounds of excellent vegetable paper, coarse, but serviceable for long fibre, suitable for spinning and weaving into a cloth of great strength, and fifty pounds of farinaceous substance, which, by itself, or added to wheat flour, makes an excellent bread, and will keep sweet and good for months, and in time will constitute a large item in the price of bread in army and at sea. Husks are worth $70 per ton in St. Louis, for the manufacture of mattresses. To prepare them for market it is only needful to split them once or twice and bale them.

Yankee ingenuity, energy enterprising, and will engage in almost any respectable (and sometimes quite otherwise) business for the sake of money. One Yankee of great energy is reported to have bought an island in the Ohio River, and stocked the same with black cats, intending to go into the fur trade. There is a story of a gentleman who, years ago, made a similar experiment on an island in the Chesapeake Bay. He sent a colony of the finest felines to the island, and they soon increased so wonderfully that he was compelled to send a boat-load of live rats to the island and fish with a seine, in order to supply them with food. Soon whole legions of black cats trooped over the island home, devouring every thing in the shape of food. Alarmed at this, one of the men returned to the main land to report the state of affairs. Meanwhile the cats became exceedingly bold, and the remaining men locked himself in his cabin, and prepared for a siege. The enemy, urged on by hunger, surrounded the house, climbed up the sides, staring in at the windows, and keeping up their usual melodious caterwauling. The affrighted man carefully stopped up every crevice, and for two days and nights he was kept in that singular prison, with the melodious howls of famishing cats ever resounding in his ears. On the third day he arrived with great, non-avail in escorting him from his truly awful position; but the mariners were too the cats, to force their speech, and threatening their downcomer, they took the rescuers and the rescued were only too glad to leave this pandemonium. Vessels at once visited the island, and not one of the most extensive cat-rearing ventures ever attended.

A very singular incident occurred on the Grand Trunk Railroad not long ago. A little girl, two years old, with her parents, was on board the saloon car attached on a night freight train, and was sitting near the side-door, which was partially open. The train was on a down grade, running twenty miles per hour, when a sudden rebound of the car threw the child out of the door. Horror-stricken, the conductor signaled to "break up hard," seized his lantern, jumped off, and ran back, expecting to see a bruised corpse, but fervently hoped to find the child crying out "Papa! papa!" and in a moment more met the man running along to catch the train. The wind, which was blowing from the east, had fanned the fleecy clothing and buoyed her up, and she was not in the least injured.

In Bridgeport, Connecticut, a novelty is being constructed in the shape of a wagon body made of rubber, hardened in the solidation of tin and iron in the composition, and cast in a mould.

A Springfield Yankee has invented a "power ice or street carriage," which resembles a double sofa, has seats for five, and is propelled by a crank-movement by the driver on the front seat. It will run backward and forward, has a person-guard to steering and keeping well wrapped up in buffalo robes and afghans.

Cold weather they have in Maine. An inquirious person residing in that frigid section of the United States attempted to eat some meat which clung to an axe, when the creature's tongue was frozen to the handle—and never ate again. This style of monosyllap is the latest known.

Foreign papers say that out of five young men in Berlin, Prussia, who recently tried to learn to whistle, not sleep, three died. Why didn't they go to sleep? And what, we should like to know, did they die?

A new pill has been invented in Albany. It is made of India-rubber. One box is warranted to cure a cold, and renders your own coal inquiries vain to water.

Some distinguished legal gentleman some wounded that where he "had found one fraudulent debtor he had found ninety-nine fraudulent creditors." A practical illustration of this statement is found in the tea of a Dutchman living somewhere in the kingdom of Grease.

"Hans," said he to his son one day, "you go to mill right off. Den lab no even more."

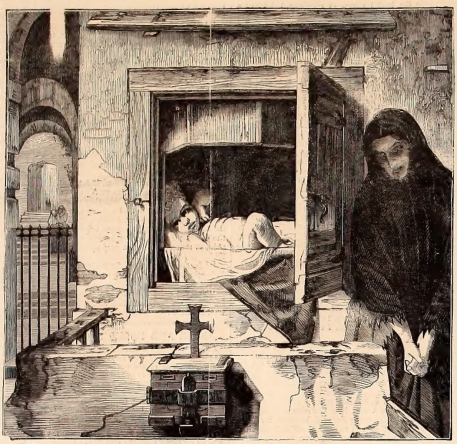
"Yah," said Hans, "and den I be no corn shelled, neider."

"Nein! Vell, ten I tells you. How much corn Schmidt porrows—you know vus—last year sometimes?"

"Vell, pout ten bushel," replied Hans.

"Vah! so I dinks, too. Take de mare, Hans, and tell Schmidt you come for de corn he porrows. And, Hans, take a sexpile of page mit you, Hans, and Hans. Schmidt have very short memory, Hans, and tink I vort vile taking you pushel to be mille, Hans."

FOUNDLING HOSPITALS.



THE late Dr. WORTHINGTON HOOKER, in a former Number of this journal (Vol. XI., p. 382), called attention to startling statements relative to the very great decrease in the number of invalunborn children in this and other countries, and the causes thereof. He showed that the number of children to each family in various States of the Union has been gradually decreasing for several decades, until the present time has declined from eight to less than three children to a family; and that the cause thereof was abortion, or murder before birth, on the part of the mothers! The appalling prevalence of such crimes is made apparent by the occasional notoriety given to murderous trials, and by the incidental publicity given to the advertisements of so-called physicians who conduct the nefarious practice which results in such crimes.

It was also stated in the same connection that statistical observations show that the strictly moral population is decreasing, while the vicious is increasing. This is owing in part to the cause above stated, and partly to the only less prevalent crime of infanticide, which is one of the means by which mothers are not arrested in this and other of our large cities, and in all parts of the country, during the first months after their offspring; and even more frequently do we hear of infants being exposed at the doors of our citizens. The prevalence of this latter crime has attracted the attention of the benevolent, but little has been accomplished has ever been done to prevent their commission. In older but not such enlightened countries than our own efforts have been made to prevent the loss of the many thousands of illegitimate children who are annually born. The most sensible and practical of these efforts have resulted in the establishment of hospitals in which the children may be deposited without the exposure of the guilty parent. The secrecy of the birth of a guilty mother to bring birth to an illegitimate child, is to remove the poor innocent whose existence is proof of her shame; and many of them in the despair of the moment destroy the lives of their children. The establishment of foundling hospitals has resulted in affording mothers a less horrible means of hiding their shame, and in the preservation of the life of the infant. The ultimate result has not always been what was argued, the encouragement of immorality, but the preservation of life.

In London and all parts of England, in most of the countries of Europe and South America, there are numbers of these hospitals, where base-born infants may be deposited without exposure to the parents. Our illustration on this page shows the manner in which infants are thus placed in the hospitals. The hospital which we have chosen to illustrate the subject is that of the Spedale degl' Innocenti at Florence, Italy, and the picture shews the wicket-gate for receiving the infants. A small door opens upon a recess large enough to contain an infant, basketed or otherwise. At the side of this little door is a bell-pull, which the depositor makes use of to summon attendance, and then hastily departs or conceals herself in a dark corner of the piazza, till, through an inner door corresponding with the outer one, the infant is taken from the recess into the hospital.

The prevalence of the crime of infanticide in this country demands the adoption of this or some equally practical plan for preserving human life, by removing the incentive of mothers to destroy their children; and it is to be hoped that the agitation of the subject may lead to early and sensible action on the part of the practically benevolent portion of the community.

THE WICKET OF THE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL AT FLORENCE, ITALY.

PIKE'S NEW OPERA-HOUSE.

WE have had occasion to mimadvert in rather strong terms on those architectural disgraces, our city theatres; and have said that "not one of the theatres and opera-houses of New York has any architectural beauty." This was very true at the time it was written, but it is inapplicable since Mr. S. N. PIKE has completed his elegant Opera-house at the corner of Eighth Avenue and Twenty-third Street.

The engraving which we present will give the reader an idea of the exterior of the building. It is built of iron and marble, and is four stories high, surmounted by a Mansard roof. The interior of this temple of music needs more elaborate description. The dimensions of the Opera-house proper, which is located in the rear of the marble building the front of which is seen in our engraving (and which is really only the gateway to this beautiful temple of music), are one hundred and eighty-five feet deep by eighty feet wide. It is built over a clear excavation of ten feet in depth, extending the full length and breadth of the entire front and rear buildings. The auditorium, from floor to ceiling, is 70 feet high, and will comfortably accommodate fully 2600 people. There are likewise six elegant proscenium boxes, and twenty-seven dress-circle boxes. The dress-circle boxes are arranged with white and gold ornaments, and the proscenium boxes are lined with tasty and handsome material, and curtained with blue damask, presenting a rich and elegant appearance. The proscenium has a depth of ten feet, and is profusely decorated with rich and pleasing designs, the whole being surmounted with massive trusses covered with gilded ornamentations of striking design and finish. The prevailing tints of the proscenium are white and gold, and the raised ornaments are unique and novel throughout, presenting a singularly beautiful effect from the auditorium. But the most striking and attractive feature is the dome which surmounts the centre of the auditorium. In a diameter of thirty feet there is an inner gallery for purposes of promenade, and in this are placed eight papier-maché figures in statuesque, each bearing a cluster of burners. A cupola of octagonal form surmounts the dome, encircling which are eight frescoed figures, representing the Muses, and executed in tinted colors, forming a spirited and pleasing contrast to the prevailing white and gold tints of the remainder of the theatre. The stage is 70 feet deep by 80 feet wide, thus leaving ample room for the most elaborate display of scenery. The drop-curtain represents the landing of COLUMBUS, and is a model both in design and execution. There are three capacious public entrances, the two principal of which are through the marble corner building, and both opening into a grand vestibule. The total area of entrance room is fully ninety feet, and in case of fire or accident there are other avenues of egress that can be thrown open at a moment's notice.

Mr. PIKE'S enterprise has been ably seconded by the architectural skill of Mr. G. THOMAS, and to the combined liberality of the one and the professional knowledge of the other the city of New York is indebted for this new and pleasing ornamentation, and it will doubtless amply reward the projector's enterprise.

PIKE'S NEW OPERA-HOUSE, CORNER OF TWENTY THIRD STREET AND EIGHTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY.]

THE VICTIM.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

A PLAGUE upon the people fell,
A famine after laid them low,
Then thorpe and byre arose in fire,
For on them brake the sudden foe;
So thick they died the people cried
"The Gods are moved against the land."
The Priest in horror about his altar
To Thor and Odin lifted a hand.
"Help us from famine
And plague and strife!
What would you have of us?
Human life?
Were it our nearest,
Were it our dearest
(Answer, O answer),
We give you his life."

But still the foeman spoil'd and burn'd,
And cattle died, and deer in wood,
And bird in air, and fishes turn'd
And whiten'd all the rolling flood;
And dead men lay all over the way,
Or down in a furrow scathed with flame:
And ever and aye the Priesthood moan'd
Till at last it seemed that an answer came:
"The King is happy
In child and wife;
Take you his nearest,
Take you his dearest,
Give us a life."

The Priest went out by heath and hill;
The King was hunting in the wild;
They found the mother sitting still;
She cast her arms about the child.
The child was only eight summers old,
His beauty still with his years increased,
His face was ruddy, his hair was gold,
He seem'd a victim due to the priest.
The Priest exulted,
And cried with joy,
"Here is his nearest,
Here is his dearest,
We take the boy."

The King return'd from out the wild,
He bore but little game in hand;
The mother said "They have taken the child,
To spill his blood and heal the land:
The land is sick, the people diseased,
And blight and famine on all the lea:
The holy Gods, they must be appeased,
So I pray you tell the truth to me.
They have taken our son,
They will have his life.
Is he your nearest?
Is he your dearest?
(Answer, O answer)
Or I, the wife?"

THE VICTIM.—"AND SHRIEKING 'I AM HIS DEAREST!' RUSHED ON THE KNIFE."

The King bent low, with hand on brow,
He stay'd his arms upon his knee:
"O wife, what use to answer now?
For now the Priest has judged for me."
The King was shaken with holy fear;
"The Gods," he said, "would have chosen well;
Yet both are near, and both are dear,
And which the dearest I can not tell!"
But the Priest was happy,
His victim won.
"We have his nearest,
We have his dearest,
His only son!"
The rites prepared, the victim bared,
The knife uprising toward the blow,
To the altar-stone she sprang alone,
"Me, me, not him, my darling, no!"
He caught her away with a sudden cry;
Suddenly from him brake the wife,
And shrieking "I am his dearest, I—
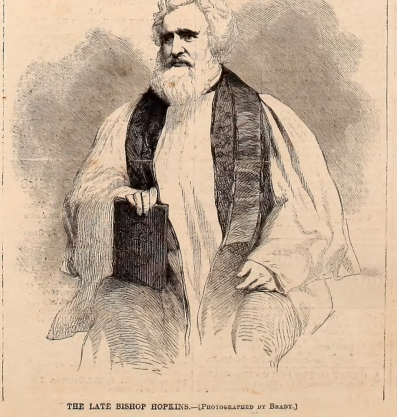
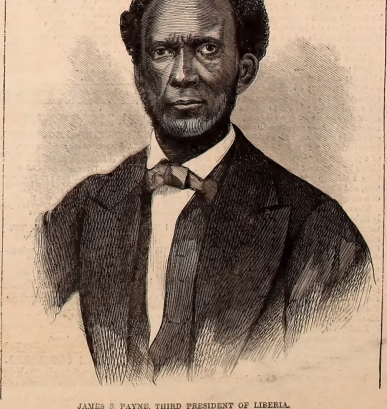
I am his dearest!" rush'd on the knife.
And the Priest was happy,
"O, Father Odin,
We give you a life.
Which was his nearest?
Which was his dearest?
The Gods have answered:
We give them the wife!"



BISHOP HOPKINS OF VERMONT.

REVEREND JOHN HENRY HOPKINS, for many years Episcopal Bishop of Vermont, of whom we give below an accurate portrait, died on January 9, aged 76 years. He was born in Ireland, but educated in this country. After engaging unsuccessfully in mercantile affairs and the practice of law, he entered the ministry in 1823. Immediately upon his ordination in 1824, Mr. HOPKINS became Rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, where he remained until 1831, when he went to Trinity Church, Boston, as assistant minister on the "Green foundation." In 1827 and 1829 he was clerical deputy in the General Conventions of the Church, and in both he took a prominent part in the debates. He was a candidate for the assistant Bishopric of Pennsylvania in 1827, but being a tie with his opponent, DR. ONDERDONK, he decided the contest in favor of his competitor by casting his own vote in favor of the other. In the same year that Mr. HOPKINS removed to Boston he became Professor of Divinity in the new Theological Seminary of Massachusetts, and the next year—1832—he was elected first Bishop of Vermont, an office he filled until his death. He accepted at the same time the rectorship of St. Paul's, Burlington, which he retained until 1856.



He was engaged for many years in advancing educational interests, and involved himself in debt by his efforts. He also published several works. In the dissension dividing the Episcopal Church Bishop HOPKINS was a decided champion of the High Church party, and refused to sign the famous protest of the Bishops last year against High Church practices.

THE NEW PRESIDENT OF LIBERIA.

THE American public take special interest and pride in the "Republic of American negroes," as the little state of Liberia, on the west coast of Africa, is called, for it is wholly an American enterprise. It was selected and purchased as a colony entirely through the humanitarian efforts of American citizens, and was colonized entirely by emancipated slaves from the United States. It has been in existence as a republic for over twenty years, and during that time has been almost wholly at peace with all nations, and has never indulged in any of those expensive luxuries known as civil wars and dissensions which characterize some of the West India black republics, and not a few of those of South America. The State has been well and wisely governed, and at this time is enjoying unprecedented prosperity.

THE LATE BISHOP HOPKINS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

JAMES S. PAYNE, THIRD PRESIDENT OF LIBERIA.

We give on page 61 a portrait of JAMES S. PAYNE, the new President of the republic. He is a native of this country, has been many years in Liberia, and was inaugurated President on January 6, 1868.

THE TRADE OF TRADES.

MR. EDITOR,—Permit me through the columns of your paper to express my private and conscientious opinion on the tailor's profession, for I stifle with the desire to give utterance to the sentiments of my heart, and to do justice to this glorious but too little appreciated calling.

I declare therefore, in a loud and intelligible voice—through the organ of my pen—that the profession of a tailor is the most moral, the noblest, the most poetic, and the most philanthropic of all professions.

Yes, Sir; of all professions, not excepting that of the publisher or the corn-doctor, the peer or the pieman; and Heaven is my witness that I appreciate these classes of society at their just value—especially the publisher when he pays in ready money; for the publisher who settles with his authors for their MSS. in six months' paper is infinitely lower than the pieman himself.

If you will deign to honor me with a moment's attention I will prove to you as clear as a mould of jelly that of the four laudatory epithets which I have just applied to the profession in question, not one should be lessened in the slightest degree.

In the first place, it is moral. This, I think, will not admit of the shadow of a doubt to you any more than to me; for what could be more immoral than the clothing worn by man before the invention of breeches? Morality and virtue date back truly to the time when a man of genius—still better, a good man—invented breeches! Thou good man of genius, I bless thee!

It is poetic; for what is poetry but that charming muse which knows how to embellish by its smiling falsehoods the sad reality of things here below—and confess with me, is there any thing in the world that has more need of embellishment than the greater part of the sons of our noble country? To comfort himself for his wretched mien, man delights in repeating that he was made in the image of God, and humpbacks take especial pleasure in the saying; but the copy must have deviated frightfully from the original. Well, thanks to the tailor, almost all mortals become Antinouses seen two or three hundred yards off; and he who, in the early ages of the world, would have been unanimously acknowledged a miserable abortion of Nature, is now one of the ornaments of Broadway—thanks to the shapely figure bestowed on him by his coat.

It is noble (we still speak of the profession of the before-said tailor); for the least that you can do is to grant this title to the trade whose continual aim it is to ennoble those for whose advantage it is carried on. You will grant, I hope, that every time you put on a new coat you feel a voice within you saying that you are worth ten times more than you were a minute before.

Take a man just quitting his bed, and still in his ignoble cotton night-cap, and you will find a man without the least real worth—and we use this word worth in all its acceptations—for at this moment he scarcely suspects that there is any blood in his veins, and you could have him at your own valuation. But let him put on his clothing; as he enters his pantaloons he feels his pride reviving; on reaching the vest he begins to raise his head, and when he once has on his coat I advise you not to tread on his toes, especially if the coat is a new one. Napoleon understood this so well that he used the greatest care in the choice of his soldiers' dress. He knew perfectly well that he could make a hero of a poltroon only by replacing his shabby blue blouse by a hussar's jacket of scarlet and gold. Give a shining pair of epaulets to a sorry private, and directly you have a dashing grenadier or a swaggering light horseman.

The sumptuary laws in France, which formerly forbade the lower classes to wear certain ornaments reserved for the nobility alone, were admirably designed to promote the interests of the nobles; for these unhappy wretches were degraded most of all by their dress, and nobility disappeared from the country on the day that every one was at liberty to wear a dress coat; or rather on that day every one became noble. For this it was only necessary to have twenty-five dollars—what do I say? to have credit with his tailor for twenty-five dollars.

Lastly, it is philanthropic. This does not need elaborate demonstration. I am wrong in merely calling this noble profession philanthropic. I should say that it is the only one that is philanthropic.

What does the tailor do during the whole course of the year? how does this model philanthropist employ his time? Do you think that he spends it in making speeches and eating turtle-soup in New York in favor of missionaries in the Cannibal Islands? Do you think that he passes it in inventing some new dish, by the aid of which those who are tired of life can succeed in bidding it adieu in a week? No, gentlemen. Nevertheless, should he give himself up to this hackneyed philanthropy, honors, orders, and decorations would be showered upon him, and he could live in the eyes of the world with his virtue wrapped like a cloak around him. But, compared with the tailor, all these trumpery philanthropists are as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.

What does he do? Ah, before replying, permit me to wipe away a tear of emotion which threatens to overflow my left eye, and which might make me squint in answering—a thing disagreeable both to you and me. What does he do? You doubtless know St. Martin, or at least you have heard your friends speak of him; consequently, you are not ignorant that he was canonized in his time, and placed in the Calendar of the Saints for having given half of his cloak to a poor devil whom he met on his way. I do not pretend to depreciate the merit of this deed; but does not the tailor, therefore, deserve to be doubly canonized, for he not only gives half a cloak entirely gratis to a host of poor devils, but a whole over-coat, often accompanied by a coat, vest, and breeches. And it is not once that this happens to him, but ten, twenty, a hundred times! Yet, as his sole recompense for these incalculable benefactions, the name of the modern St. Martin is simply put in the Directory.

O tailor! happily for thee, thou art consoled for the ingratitude of the crowd, for thou hast my esteem! Every time I pass a tailor's shop I feel like throwing myself at his feet and asking his blessing—but I restrain my feelings. I can not even see a simple journeyman in this noble branch of human industry, seated at his board, without wishing to bow respectfully to the ground before him; but again I restrain my feelings, for my politeness would be thrown away—these artists always sit bent over, so that you can not see their face.

SARTOR RESARTUS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A NEW VOLUME.—Look out for the January Pictorial double number of the ILLUSTRATED PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, with portraits of Kings, Queens, and Emperors; also of Patrick Henry, Edward Everett, F. W. Robertson, and others: including "Signs of Character;" Races of Men; Science of the Soul; Social Relations, Love, Courtship, and Marriage; Education and Self-Improvement; Choice of Pursuits, with other matters all ought to know, to be found in no other publication. Only $3 a year, or 30 cents a number. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

HOFF'S MALT EXTRACT. "THIS NEW HYGIENIC BEVERAGE HAS GROWN WONDERFULLY IN FAVOR SINCE ITS INTRODUCTION HERE BUT A SHORT TIME AGO. IT RECEIVES THE UNQUALIFED APPROBATION OF THE DOCTORS, AND ITS PROPRIETOR HAS VOLUMES OF CREDENTIALS ALREADY FROM THE LEADING FAMILIES AND PHYSICIANS OF THE COUNTRY AS TO ITS HEALTH-GIVING AND HEALTH-SUSTAINING QUALITIES." HOFF'S MALT EXTRACT BEVERAGE OF HEALTH IS ALSO A VERY GOOD REMEDY FOR DYSPEPTICS, CONSUMPTIVES, AND PEOPLE AFFECTED WITH COLDS, HOARSENESS, AND COUGHS. SOLD AT THE DEPOT, NO. 542 BROADWAY, N. Y., AND EVERY WHERE. DEPOT, NO. 542 BROADWAY.

"Systematic and persistent Advertising the sure road to success in business."

T. C. EVANS'S

LIST OF SELECTED NEWSPAPERS,

RELIGIOUS, AGRICULTURAL, AND LITERARY,
Comprises the Best Advertising Mediums in the Country, their
COMBINED CIRCULATION EXCEEDING 600,000,

Penetrating to nearly or quite every post-office, and the firesides of the large majority of the Intelligent Reading Public of the Northern States. Advertisements inserted in this list occupy the BEST ATTAINABLE POSITION, while it is offered at a price which will repay investigation. It includes

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER,
&c., &c., &c.

☞ A Complete List, with prices for all or in part, will be furnished on application to

T. C. EVANS,
129 Washington Street, Boston.

BARD & BROTHERS,
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES, SILVER, RUBBER, and GOLD-PLATED TELESCOPIC PEN-CASES, TOOTH-PICKS, &c., &c.
JAMES D. BARD, Agent,
No. 22 Maiden Lane, New York.

THE QUINTETTE ORCHESTRA.

A Collection of Quadrilles, Contra Dances, Waltzes, Polkas, Polka Redowas, Schottisches, Mazourkas, and Serenade Pieces, arranged for TWO VIOLINS, CLARINET, CORNET, and BASS. In Five Books—one for each instrument. Price of the Set, $6. Sent post-paid on receipt of price. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston. CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

No. 25 Maiden Lane,
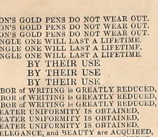
New York, Dec. 14, 1867.



In my Card of November 1, 1865, I stated that "for the purpose of more fully supplying the wants of the public, and in order to prevent unscrupulous dealers from palming off inferior and worthless goods as the Morton Gold Pens, I shall hereafter sell no goods at wholesale except only to duly appointed and authorized Agents," &c. To this plan I have since strictly adhered.

In accepting agents great care has been exercised to appoint those who, by long-continued fair dealing, have acquired a reputation for honesty, responsibility, and probity—men in whose word the public have learned to place confidence. These agents have agreed to keep a full assortment of my pens, and to sell them at my published prices. Thus the public are supplied by them with just such pens as they want, either as to writing or price, and get a full equivalent for the money paid.

No agent is appointed to travel from place to place, or canvass the country, so that all who want a Morton Gold Pen must get it from the Local Agent or from headquarters.

None need apply for the Agency except in conformity to the above, the liberal discount "To Clubs" being sufficient inducement to all others. A. MORTON.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS DO NOT WEAR OUT.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
A SINGLE ONE WILL LAST A LIFETIME.
BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE
BY THEIR USE
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
THE LABOR of WRITING is GREATLY REDUCED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
GREATER UNIFORMITY IS OBTAINED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
EASE, ELEGANCE, and BEAUTY are ACQUIRED,
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
ECONOMY, PLEASURE, and PROFIT CONSULTED.
The best and cheapest Gold Pens in the world.
Prices, fifty cents and upward.
Call at No. 25 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.
THE BEST HOLIDAY PRESENT,
because the most enduring, and a constant remembrancer of the giver.
USEFUL, DURABLE, AND BEAUTIFUL
HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
The best and cheapest Gold Pens in the world.
Prices, fifty cents and upward.
Call at No. 25 Maiden Lane, or enclose stamp for Circular.

TRADE MARK

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of T. Y. KELLEY & Co., 30 Vesey St., New York, are now supplying families throughout the country with TEAS, warranted in all cases perfectly pure as imported, at cargo prices, thus saving to them five or six profits of middle-men, which average from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound. Clubs can be formed in any city or town, by any person, male or female, and to such as will take the trouble we will furnish them Teas and Coffees for their own use free of charge, to the amount of five per cent. on each order they send us. On application, we send, by mail, circulars containing price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms to Agents in detail.

We forward all goods, collect on delivery, by the Express Company, and members of the Club can divide the Express charges equally among themselves.

PRICE LIST.
Oolong (black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Mixed (green and black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00 best.
Young Hyson (green), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 25.
Imperial (green), 90, $1 00, $1 25.
English Breakfast (black), 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20.
Japan, 90, $1 00, $1 25.
Gunpowder, $1 25, $1 50.

We import a very superior quality of Kiangsi Oolong and Moyune Young Hyson Teas, put up in original Chinese packages, which we sell at $1 30 the Oolong and $1 60 the Young Hyson, per package.

Ground Coffees, 20c., 25c., 30c. per pound. Best Old Government Java, ground, 40c.

All goods put up by us bear our trade mark, and no others are genuine. Address all orders to
GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of
T. Y. KELLEY & CO., 30 Vesey Street,
P. O. Box 574. New York.

DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR FOR 1868 contains lists of VEGETABLE and FLOWER SEEDS, new varieties, Plants, Fruits, &c., with directions how to cultivate. 108 pages, beautifully illustrated. Mailed upon the receipt of a postage-stamp.
Address HENRY A. DREER,
714 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A GREAT OFFER FOR the HOLIDAYS. HORACE WATERS & Co., No. 481 Broadway, will dispose of 50 Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of six superior makers, at low prices for cash, or will take one fifth cash, and the balance in monthly installments for rent, and rent money applied if purchased. The above offer will be continued during this month.

LAMB KNITTING MACHINES.
NEW YORK OFFICE AT
BARTLETT'S MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT,
No. 569 BROADWAY. SEND FOR CIRCULARS.

WORKING MODELS OF STEAM ENGINES, various styles and sizes. Illustrated Catalogues sent on receipt of a postage stamp by
O. A. ROORBACH, 122 Nassau St., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $8, $12, $16, $23, $30. Price of Office, $15, $20, $30, $42, $48, $70. Send for circular to LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 23 Water St., Boston.

EMPLOYMENT! $10 A DAY and EXPENSES PAID. Circulars free. O. T. GAREY, Biddeford, Me.

$225 A MONTH! 15 new articles for Agents. Address H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

Fowle's Pile and Humor Cure.
One Bottle warranted a perfect cure in all kinds of PILES. Two to three bottles in the worst cases of LEPROSY, SCROFULA, SALT RHEUM, and ALL DISEASES OF THE SKIN. FOR INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL USE. In cases of failure all dealers will please return the money, and receive full bottles of my agents. No cases of failure in PILES or HUMORS for ten years.
Prepared by HENRY D. FOWLE, Chemist, No. 71 Prince St., Boston. Sold every where. $1 a Bottle.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make all kinds of Patent Medicines, Perfumery, Toilet Articles, Cosmetics, Candies, Wines, Cordials, Soaps, Dyes, and hundreds of other articles in daily demand. Easily made, and sold at large profits. Sent postpaid for 25 cents, by O. A. ROORBACH, No. 122 Nassau St., N. Y.

HOLIDAY JOURNAL—FREE.
16 LARGE PAGES of Parlor Plays, Magic Sports, Games, Experiments, Problems, Puzzles, SENT FREE. Address ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
LIST OF
NEW BOOKS.

I.
MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

II.
SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

III.
DUFF'S BOOK-KEEPING, by Single and Double Entry. Practically Illustrating Merchants', Manufacturers', Private Bankers', Railroad, and National Bank Accounts, including all the late Improvements in the Science. With a Copious Index. By P. DUFF, formerly Merchant, Founder and Proprietor of Duff's Mercantile College, Pittsburgh, Pa. 20th Edition, Enlarged and Revised. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

IV.
MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By LUCY RANDALL COMFORT. With Engravings. Square 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

V.
BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 21 to February 21, 1867. On the "Ely Foundation" of the Union Theological Seminary. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

VI.
THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas, Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $3 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

VII.
MACÉ'S FAIRY BOOK. Home Fairy Tales (Contes du Petit-Château). By JEAN MACÉ, Author of "The Servants of the Stomach," &c. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH, Translator of "Martin's History of France," "Laboulaye's Fairy Book," &c. With Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

VIII.
THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By GOLDWIN SMITH, Author of "Lectures on the Study of History," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

IX.
AGNES STRICKLAND'S QUEENS OF ENGLAND. Lives of the Queens of England. From the Norman Conquest. By AGNES STRICKLAND, Author of "Lives of the Queens of Scotland." Abridged by the Author. Revised and Edited by CAROLINE G. PARKER. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. (Uniform with the Student's Histories.)

THE NEW NOVELS
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

GUILD COURT. A London Story. By GEORGE MAC DONALD. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE BROTHERS' BET; or, Within Six Weeks. By EMILIE FLYGARE CARLEN. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By SARAH TYTLER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the Author of "Paul Massie." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CARLYON'S YEAR. By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

STONE EDGE. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

CIRCE; or, Three Acts in the Life of an Artist. By BABINGTON WHITE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE TENANTS OF MALORY. By J. S. LE FANU. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BIRDS OF PREY. By M. E. BRADDON. Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

525 MILES
OF THE
UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD,
RUNNING WEST FROM OMAHA
Across the Continent,
ARE NOW COMPLETED.

This brings the line to the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains, and it is expected that the track will be laid thirty miles further, to Evans Pass, the highest point on the road, by January. The maximum grade from the foot of the mountains to the summit is but eighty feet to the mile, while that of many Eastern roads is over one hundred. Work in the rock-cuttings on the western slope will continue through the winter, and there is now no reason to doubt that the entire grand line to the Pacific will be open for business in 1870.

The means provided for the construction of this Great National Highway were wisely and liberally arranged by the Government. Its bonds are issued to the amount of $16,000 to $48,000 per mile, for which it takes a second lien on everything, and receives in part to a large, if not to the full extent of its claim, in services. These Bonds are issued as each twenty-mile section is finished, and of this it has been examined by United States Commissioners and pronounced to be in all respects a first-class road, thoroughly supplied with depots, repair-shops, stations, and all the necessary rolling stock, and other equipments.

The United States also makes a donation of 12,800 acres of land to the mile, which will be a source of large revenue to the Company. Much of this land in the Platte Valley is among the most fertile in the world, and other large portions are covered with heavy pine forests, and abound in coal of the best quality.

The Company is now authorized to issue its own First Mortgage Bonds to an amount equal to the issue of the Government and no more. Hon. E. D. Morgan and Hon. Oakes Ames are Trustees for the Bondholders, and deliver the Bonds to the Company only as the work progresses, so that they always represent an actual and productive value.

The entire line of the Union Pacific Railroad is now under the control of a single company, free from all of Government officers, and to a large extent with Government money, and that its Bonds are issued under Government direction. It is believed that no similar security is so carefully guarded, and certainly no other is based upon a larger or more valuable property. As the Company's

SHORT MORTGAGE BONDS

are offered for the present at 90 CENTS ON THE DOLLAR, they are the cheapest security in the market, being more than 18 per cent. lower than U. S. Stocks. They pay

SIX PER CENT. IN GOLD

or over NINE PER CENT. upon the investment, and have thirty years to run before maturity. Subscriptions will be received in New York at the Company's Office, No. 20 Nassau Street, and by

CONTINENTAL NATIONAL BANK, 7 Nassau St.,
CLARK, DODGE & CO., Bankers, 51 Wall St.,
JOHN J. CISCO & SON, Bankers, 33 Wall St.,

and by the Company's advertised Agents throughout the United States. Remittances should be made in Drafts or other funds par in New York, and the Bonds will be sent free of charge by return express. Parties subscribing through local Agents will look to them for their safe delivery.

A NEW PAMPHLET AND MAP, showing the Progress of the Work, the Resources for Construction, and Value of Bonds, may be obtained at the Company's Offices or of its advertised Agents, or will be sent free on application.

JOHN J. CISCO, Treasurer,
New York.
November 23, 1867.

ARCHITECTURAL
IRON WORKS,
FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.
D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

"Economy is Wealth."—Franklin.

WHY will people pay $50 or $100 for a Sewing Machine when $20 will buy a better one for all PRACTICAL purposes? Notwithstanding regrets to the contrary, we shall continue to keep to intrinsic merits, and DOES NOT infringe upon any other in the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of purchasers will testify. ☞ AGENTS WANTED.—Machines sent to Agents on trial, and GIVEN AWAY to families who are unable and deserving. Address
J. C. OTTIS & CO., Boston, Mass.

Bullard, a curiosity, sent postpaid for 25c. Circulars of 40 wonderful and curious articles sent free on receipt of stamp. Address Walling & Co., St. Louis, Mo.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.
THE ORoide WATCH FACTORY.

ORoide CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. Their appearance, workmanship, and time they have now been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one is warranted by special certificate to keep correct time. Price $18. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well as cases, of gold, from $1 to $6. Sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 42 and 44 Nassau St., New York (up stairs).

TESTIMONIALS.

U. S. STEAMER "COMMODORE PERRY," ERIE, October 5, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., New York:

GENTS,—I am in receipt of the Oroide Watch, just received by express. It gives entire satisfaction. As I ordered this for another party, I now wish you to send me another of the same quality, for my own use. You will get some five or six more orders from this vessel, and two or three from the employes of the express company, as I purchased the first one from the express agent. Please send the best and best watch in the country for the price, and cheap at double the cost. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. W. SMITH, Lieut. U. S. N.

FORT LARNED, September 25, 1867.

Messrs. Collins & Co.:

GENTLEMEN,—I received by express your package containing two Watches—am well pleased with them. I sold them both in an hour. I now wait one for Superintendent Bick, one for Assistant-Superintendent Cook, one for Carpenter Ash, one for Captain Johnson, one for Sergeant Church, one for Stonemason Smith, and one for myself—seven in all. Send as before by U. S. Express, C. O. D. Send immediately, and oblige Yours respectfully, D. A. HARRISON.

JACKSON FURNACE, MICH., October 1, 1867.

C. E. Collins & Co.:

The Watch that I ordered came safe to hand, and all of them are giving good satisfaction; and I must say that they far surpass my expectations, both for appearance and time. I want you to forward me four more, to be them all in good running order. I am making quite a number of Watches; I only send for my friends. One of the others was for myself, and I shall also keep another. I hope you will receive orders from me. I would like to see one of your Chains. Respectfully, C. E. GAYES, Escanaba, Delta Co., Mich.

No. 198 THOMPSON ST., ALLEGHANY CITY, PA., July 20, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., Nos. 42 and 44 Nassau St., New York:

GENTLEMEN,—You will please send, by "The Adams Express Company," one Ladies' Imitation Watch, just the same as the Ladies' Watch you sent me before with Gentlemen's dial, ordered through the Adams Express Company, as before. Those Watches are a wonder at the price. Please send me a good timekeeper, and let me have as soon as you ship, and very much oblige yours, &c., &c., &c.

POST HOSPITAL, BARANCAS, FLA., October 16, 1867.

C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTS.—I have this day received the Watch which you mailed on the 10th. I was much pleased with the appearance of the case. You will receive more orders from me or through me. It looks as well as the one paid $170 for. YOURS, &c.,

GRENADA, MISS., October 7, 1867.

Messrs. Collins & Co.:

The watch came safely to hand to-day. I am astonished at the complete workmanship of the watch. I shall take pride in circulating the new discovery. Also I wish you to forward me your inducements, if any, for the sale of said watches. Also send me two others of the same stamp. Yours truly, &c.,

J. D. SUTLIFF, Q. M. Sergt, Co. B, 54th U. S. Inf.

OFFICE OF THE QUINCY R. R. BRIDGE CO., QUINCY, ILL., October 9, 1867.

To Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

DEAR SIRS,—Your composition watch arrived safe to hand this day, per United States Express. It pleases me very well. I have shown it to my friends and neighbors, who are also pleased with it, and will in a few days send you on further orders. It greatly exceeds my expectations in every respect. Yours truly,

GEO. SMITH.

135 BANK STREET, CLEVELAND, OHIO, November 4, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SIRS,—I received the Watches on the 30th of October. Please send me two more, the same kind you sent me to Akron. I sold one of them for $40 cash in one hour after I got it out of the express office: it was the first that had been offered for sale in Akron. Send them to me as soon as possible. I have the money right in all. I shall be in Cleveland this winter, and I think I can sell a number of them. GEO. SMITH.

P. S.—Please send me two Oroide Watches, lady's size, and oblige yours, G. S.

COMIC SPEECHES, 200 pp., 40c.; Schoolboy Dialogues, 200 pp., 40c.; Book of Love Letters, 40c.; The Marriage Guide, 40c.; Magic made Easy, 25c.; The original Book of Wonders, 30c.; Splendid Valentines, at 1c., 2c., 3c., 5c. cents, and $1 each; Comics, 20 cents a dozen. All mailed free. Catalogue for stamp. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

$25 for 1770 Cent. Coins wanted; collections bought; Book showing prices paid for Coins, 25 cents; Monthly Coin and Stamp Magazine, 10 cents; $1 yearly; History of American Coins, $1.50. Mason Brothers, No. 434 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

GOLD MEDAL PERFUMERY.

NAPOLEON III. awarded the Prize Medal, at the Paris Exposition, 1867, to R. & G. A. WRIGHT, for the best Toilet Soaps, Extracts, and Perfumeries. For sale by all the principal Druggists.
R. & G. A. WRIGHT, 624 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

AGENTS WANTED,
To sell a new, elegant, perfumed STATIONERY CASE; also, ENGRAVINGS, WATCHES, and JEWELRY. Call or send to make money
HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman St., New York.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
HAVE JUST RECEIVED
TWO FULL CARGOES
OF THE
FINEST NEW CROP TEAS
22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,
12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Merchants of China, which are unrivaled for Brisk ness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., best $1 per lb.
HYSON (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., best $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 25, best $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast or Dinner Coffee, at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they lived in the immediate vicinity of our Depot.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club send us his name, or else write and send us the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete put it in a by itself, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution among the members. Specify what tea or coffee you want, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The Tea and Coffee ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS are the similar of Oil and Water-Color Paintings by the best masters. They are artistic copies, and, in most cases, only equal to the originals. An eminent critic says of our Chromos of Tait's Groups:

"Mr. Louis Prang, of Boston, one of whose efforts to disseminate through the country faithful copies of our well-known, butterflies, moths, and birds, in rich pretty forms, and so cheaply, as to drive out of the market all inferior publications, has just issued a chromo-lithograph in one of one of Mr. A. F. Tait's charming little pictures. The chromo-lithograph is a perfect fac-simile of the original painting, reproducing not only the general effect of the touches, but the grain of the canvas, in a way that surprises by its ingenuity. Mr. Prang tries with all his might to make his work so accurate as absolutely deceptive, not for the purpose of deceiving, but in order to get the faithful copies, so good as to be original," within the reach of small purses. He brings to the work keen intelligence, business energy, and enthusiasm, and, what is more, a generous spirit toward art and artists, which we very pleasantly meet with. He has our cordial thanks for what he has already done, and we trust that he will be liberally encouraged in the class he works for in the love of what is true as well as beautiful."

CHROMO OF CHRISTMAS 10x13 inches), $5 00
CHROMO OF NEW YEAR'S 10x13 inches), 5 00
CHROMO OF QUAILS 10x13 inches), 5 00

Ask for them at the Art Store. They will be sent free of expense to any address on receipt of the retail price. Every "Journal of Civilization" describes how these pictures are made, and where they can be obtained. Illustrated Catalogues, Americans mailed free. Address L. PRANG & CO., Fine Art Publishers, Boston, Mass.

A NEW ORDER OF THINGS.

UNDER the present vicious system of trade, consumers of goods have to pay enormous profits to the middle men, and prices to the producer of articles through which they pass. We have established agencies in all the principal towns and cities in the country (towns on railroads preferred), where we can sell goods at such prices as will receive their goods, almost direct from the manufacturer, at a very small advance. Send for our Circular. A splendid chance is offered to agents to make money. Address, for circulars, THE ADAMS & CHAMPION & CO., 30 Hanover Street Boston, Mass.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, any person can do his own printing, advertising much time and expense. Circulars containing full information, with prices, Presses, Inks, and recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of Type, Cuts, Borders, &c., 25 cents. Address, DAVID WATSON, Agt. Adams Press Co.,
No. 79 Cortlandt Street, New York.

CHASE'S IMPROVED DOLLAR MICROSCOPE. Adapted to all trades and professions. Agents wanted. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1, with directions. Address G. N. CHASE, 81 Washington St., Boston, or FOWLER & WELLS, New York City.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.
JANUARY, 1868.

In the present Number is commenced "The Woman's Kingdom," by Mrs. Anne Moncure Crane, Author of "Aunt Hagar's Children," &c.

In the next Number will be commenced the first of "The Adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Sandboys," by Miss Eliza Cook, Author of "Home Affections," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and amusing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.
AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 will be commenced the first of "The Adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Sandboys," by Miss Eliza Cook, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Crease," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $2 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY, for 1866, containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 12 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, and 10 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes, unless an order to continue is received before the time necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering Back Numbers of the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the Direction is to be changed, the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by Mail, Money Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the subscriber.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300; Half Page, $155; Quarter Page, $80—each insertion; or, for a less period, per Line, each insertion, 25 cents.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

ENGLAND'S PANIC.

Fearful Rebellion of Three Drunken Tailors and a Cobbler!—Consternation of the "Mistress of the Seas!"

Our Entire Stock

IS NOW OFFERED AT

REDUCED PRICES,

in view of our REMOVAL up town in the Spring.

WHITE CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 148 pieces, $25.

PLATED WARE FROM ROGERS, SMITH & CO.

GOLD-EDGE TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $11.

DECORATED TEA SETS, $15.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 479 Broadway.

4 doors below Broome Street.

Chickering & Sons' American Pianos.

MAKING SIXTY-THREE FIRST PREMIUMS DURING THE PAST FORTY-FOUR YEARS.

WAREROOMS:

652 Broadway, New York;

246 Washington St., Boston.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. Skin.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.

WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

POLLAK & SONS, Manufacturers of Meerschaum goods, 27 John St., near Nassau, and 625 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5846.

PRICES: BOX OF 60 DRAGÉES, EQUAL TO ONE AND A HALF PINTS OF THE OIL, 75 CENTS; BOX OF 120 DRAGÉES, $1 52; BOX OF 240 DRAGÉES, $2 00.

M. WARD, CLOSE & CO., WHOLESALE AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES, NEW YORK.

PATENT OFFICES.

Inventors who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for over Twenty Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A Pamphlet containing full instructions to inventors is sent gratis.

☞ A handsome Bound Volume, containing 150 Mechanical Engravings, and the United States Census by Counties, with Hints and Receipts for Mechanics, mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address

MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

KENNEDY'S

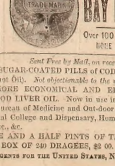
Salt Rheum Ointment.

The only ointment for the cure of all eruptions and cutaneous affections. It is wholly

A VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

IT WILL CURE

Salt Rheum, Erysipelas, Scald Head, Piles, Felons, Ulcers, Sore Eyes, Chilblains, Shingles, Boils, Cuts, Wounds, Blisters, Ringworms, Pimples, Burns, Chapped Hands, Scalds, &c., &c.



A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.

Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 2 cts.; six do., $5.00, postage 12 cts.; twelve do., $10.00, postage 24 cts. Sold by all druggists.

TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

I. C. HULL'S SON, New York.

BAY RUM SOAP

Over 100 Styles Toilet Soaps. NONE BETTER IMPORTED.

Sent Free by Mail, on receipt of Price.

SUGAR-COATED PILLS of COD LIVER EXTRACT and IRON. Not objectionable to the most Delicate Stomach. MORE ECONOMICAL AND EFFICACIOUS THAN COD LIVER OIL. Now in use in St. Luke's, Bellevue, Dietzen of Medicine and Out-door Relief, Eclectic Medical College and Dispensary, Homeopathic Dispensary, &c., &c.

Important to Farmers.

A HORSE DOCTOR FREE.

The attention of farmers, and of all owners of horses and Cattle, is called to the fact that the old established, 60 weekly newspaper, "WILKES' SPIRIT OF THE TIMES," employs upon its columns a celebrated Veterinary Professor, whose duty it is to answer all questions relating to sick or injured horses and cattle that may be sent to the paper by mail. The replies of the Professor to these questions appear in the next number of the paper, and are always accompanied by a prescription, thus enabling every body to scrutinize his mode of treatment, and to avail themselves of the remedy. These answers and prescriptions are given free to whoever may ask for them, whether subscribers to the paper or not, so that the whole cost of the prescription is the postage of the letter stating the complaint and the price of the next copy of The Spirit. Many remarkable cures of valuable animals have been made through the medium of this department. Owners of horses or cattle are therefore advised to go to any news-stand and buy a copy of the paper, that they may examine this important feature for themselves. The subscription price of "The Spirit," which is a high-class sporting journal of forty years' standing, is $5 a year. Address

EDITOR WILKES' SPIRIT,

301 William Street, New York.

The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines

MADE PERFECT BY THE USE OF THE

Bruen Manufacturing Co.'s New Cloth Plate.

By substituting this Plate for the old one, three distinct and different stitches can be made, viz., the Lock, Double-Loop Elastic (or so-called Grover & Baker), and the newly-patented Three-Thread Embroidery Stitch.

Price of Plate, $10 00.

The Bruen Manufacturing Co.,

478 Broadway, New York.

WANTED, AGENTS, $75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner.

Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURG, PA., or BOSTON, MASS.

Caution.—Do not be deceived upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

$20. Gold Coin. $20.

The new business cards, to imitate $20 gold pieces. Ornamental and useful, and the best advertising medium, at wholesale. We pay return postage. Manufactured by W. T. & J. MERSEREAU, 62 Dunne Street.

GOLD PENS.

Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Reputation of 25 cents each by mail. Manufactory 15 Maiden Lane. E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

FOUNTAIN PEN, 1¼ CENTS.

AGENTS WANTED. Success guaranteed. Profits large. $10 a day. No humbug. Sample, boy, 12 Pens, for 25 cents. By express, $1. 50, for 1 gross, $2. 50 per gross. Money returned if not satisfied. Address Morse Fountain Pen Co., 41 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.

New Designs, $1 50 postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD,

ARCHITECT, 191 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

Popular Goods at Popular Prices

FOR BOYS AND MISSES.

BALMORAL AND ROB ROY STOCKINGS.

CLOTH AND FANCY KNIT GAITERS.

MERINO UNDER VESTS AND DRAWERS.

CLOTH, KID, AND BEAVER GLOVES.

FANCY GLOVES AND INFANTEES.

COMFORTERS, SCARFS, HOODS.

GARIBALDI AND CARDIGAN JACKETS.

A LARGE VARIETY OF ELEGANT GOODS AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS.

And others should send to all parts of the United tates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 68 Broadway.

HARPER'S WEEKLY FOR 1867,

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

HAVE NOW READY:

VOL. XI. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Price, Bound in Cloth, $7 00; in Half Morocco, $10 50.

The Annual Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY, in neat cloth binding, will be sent by express, free of expense, for $7 00 each. A Complete Set, comprising Eleven Volumes, sent on receipt of cash at the rate of $5 25 per vol., freight at expense of purchaser.

Our Historical Societies and Public Libraries should secure a complete set of the volumes of the WEEKLY for every year will add to their value as an illustrated record of the times.—North American Review, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S WEEKLY may be unreservedly declared the best illustrated newspaper in America, whether in an artistic or literary point of view.—The Independent, New York.

As a record of events and opinions, and a picture of the time, HARPER'S WEEKLY has a permanent value, while its wealth of current news and essays make it an endless source of entertainment. The editorial articles are of a very high order of merit, and relate to subjects which attract the attention of all intelligent and patriotic minds. It is a necessity in every household.—Transcript, Boston, Mass.

Unlike most illustrated journals, HARPER'S WEEKLY has displayed political and literary ability of a high order, as well as artistic merit. Its political discussions are sound, able, and consistent, and have done their share to educate the American people to a right understanding of their duties and dangers. It has earned for itself a right to the title, "A Journal of Civilization."—Evening Post, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

$25 PER DAY. Agents wanted in every city to sell Patent Portable-lined Gaiter Protectors, for store windows. Excels all others. Never vanishes nor grows dull. Four lights equal to any other eight lights. For further particulars, address

GREAT AMERICAN REFLECTOR COMPANY,

Office, 312 and 314 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

PRINCE & COS. AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.

Forty thousand are now in use

BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

HARPER & BROTHERS will have ready in a few days—12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, Price $1 75:

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL:

OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 75.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS have also just ready a New Edition of

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT.—The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Portraits. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XII.—No. 579.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

A LOCAL ITEM.

By JOHN R. THOMPSON.

On the last night but one of the year '67,
When a snow-cloud hung darkly 'twixt Broadway and heaven,
And the wind blew chill down the frozen street
Where the warm-gloved watchman walked his beat,
And Blanche o'er her bare white beautiful shoulder
Pulled her furs and remarked "'Tis decidedly colder,"
As lightly she stepped from the door of the play
To the soft-cushioned seat of her shining coupé;
On that last night but one of the year '67,
As the clocks in the steeples were striking eleven,
An everyday tragedy, old as the hills,
A tragedy never set down in the bills,
Acted itself with a sad iteration
For its thousand and fiftieth representation:
Nobody there when the curtain rose,
Nobody present to witness the close,
Only the All-Seeing Eye to behold it,
Say, reader mine, would you like to be told it?
Very well, I will tell
How the matter befell.

Place, the Fifth Avenue: time, just recited:
Back-ground, a mansion all brilliantly lighted.
One little scena, how long I'm not sure;
Possibly 'twas but a moments quart d'heure.
Dramatis Personæ, one little Italian,
A satterdemalion,
As ragged—I give the report of a friend
Who arrived opportunely just after the end,
And who widely has wandered from country and home—
As ragged as ever he Saw in Trastevere,
Over the tawny-tinged Tiber at Rome.
Ragged and friendless and dirty and brown,
Good-for-naught, vagabond boy of the town,
Who lived in the streets, and who slept in a shanty,
And spoke, in his way, the rich language of Dante;
Not the lingua Toscana
In bocca Romana,
But a sort of patois of the Tuscan so flowery,
With scraps of the sterner discourse of the Bowery.
Well, these, you will say,
For a tragical play,
Are materials scant as the skirts of the ballet,
Yet I boldly aver, with the sombre finale
They would serve for a very fine painting by Gallait.

Now this little scamp
Was accustomed to tramp
From Jefferson Market to Madison Square,
Through the highways and lanes of our Vanity Fair;
And as Christian in weariness carried his pack,
So he bent 'neath the weight of a harp on his back;
Which he often unslung,
And vindictively strung,
In a manner distressing, as possibly you know,
To wreak on the public the music of Gounod.
All the Christmas—blest season of innocent mirth!
When a Glory Ineffable rests on the earth,
Since Bethlehem witnessed Immanuel's birth—
All the Christmas did little Miserrimus trudge,
A wandering minstrel, through snow and through sludge.
'Twas a holiday cheerless for such as he,
For he plucked the fruit of no Christmas tree,
Nor did Santa Claus during his stillest repose
Stuff bonbons and lollipops into his hose:
And the reason's quite shocking—
He hadn't a stocking!)
Till that night when the stars in the snow-cloud were lost,
And fiercely as fire came the terrible frost,
When, like many who drag through this world of care,
He at last found his burden too heavy to bear,
And sank on the steps of a brown-stone palace,
Where glittered the lustres and sparkled the chalice,
For the gorgeous rooms were ablaze with light
That streamed through the windows out into the night;
And there, to the soft muffled sound of the viol,
Forgetting his hunger and fever and trial,
The boy, who had no other wrapping to keep,
Was very soon wrapped in the mantle of sleep.

It so chanced that two gentlemen, passing that way,
From the Nickleby Reading, the Thirtieth Fourjane—
Smike's wrongs and the queenly despair of Ristori—
On a sudden encountered our young Trovatore:
'Twas just as the watchman, to know what the knave meant,
Had rolled him in tenderness down on the pavement,
Had asked, in a kindly, consolatory tone,
What he wanted, and bade him get up and be gone.
But Miserrimus answered him never a word;
Nor waked from his slumber nor whimpered nor stirred.
The harp-strings were mute as the harp-strings of Tara,
And dumb in the bundle of rags was the wearer.
Alack! what he wanted just now was—a coffin.
For the poor little beggar was dead as the Dauphin,
And the soul of the outcast, escaping its bars,
Away through the snow-cloud that shut out the stars,
Away from the Barrows and sins of the city,
Had taken its flight to the Infinite Pity!

Voilà tout!
Nothing new,
Very true—
But with you,
The moral, oh people! I leave it with you—
The poor ye have always; oh think of the poor
Who perish of hunger and cold at your door;
Remember the words of the Master, who came
A world to redeem—what is done in My Name
(Oh blessed assurance! oh heaven free!)
To the least of these little ones is as to me;
Think of the homeless sons of labor,
And know that each man of them all is your neighbor;
Think of the thousands that famish and die
In the sorrowful South, of the children that cry
For food unto mothers, who writhe with the pain,
That the "cry of the children," O God! is in vain.
Soothe in your mercy this bitter woe,
That the tears of this agony cease to flow;
Lift ye the desolate out of the dust,
And then, with a higher, a holier trust,
May your morning petition, oh brothers! be said,
Give us this day our daily bread!

"A LOCAL ITEM"—"THE HARP-STRINGS WERE MUTE AS THE HARP-STRINGS OF TARA, AND DUMB IN THE BUNDLE OF RAGS WAS THE WEARER."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1868.

THE GREAT GALE.

THE political contest at Washington is one that is always latent in our system, and has occasionally appeared. It is simply the result of the necessity which will sometimes arise of ascertaining which is the really supreme branch of the Government. The Constitution creates three departments, and defines the powers and duties of each. They are usually called co-ordinate, and they are often supposed to be of equal supremacy because of their equal constitutional creation. But the final control of two of the departments is given to the third. The Executive may be removed by impeachment; the Judges of the Supreme Court may also be impeached; their number increased, and the proceedings of the Court regulated by Congress. But for the misconduct of Congress itself no remedy is provided except the direct appeal to the people at an election. The intention of the framers of the Constitution is evident that, in extremity, Congress should be the chief authority.

But it must be chief under the Constitution, or effect a revolution. That is not in itself an evil, for a revolution may be necessary and it may be peacefully accomplished, but it is nevertheless a revolution. The Constitution, as we show elsewhere, authorizes Congress to control the Supreme Court by "swamping" it, or by regulating its method of procedure; while the Executive may be controlled by impeachment. But to supersede the Executive without impeachment, and to forbid the Court to perform its functions before attempting to reach the desired end by the constitutional means of enlargement and regulation, is revolution. If Congress is of opinion that during the delay consequent upon impeachment the most fatal injury may be done to the country, an injury more deadly than a radical change in the government, it may properly work the change, trusting to the popular approval. And so with the temporary suspension of the Court. But the responsibility is enormous; and if its judgment be mistaken, the consequences will be serious.

Now, if five or six weeks ago the conduct of the President was not such as to justify impeachment, what has happened in the mean time to justify his practical deposition? The immediate peril we presume to have been the M'ARDLE case. If that case should be called and argued now, it was supposed that the Court—which in such cases is very apt to decide according to the political predilections of its members—would substantially declare the reconstruction law unconstitutional—which would be the opening of Pandora's box. But suppose the bill of Mr. WILSON'S—of which we elsewhere speak—had passed. That is perfectly constitutional, and clearly justified by the peril. That would defeat such a decision. If any Justice of the Court disregarded the law he would be impeached. It would be an extraordinary spectacle, indeed—Congress passing an act which the Court declares unconstitutional and disobeys, and the Congress then trying the Court. Yet it is a perfectly constitutional dilemma, unless it be supposed that Congress, in the legislation of reconstruction, is subject to the Court. The difficulty is in the nature of the system. The misfortune is, that there should arise a necessity of testing the superiority of power.

But here was a constitutional outlet from the trouble; a remedy extreme, indeed, but the emergency is extreme; a remedy not to be applied until the national welfare plainly demanded it, but to be applied then to save graver complications and more serious trouble. The Supreme Court has no power to enforce its decisions, and depends for its moderating and balancing influence in our system upon the willing submission of all citizens and of the other branches of the government to its decrees. But to claim that therefore there should be submission to its decrees, even when they involve a total frustration of the national purpose after a tremendous war for national existence, and when the Constitution itself affords a remedy, is the very ecstasy of folly. That remedy would be special legislation; but the case is precisely that in which special legislation is necessary.

Of course no man of any party will deny that when Congress forbids the action of the Executive and of the Judiciary by simple enactment it departs from the constitutional method. We can see no reason as yet to change the opinion expressed by us last week, that if the conduct of the President is not such as to justify impeachment, it can not be wise to supersede him. Should the opposite view prevail, we trust that we may discover sufficient reasons for it; but meanwhile it is the duty of a faithful press to help Congress with its counsel, not blindly to follow and defend its action at every moment. The country confides in the honest and patriotic intention of its representatives, nor will it withdraw that confidence because it may not approve every measure which Congress adopts. As for party ascendency, that is to be maintained only by a policy which is the result of the wisdom and experience of the whole party.

THE PRESIDENT, MR. STANTON, AND GENERAL GRANT.

THE action of General GRANT in surrendering his office to Mr. STANTON, after the decision of the Senate, baffled the President's undoubted purpose of forcing an issue before the Supreme Court. The law left to the General no alternative; for it makes the attempt to exercise the duties of the office under the circumstances in which General GRANT found himself a high misdemeanor. The Tenure of Office Bill, as it is called, is undoubtedly the law. It has been properly enacted by Congress. The President has objected, and it has been constitutionally passed over his veto. It may be a distasteful law; it may be inexpedient; but it can not be considered unconstitutional merely because the President says so.

The truth is, that the question involved is a very open one. The veto with which the President returned the law to Congress shows no more than that the point has been settled by precedent and even by construction. The question arose in the House of Representatives in 1789, and was vigorously argued upon both sides. Mr. MADISON, in the Federalist, had maintained that the consent of the Senate was necessary to removal; but in the debate he declared that he had changed his opinion. Notwithstanding his change of view, however, the question was decided in favor of the President's sole power only by a vote of thirty-four to twenty in the House, and in the Senate by the casting vote of the President. In 1839 the Supreme Court declared that it was a subject upon which there had been at the formation of the Government great difference of opinion, but it thought the general rule of construction had become that the President's power is exclusive. Judge STORY, in commenting upon the question, said that it had always been believed that the final decision was greatly influenced by respect for the character of President WASHINGTON then in office; and he adds, that it is "the most extraordinary case in the history of the Government of a power conferred by implication upon the Executive by the assent of a bare majority in Congress which has not been questioned on many other occasions." Mr. WEBSTER admitted the uniformity of the practice, but denied the justice of the view upon which it was founded.

The time has come when Congress, holding the same view with Mr. WEBSTER, questions the propriety of the decision of "the bare majority" of the earlier Congress, and agrees with Mr. MADISON'S first opinion. The right to do so is undeniable, and the action which it takes in accordance with its judgment is certainly good law until it is contradicted by something more imposing than President JOHNSON'S opinion. It is a law in any case which he can not refuse to execute without impeachment; for if his opinion of the constitutionality of laws which are passed over his veto is to prevail against the will of Congress, his will is the law of the land, and Mr. JOHNSON has decided for himself, according to Mr. SEWARD'S notorious phrase, that he will be king and not President.

We must not omit to state, however, that the President had acknowledged the authority of the law, after it was finally passed. He "suspended" Mr. STANTON according to the law, and in obedience to it also he sent into the Senate the reasons of his action. But he hoped, of course, before the matter ended, to effect his original object, which was to be rid of Mr. STANTON, and to ruin General GRANT by making him appear to be a cat's-paw. It is a very homely remark to make, but it is very intelligible, that if the President expects to "use" the General-in-Chief he must be up very early in the morning. The General does not say much, but his acts are very eloquent. They are so eloquent, indeed, that those who have been sorely troubled by his silence have no further doubt of his meaning. He means to obey the laws, and not to aid the President in thwarting them.

That we presume to be also Mr. STANTON'S intention. He does not remain in the War Department for his own pleasure, but certainly he has no right whatever upon any point of etiquette to allow the President the smallest opportunity to frustrate the plan of reconstruction which Congress has adopted. The President and his friends ought to remember that if he had shown a disposition to adhere faithfully to the Constitution, of which he is so fond of speaking, and to execute in good faith and according to their spirit the laws which he did not like as well as those that he approved, the Civil Tenure Bill would not have been passed. When, however, it became evident that in every way, short of an actual refusal to observe the law, he was aiming to baffle its purpose, Congress, which might not see reason for impeachment, could very properly do what might seem uncourteous but was not unconstitutional. The situation is perfectly comprehensible, and will be misunderstood only by those who are resolved not to understand.

SUPREME COURT—THE TWO-THIRDS PROVISION.

THE Judiciary Act passed immediately after the adoption of the Constitution provided that the Supreme Court of the United States should consist of a Chief Justice and five Associate Justices, four of whom should be a quorum. In 1837 (March 3) the number of Associates was extended to eight besides the Chief Justice, and it was declared that five should be a quorum. By the death of Justice WAYNE a vacancy was created, which by Act of Congress is not now to be filled. The Court, therefore, consists of eight including the Chief Justice. The present Congress may provide by law that no act of Congress shall be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court except two-thirds of the members of the Court concur in the decision, and the question arises whether the regulation comes within the power of Congress?

The Constitution provides, Article III., that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Then, after enumerating the subjects to which the judicial power shall extend, it proceeds: "In all cases affecting embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before-mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such legislations as the Congress shall make."

The power of the Supreme Court to determine the validity or invalidity of acts of Congress arises under its appellate jurisdiction, which is to be exercised "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." Under the power to make regulations the Judiciary Act of 1789—doubtless drawn in concurrence with HAMILTON—provides, § 34, that "the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply"—a provision which the Supreme Court in 1825—composed then, among others, of MARSHALL, WASHINGTON, STORY, and THOMPSON—sustained. It was afterward, in the time of Judge TANEY, confirmed, and the statute remains unrepealed. The principle settled by these decisions, which have been slightly modified, is this: that the power of Congress to regulate is not merely one to constitute the Court, but that it may go beyond this and prescribe a rule by which, in certain cases of acknowledged jurisdiction, the Court shall be governed. To that extent it controls the functions of the Court, and regulates the exercise of its jurisdiction. HAMILTON, in the eightieth Number of the Federalist, referring to the subjects of jurisdiction conferred on the Court, says: "If some partial inconveniences should appear to be connected with the incorporation of any of them into the plan, it ought to be recollected that the National legislation will have ample authority to make such exceptions, and to prescribe such regulations as will be calculated to obviate or remove those inconveniences." In the next Number he refers to this jurisdiction of the Court as being subject to "any exceptions and regulations which may be thought advisable," showing much conformity between his views, expressed in the Federalist, in the subsequent legislation of Congress, and in the decisions of that tribunal.

The sections of the Constitution which authorize Congress to ordain and establish the Supreme and inferior Courts created a mere skeleton, not capable of being useful without the aid of Congress. Neither the number of Judges nor the mode of proceeding is specified, and hence a vast amount of legislation, comprised in over a hundred pages of "Gordon's Digest," was necessary to set the Courts in motion. "A power to constitute courts is a power to prescribe the mode of trial."—Federalist, No. 83. Without this enabling legislation the Court, if constituted by Congress, would be incompetent to exercise the jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution. Unquestionably the duty of ordaining and establishing the Court was imperative, but the discretion given to Congress in regulating the appellate jurisdiction of the tribunal is in no respect limited except by the nature of the subject, and by a few restrictive clauses which have no bearing on the question under consideration.

Is there any thing in the nature of the subject to prevent the passage of the act requiring two-thirds to annul an act of Congress? No graver duty can be performed by the Court than to decide on the validity of the National legislation, even when the country is undisturbed by vital questions. But the question that now arises under the war power, and what necessarily flows from it when it is a civil war—the power to decide the terms of peace, for it is this we are now doing in our legislation—is one calculated to divide the people in a most exciting manner, creating feelings which can scarcely fail to be communicated to the Court itself, and it is highly desirable, therefore, to construct the Court on a basis as much above the passions of the time as it is possible to do. If the Court shall decide against the validity of the Legal-Tender Act; that the war was fought on an unconstitutional basis, and that the Southern States are still in the Union, their rights unimpaired—for the same degenerate Northerners that agree on one usually agree on all these points—results that can not be contemplated without extreme solicitude would follow, and it is wholly unsafe to leave these questions to the decision of a bare majority of judges.

In Great Britain the policy of requiring a decision by more than a majority has been adopted in many cases of importance. By the articles of war established by Parliament, § 15, it is provided that in capital cases the decision of at least two-thirds, or nine out of thirteen officers presiding, shall be necessary to give judgment of death. On the impeachment of a Peer of the Realm it is well known that a finding in the affirmative by at least twelve of his compeers was necessary to conviction. By the eleventh section of the act of Parliament relating to courts, passed during the 1st Wm. 4, it is provided "that in all cases relating to the practice of any of the three Superior Courts at Westminster, in matters over which they have a common jurisdiction of or relating to the practice of the Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber, the judges of such courts, jointly or any eight or more of them, including the chiefs of each court, may make general rules and orders for regulating the proceedings of all such courts, which rules and orders are to be observed therein, and no general rules and orders respecting such matters shall be made in any manner except as aforesaid." These instances clearly show that in Great Britain the Parliament does not in all cases leave its tribunals entirely free to act in all matters as a mere majority might decide.

In the disquisition on Government, written by Mr. CALHOUN just previous to his death and published in the first volume of his works, some views are expressed in favor of the concurrent over the numerical majority which bear upon the question. He selects the trial by jury as an illustration:

"In these, twelve individuals selected without discrimination must unanimously concur in opinion, under the obligation of an oath, to find a true verdict according to law and evidence; and this, too, not unfrequently under such great difficulty and doubt that the ablest and most experienced judges differ in opinion after a careful examination. And yet as impracticable as this mode of trial would seem to a superficial observer, it is found in practice not only to succeed but to be the safest, wisest, and best that human ingenuity has ever devised. When closely investigated the cause will be found in the necessity under which the jury is placed to agree unanimously in order to find a verdict. This necessity acts as the predisposing cause of concurrence in some common opinion, and with such efficiency that a jury rarely fails to find a verdict.

"Under its potent influence the jurors take their seats with a disposition to give a fair and impartial hearing to the arguments on both sides, meet together in the jury-room not as disputants but calmly to hear the opinions of each other and to compare and weigh the arguments on which they are founded; and finally to adopt that which, on the whole, is thought to be true. Under the influence of this disposition to harmonize one after another falls into the same opinion until unanimity is obtained. Hence its practicability, and hence also its peculiar excellence. Nothing, indeed, can be more favorable to the success of truth and justice than this predisposing influence caused by the necessity of being unanimous. It is so much so as to compensate for the defect of legal knowledge and a high degree of intelligence on the part of those who usually compose juries. If the necessity of unanimity were dispensed with and the finding of a jury made to depend on a bare majority, jury trial, instead of being one of the greatest improvements in the judicial department of government would be one of the greatest evils that could be inflicted on the community. It would be, in such case, the conduit through which all the factious feelings of the day would enter and contaminate justice at its source." This reason applies with equal force to the necessity of having more than a majority to decide great questions arising under our legislation, and when it is considered that the policy of requiring a concurrence of two-thirds of those present to convict, when the Senate of the United States is sitting as a Court of Impeachment, is a constitutional provision; that in many States of the Union it is also required in like cases, and, indeed, that in very important matters it has become a habit of the country, it will be apparent that the Congress has sufficient in the way of precedent to justify the act requiring two-thirds of the Supreme Court to unite in annulling its legislation, and that it is a necessary and proper exercise of its power.

"To avoid an arbitrary discretion in the Courts," said Mr. HAMILTON, in the 78th Number of the Federalist, "it is indispensable that they should be bound down by strict rules and precedents, which serve to define and point out their duty in every case that comes before them."

It is argued that the principle of this act of Congress might be abused so as to require the whole Court, or particular members of it, to unite in a decision. Such a proceeding would derive no support from the usages of any civilized country, and would justly be regarded as hazarding the national safety. The regulation in question in no manner interferes with the stability of the Court, except to promote it. It leaves the whole judicial power in the tribunal, and only regulates it so as to prevent a capricious judgment. The independence of the Judges is not interfered with. On the contrary, the provision secures respect for the stability, and a steady and safe administration of the laws.

RAILROAD DISASTERS AND THEIR REMEDIES.

WHEN MR. JAMES BOORMAN and his friends managed the Hudson River Railroad, engineers were stationed along the line at about a mile distant from each other, whose duty it was to pass over the road in the intervals between the trains, to see that no cattle had jumped upon it from adjacent pastures; that no stones had alidden upon it from the sides of earth cuttings or hills; that the water from sudden rains had not swept away or covered with debris some portion of the track; and, indeed, that there were no obstructions of any kind to render travel dangerous. It was the ambition of MR. BOORMAN to keep the track in such good order by means of proper safeguards as to justify the high speed which is common upon the English roads. It is, he used to say, presumptuous to run a train at high speed without being certain that there are no impediments in the way.

Mr. Boorman's practice in this respect was due in part to the fact that one of his associates who went to Albany to procure legislation necessary to the construction of the road shared in the danger of an accident on the Massachusetic road of a serious character. A severe storm had arisen and cut a gully across the track, about two miles and a half deep, into which one set of rails had fallen; but the engineer of the train, in entire ignorance of the gap—for there were no signal-men to give warning—moved forward at a speed of over forty miles an hour as if all were safe. The engine, tender, and express car leaped the cut and went on, carrying the forward wheels of the baggage-car with it. But its load was speedily and in succession all the wheels of the passenger cars, were caught in the gap, and a crash followed. MR. BOORMAN argued very justly that running the train upon a track in such a state would be held by the courts to be negligence, entitling all the injured persons to damages, and that it was far cheaper to pay signalmen than to pay such damages.

We believe, however, that there is not a road in the United States which adopts this precaution of inviolable examination of the track by signal-men in advance of the passage of every train. There is more or less attention accordingly to the means of safety, but not enough to render it certain that an unruly animal has not leaped over the slight fences which line the track or drawn it upon the road, or that some obstruction, and passengers are carried at high speed in the faith and hope that all is well. Until public opinion is much more decided than it is now, we shall seldom witness any large expenditure for the safety of travelers, and accidents will therefore be of frequent occurrence, leaving passengers to their remedies at law for whatever damages they may suffer. But on such lines as the Central, however, which at present suffers from a plethora of wealth, and on the Hudson River and Harlem roads, there is no excuse for the want of all the care necessary to absolute safety.

Whatever may be the present law relating to damage occasioned by the want of signal-men, it is the manifest interest of the public that damage to any passenger from such carelessness shall be promptly paid. To rule that a Company is justified in attempting to jump a ten feet gap, and that it is not bound to know of the existence of such a gap when knowledge of it might be obtained with proper care, is to legalize massacre. A correct and safe ruling on this subject is necessary to induce the establishment of sufficient police; and as the lines mentioned are in the same hands, and as the managers know what the common safety demands, we hope that such an example may be set on these leading lines as to induce proper care in all parts of the country. The increased travel which will be occasioned by removing a deep and wide-spread fear among passengers, will cover the expense of signal-men, who, with a little instruction, could easily keep the track for a certain distance in good order. The true rule of economy in managing roads is to keep them as safe as they can be made.

The recent disaster at Angola has caused universal sensation from the fact that nearly every passenger who remained in the car until it went off the track was killed from some unknown cause. In making cars the use of cast-iron supports to each seat is nearly universal. These are screwed to the floor and into the cushion-frame which rests upon them. The sudden stoppage of the train on the Houstatonic road, by the accident already mentioned, occasioned a shock in the first passenger car sufficient to separate the seats and their supports from the floor, and to throw them and the stoves and passengers into the forward part of the car in a confused heap. The accident at Angola produced, no doubt, the same result, for the shock was much more severe than that upon the Housatonic road. The hurling of the seats, loaded with iron supports with jagged ends, from one end of the car to the other, as it went down end foremost, doubtless disabled all of the passengers who were not instantly killed by the weight of the fragments of the car. The accumulated weight of seats, stoves, and dead and wounded passengers, confined the mass together until its destruction by fire was complete.

A death more horrible can scarcely be conceived; but if the present plan of building cars continues these horrors will be repeated. What the passenger wants in case of such an accident is something to seize, so that he can keep his place, which is now impossible. The European cars, with seats for six persons only, are much safer in such a case, though the seats is small. But upon our roads we are exposed to being thrown the whole length of a car, and to being crushed by the weight of the seats, which is found in framing or bolting each seat composed of wood or boiler-iron carefully and securely into the frame-work of the car, which should be the strongest part of it. In the racy language of Mr. JERVIS, "there may be as much wood between a passenger and death as possible."

An accident—not due to the presence or absence of signal-men—which occurred on the Hudson River Railroad shortly before the road was opened for travel, illustrates one of the dangers from cars weakly framed. An iron was stopped by an inexperienced conductor near Croton, to eject a passenger who had paid his fare only to a station nearer the city. While this was going on, a train which had started later from the city, sent for some special object, run—its speed carefully checked—into the train thus standing. The engine, tender, and car and partially hidden from observation, and after splitting open a portion of the car, entered others, the whole train taking fire from the stove, and heat issuing from it—greatly to the dismay of the passengers, one of whom, a lady, was thrown upon the boiler, and, with others, injured. However, the conductor could recover from the surprise of having one train thrust into another—as the hand into a glove—a downward portion of the rear car of cars which had been thrown across the downward road, and a huge pile composed of engines, tenders, baggage express, and passenger cars, and their human freight was the result. The car-seats with which the cars were split open and broken into fragments showed that they had been made more for appearances than for the absolute safety of passengers. Since this fearful catastrophe has since taken place; on the contrary, faults of construction have since been introduced which expose them in a greater degree than they were to split open and go immediately to pieces, which the triple accident developed.

A frame to be strong must unite the bottom, sides, and top completely, forming, as a nerfect net-work of timbers—not too light—held together by bolts or rods. For this purpose the top or roof ought not to be a mere covering; but it should form a necessary part of the general strength, but contribute to it. Those cars which have one portion of the roof elevated above another to admit light and air, are not only comfortable on account of their greater height and the means they afford for the expulsion of the over-breathed air, but are nevertheless weak, as the long arches oblong immediately under the raised ceiling can not be or is not securely framed. The want of frequent and strong cross timbers or supports under cars to be quite open, and to fall to pieces from a variety of accidents. The union of wood and wrought iron in the framing might give sufficient opportunity to an ecclesiastical architect to display and accomplish the object of sufficient ventilation, without the sacrifice of strength. Should a carbadly-ventilated take fire, which is common in severe accidents, the speed with which the flames spread would be much less in proportion as the car in—it is so utterly weak—and add to the danger. The roof and other portions being united in substantial beams, the heat from the stove in a stove, made, including the pipe, of boiler-iron, and for coal, that could be kept in its place, in case of a shock, with bolts extending through the floor and roof timbers—for what would be better, hot-water pipes might be introduced. But until heavy damages are exacted for all those who are injured by the present structures now used will be continued. The combination of comfort and safety in the interior construction of cars is not difficult of accomplishment; but every piece of surplus wood, all flimsy stoves, and every easily broken and displaced seat should be rejected, and nothing used which will not stay in its place, and aid passengers at the critical moment of an accident.

For want of strength in the bottom framing of cars it sometimes happens that a broken axle enters among the passengers, and breaks its way from one end of the car to the other, doing great damage—a difficulty which strong framing would obviate. When the axle or wheels give way the end of the car is brought immediately in contact with the rails, receiving a great shock, the severity of which would be mitigated by hanging the cars lower. This could be brought about very easily, and should receive attention.

The utter helplessness of passengers in such accidents is due to the fact that substance is sacrificed to show in building cars, and that safety thus gives way—the frame because it is too weak, the seats because they are fastened to cast-iron frames which are fastened by screws to the floor—and the chances of escaping safely are consequently small. We throw out these hints in the hope that the strong men who have lately undertaken to manage the great lines in the State may give their attention to the two points presented, to say to police and the construction of cars, and establish our railroad interests on a basis of as entire safety for passengers as care and money can secure.

AMERICAN SURGERY AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

OUR triumphs at the Paris Exhibition have not been quite so widely saluted as those of M'CORMICK'S Reaper and HOWE'S Locks at that of London, but the official Reports unexpectedly show a superiority in every American invention in surgical science. Among these was the orthopædic apparatus of DR. CHARLES F. TAYLOR, of New York. These apparatus are vivisors; but his orthopædic corset for the treatment of curvature of the spine is most highly commended. This apparatus is a simple lever, which raises the superior part of the spinal column by using the transverse processes as a fulcrum, so that while pressure on the articulations of the transverse processes is safely increased, that on the bodies of the diseased vertebræ is considerably diminished. The instrument is hinged, and acts as a supplementary vertebral column. That portion of the body in the arm while the seat or disease is removed.

DR. TAYLOR exhibited apparatus for the cure of lateral curvature of childhood by means of inclined movements, of the value of some of which we have personal knowledge; also an instrument for dislocation in hip-disease. This is not the place for scientific explanations, but it is the place to announce what could not otherwise be known as it should be known that DR. TAYLOR'S apparatus for the treatment of deformities have not only the approval of the highest medical authorities, but are tested constantly and gratefully by American sufferers.

HENRY KEEP.

IN collecting materials for the biography of HENRY KEEP, which recently appeared in these columns, the place of his birth was so indevertently stated that the reference might be drawn that he was born in the Jefferson County poorhouse; whereas the fact is, as we have since been informed, that, though struggling with adversity, MRS. KEEP retained her son under her own roof as long as she lived. In his earlier days HENRY KEEP was the favorite of the careful nursing and tender regard which only a loving mother can bestow, and hence it was only at her death that the boy, then being unprovided for, HENRY was indentured, as before stated, to a neighboring farmer. This much by way of explanation is due not only to the subject of our sketch and to truth, but also to the memory of one who is spoken of by all who knew her as a true and affectionate mother, and, indeed, one of the noblest of women. We are also requested to state that the announcement that MR. KEEP is President of the Northwestern Railroad was also incorrectly made.

LITERARY.

A DELIGHTFUL and valuable history of "The Huguenots; their Settlement, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland," by SAMUEL SMILES, is just republished by the HARPERS, with an Appendix treating of the Huguenots in America, by GAILLARD HUNT. It is peculiarly timely in its appearance with MR. MOTLEY'S new volumes, which describe the cruel persecutions of PHILIP II. which drove the Protestant Netherlanders across the Channel. The book is full of the most interesting information and anecdote; and describes the persecution of the Edict of Nantes and of the sufferings and struggles of the French Huguenots is faithful and vivid. Indeed, the book is one of the few of those instructive volumes which are truly said to be "as fascinating as fiction," and it is properly presented by the publishers in very handsome form.

"The life of NATHANAEL GREENE, Major-General in the Army of the Revolution," has been known for a long time to be in preparation by his grandson, GEORGE WASHINGTON GREENE, who is in possession of all the family papers, and the first of the three volumes is now published by DERBY & JACKSON. Of the author's peculiar accomplishment for the task these who are privately familiar with his wide scholarship are fully aware, and his "Historical View of the American Revolution," a work of remarkable research and interest, has informed the public. He has made an admirable use of his ample resources, and the result is a biography which vividly depicts the domestic and public life of the hero down to the camp at Valley Forge in 1778. The biographer does not seem to be unduly influenced by his kindred to the General; and he delightfully refreshes the story of the early days of the Revolution. We can but make a note of the work here, and heartily commend it to all who would understand why GREENE was the cherished friend of WASHINGTON.

"MRS. Comfort's Fairy Stories," by LUCY RANDALL COMFORT, published by the HARPERS, is a little quarto of little tales for little people, which will, however, be a great delight to them. They are just long enough to be pleasant and charming, and the delicate fancy that plays through them is airy as the sprites themselves. It is a very commendable plan to lay aside a copy of this modest and pretty little book for the next juvenile birthday.

"A Fourteen Weeks' Course in Chemistry," by J. DORMAN STEELE, Principal of Elmira Free Academy, and published by A. S. BARNES & CO., is not, in the ordinary sense, a book of science made easy, which is generally science made worthless; but it is a thoroughly handbook of a few of the principles and practical applications of chemistry to the concerns of common life. The author, when common-sense in dealing with his subject is as evident as his mastery of it, does not attempt to omit or to disguise the nomenclature of the science or study, as he truly says, rids it of its mathematical beauty and discipline. He points only what is essential to the chemist, and he has made a precious book for every body can read with growing wonder and pleasure.

It is an full of necessary and valuable knowledge as a nut of meat, and we are not surprised to hear of its success.

THE NEW RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

THE new Reconstruction Bill, which was reconstructed to the Senate Judiciary Committee on January 13, and of which we gave a synopsis last week, came up again for discussion on January 21, and was debated, with much acrimony, on January 15 (during which FERNANDO WOOD, of New York, was censured for his slanderous language), January 16, 17, 18, and 20, but no vote was arrived at up to the latter date, though it appeared certain that the bill would eventually pass by a large majority.

THE COTTON TAX.

THERE has been no settlement of the differences between the House and Senate in regard to the repeal of the Cotton Tax. But the Committee of Conference met on the 21st instant; the Senate amended it, suspending the collection of the tax for one year, and the House is sooner in the original bill. A committee of conference was appointed on January 20.

EUROPEAN RECOGNITION OF THE MEXICAN REPUBLIC.

IT is a notorious fact but that strangely with the reception of the body of the late MAXIMILIAN of Mexico in Vienna, the Kingdom of Italy, of which MAXIMILIAN'S late successor of MIRAMAR now form a part, having been wrested from Austria in 1866, officially announced the restoration of the Mexican Republic by appointing SENOR ROMERO as Minister of Italy at the Mexican capital.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN'S ARREST.

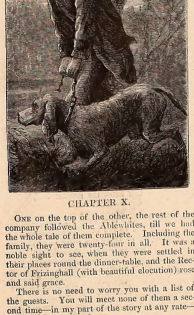
GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN, an American citizen of some prominence, was arrested at Queenstown, charged on the steamer Scotia, on her arrival at Queenstown, charged with being a Fenian. This action of the British Government created considerable excitement in Washington, but, of course, no official action can or will be taken at present.

THE "GALATEA" IN A CYCLONE.

THE "young sailor" Prince of England, His Royal Highness, ALFRED, Duke of Edinburgh, is predestined to have an adventurous career. He has already had the honor of his name in hunting wild elephants in Africa; now we are called upon to record and illustrate his adventure on board his ship, the Galatea, in one of the violent cyclones or "revolving hurricanes" so common in the Indian Ocean. The vessel was on her way from the Cape of Good Hope to Adelaide, Australia, and the cyclone struck her about midnight of October 12. A little before the hour a black squall was observed coming to the westward. This came up with a terrific roar, and the vessel lay heel beneath it. The wind was distinctly heard screaming along on its path toward the ship. The helm was at once put hard down to bring the vessel head to the wind, and the fore-yard was braced up, and the ship was hove to, under close-reefed mainto-sail, reefed foresail, and storm-try-sail—the foresail-mast starsail having been blown away previously. The sea was at the time one white sheet of foaming breakers, and the ship at one time heeled over so much that the men could not keep their footing; many of them being thrown violently down into the lee scuppers. A huge sea struck the ship between the fore and main masts, rising in a dense white mass of spray, which completely hid the foremast. The sky was not all dense and black, but very light at times, when the moon appeared between the clouds in a white misty spot. No serious harm was done to ship or crew; and the royal frigate arrived safely at her destination on October 30.

THE BRITISH SHIP "GALATEA" IN A CYCLONE IN THE INDIAN OCEAN.—[See Page 67.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]



THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER X.

ONE on the top of the other, the rest of the company followed the Aldeburites, till we had the whole tale of them complete. Including the family, they were twenty-four in all. It was a noble sight to see, when they were settled in their places round the dinner-table, and the Rector of Frizinghall (with beautiful elocution) rose and said grace.

There is no need to worry you with a list of the guests. You will meet none of them a second time—in my part of the story at any rate—with the exception of two.

Those two sat on either side of Miss Rachel, who, as queen of the day, was naturally the great, attraction of the party. On this occasion she was more particularly the centre-point toward which every body's eyes were directed; for (to my lady's secret annoyance) she wore her wonderful birthday present, which eclipsed all the rest—the Moonstone. It was without any setting when it had been placed in her hands; but that universal genius, Mr. Franklin, had contrived, with the help of his neat fingers and a little bit of silver wire, to fix it as a brooch in the bosom of her white dress. Every body wondered at the prodigious size and beauty of the Diamond, as a matter of course. But the only two of the company who said any thing out of the common way about it were those two guests I have mentioned, who sat by Miss Rachel on her right hand and her left.

The guest on her left was Mr. Candy, our doctor at Frizinghall.

This was a pleasant, companionable little man, with the drawback, however, I must own, of being too fond, in season and out of season, of his joke, and of plunging in rather a headlong manner into talk with strangers, without waiting to feel his way first. In society he was constantly making mistakes, and setting people unintentionally by the ears together. In his medical practice he was a more prudent man; picking up his discretion (as his enemies said) by a kind of instinct, and proving to be generally right where more carefully conducted doctors turned out to be wrong. What he said about the Diamond to Miss Rachel was said, as usual, by way of a mystification or joke. He gravely entreated her (in the interests of science) to let him take it home and burn it. "We will first heat it, Miss Rachel," says the doctor, "to such and such a degree; then we will expose it to a current of air; and, little by little—puff!—we evaporate the Diamond, and spare you a world of anxiety about the safe-keeping of a valuable precious stone!" My lady, listening with rather a care-worn expression, on her face, seemed t. wish that the doctor had been in earnest, and that he could have found Miss Rachel zealous enough in the cause of science to sacrifice her birthday gift.

The other guest who sat on my young lady's right-hand was an eminent public character—being no other than the celebrated Indian traveller, Mr. Murthwaite, who at risk of his life had penetrated in disguise where no European had ever set foot before.

This was a long, lean, wiry, brown, silent man. He had a weary look and a very steady attentive eye. It was rumored that he was tired of the humdrum life among the people in our parts, and longing to go back and wander off on the tramp again in the wild places of the East. Except what he said to Miss Rachel about her jewel, I doubt if he spoke six words, or drank so much as a single glass of wine, all through the dinner. The Moonstone was the object that interested him in the smallest degree. The fame of it seemed to have reached him, in some of those perilous Indian places where his wanderings had been. After looking at it silently for so long a time that Miss Rachel began to get confused, he said to her in his cool immovable way, "If you ever go to India, Miss Verinder, don't take your uncle's birthday gift with you. A Hindoo diamond is sometimes a part of a Hindoo religion. I know a certain city, and a certain temple in that city, where, dressed as you are now, your life would not be worth five minutes purchase." Miss Rachel, safe in England, was quite delighted to hear of her danger in India. The Bouncers were more delighted still; they dropped their knives and forks with a crash, and burst out together vehemently, "Oh! how interesting!" My lady fidgeted in her chair, and changed the subject.

As the dinner got on I became aware, little by little, that this festival was not prospering as other like festivals had prospered before it.

Looking back at the birthday now, by the light of what happened afterward, I am half inclined to think that the cursed Diamond must have cast a blight on the whole company. I plied them well with wine; and, being a privileged character, followed the unpopular dishes round the table, and whispered to the company, confidentially, "Please to change your mind, and try it; for I know it will do you good." Nine times out of ten they changed their minds—out of regard for their old friend Betteredge, they were pleased to say—but all to no purpose. There were gaps of silence in the talk, as the dinner got on, that made me feel personally uncomfortable. When they did use their tongues again, they used them innocently, in the most unfortunate manner and to the worst possible purpose. Mr. Candy, the doctor, for instance, said more unlucky things than I ever knew him to say before. Take one sample of the way in which he went on, and you will understand what I had to put up with at the side-board, officiating as I was in the character of a man who had the prosperity of the festival at heart.

"I CAN'T TELL YOU WHAT TRICKS THEY PERFORMED, OR HOW THEY DID IT."

One of our ladies present at dinner was worthy Mrs. Threadgall, widow of the late Professor of that name. Talking of her deceased husband perpetually, this good lady never mentioned to strangers that he was deceased. She thought, I suppose, that every able-bodied adult in England ought to know as much as that. In one of the gaps of silence somebody mentioned the dry and rather nasty subject of human anatomy; whereupon good Mrs. Threadgall straightway brought in her late husband as usual, without mentioning that he was dead. Anatomy she described as the Professor's favorite recreation in his leisure hours. As ill-luck would have it, Mr. Candy, sitting opposite (who knew nothing of the deceased gentleman), heard her. Being the most polite of men he seized the opportunity of assisting the Professor's anatomical amusements on the spot.

"They have got some remarkably fine skeletons lately at the College of Surgeons," says Mr. Candy, across the table, in a loud cheerful voice.

"I strongly recommend the Professor, ma'am, when he next has an hour to spare, to pay them a visit."

You might have heard a pin fall. The company (out of respect to the Professor's memory) all sat speechless. I was behind Mrs. Threadgall at the time, plying her confidentially with a glass of hock. She dropped her head, and said, in a very low voice, "My beloved husband is no more."

Unlucky Mr. Candy, hearing nothing, and miles away from suspecting the truth, went on across the table louder and politer than ever.

"The Professor may not be aware," says he, "that the card of a member of the College will admit him, on any day but Sunday, between the hours of ten and four."

Mrs. Threadgall dropped her head right into her tucker, and, in a lower voice still, repeated the solemn words, "My beloved husband is no more."

I winked hard at Mr. Candy across the table. Miss Rachel touched his arm. My lady looked unutterable things at him. Quite useless! On he went, with a cordiality that there was no stopping anywhere. "I shall be delighted," says he, "to send the Professor my card; if you will oblige me by mentioning his present address?"

"His present address, Sir, is the grave," says Mrs. Threadgall, suddenly losing her temper, and speaking with an emphasis and fury that made the glasses ring again. "The Professor has been dead these ten years!"

"Oh, good Heavens!" says Mr. Candy. Escaping the Bouncers, who burst out laughing, such a blank now fell on the company that they might all have been going the way of the Professor, and hailing as he did from the direction of the grave.

So much for Mr. Candy. The rest of them was nearly as provoking in their different ways as the doctor himself. When they ought to have spoken, they didn't speak; or when they did speak, they were perpetually at cross purposes. Mr. Godfrey, though so eloquent in public, declined to exert himself in private. Whether he was sulky, or whether he was bashful, after his discomfiture in the rose-garden, I can't say.

He kept all his talk for the private ear of the lady who sat next to him. She was one of his committee-women—a spiritually-minded person, with a fine show of collar-bone and a pretty taste in Champagne; liked it dry, you understand, and plenty of it. Being close behind these two at the side-board, I can testify, from what I heard pass between them, that the company lost a good deal of very improving conversation, which I caught on while drawing the corks, and carving the mutton, and so forth. What they said about their Charities I didn't hear. When I had time to listen to them, they had got a long way beyond their women to be confined, and their women to be rescued, and were buckling to on serious subjects. Religion (I understood them to say, between the corks and the carving) meant love. And love meant religion. And earth was heaven a little the worse for wear. And heaven was earth, done up again to look like new. Earth had some very objectionable people in it; but, to make amends for that, all the women in heaven would be members of a prodigious committee that never quarrelled, with all the men in attendance on them as ministering angels. Beautiful! beautiful! But why this mischief did Mr. Godfrey keep it all to his lady and himself?

"AND WHISPERED TO THE COMPANY, CONFIDENTIALLY, 'PLEASE TO CHANGE YOUR MIND, AND TRY IT; FOR I KNOW IT WILL DO YOU GOOD.'"

Mr. Franklin again—surely, you will say, Mr. Franklin stirred the company up into making a pleasant evening of it?

Nothing of the sort! He had quite recovered himself, and he was in wonderful force and spirits. Penelope having informed him, I suspect, of Mr. Godfrey's reception in the two quarters. But, talk as he might, nine times out of ten he pitched on the wrong subject, or he addressed himself to the wrong person; the end of it being that he offended some, and puzzled all of them. That foreign training of his—those French and German and Italian sides of him, to which I have already alluded, came out, at my lady's hospitable board, in a most bewildering manner.

What did he think, for instance, of the discussing the lengths to which a married woman might let her admiration go for a man who was not her husband, and putting it in his clear-headed witty French way to the maiden aunt of the Vicar of Priinghold? What do you think, when he turned to the German side, of his telling the lord of the manor, while that great authority on cattle was quoting his experience in the breeding of bulls, that experience properly understood, counted for nothing, and that the proper way to breed bulls was to look deep into your own mind, evolve out of it the idea of a perfect bull, and produce him? What do you say, when my county member, growing hot at cheese and salad time, about the spread of democracy in England, burst out as follows: "If we once lose our ancient safeguards, Mr. Blake, I beg to ask you, what have we got left?"—what do you say to Mr. Franklin answering, from the Indian point of view: "We have got three things left, Sir—Love, Music, and Salad?" He not only terrified the company with such outbreaks as these, but, when the English side of him turned up in due course, he lost his foreign smoothness; and, getting on the subject of the medical profession, had such downright things in ridicule of doctors, that he actually put good-humored little Mr. Candy in a rage.

The disputes between them began in Mr. Franklin being led—I forget how—to acknowledge that he had latterly slept very badly at night. Mr. Candy thereupon told him that his nerves were all out of order, and that he ought to go through a course of medicine immediately. Mr. Franklin replied that a course of medicine, and a course of groping in the dark, meant, in his estimation, one and the same thing. Mr. Candy, hitting back smartly, said that Mr. Franklin himself was, constitutionally speaking, groping in the dark after sleep, and that nothing but medicine could help him to find it. Mr. Franklin, keeping the ball up on his side, said he had often thought of the best method of healing the sick, and, for the first time, he knew what it meant. In this way they kept it going briskly, cut and thrust, till the dispute ended in Mr. Candy good-humoredly, in particular, so completely losing his self-control, in defense of his profession, that my lady was obliged to interfere, and forbid the dispute to go on. This necessary act of authority put the best extinguisher on the spirits of the company. The talk sprang up again here and there, but, in a minute or two at a time; just there was a miserable lack of life and sparkle in it. The Devil (for the Diamond) presented that dinner party, and it was a relief to every body when my mistress rose, and gave the ladies the signal to leave the gentlemen over their wine.

I had just ranged the decanters in a row before old Mr. Blewhite (who represented the master of the house), when there came a sound from the terrace which startled me out of my company manners in an instant. Mr. Franklin and I looked at each other: it was the sound of the Indian drum. As I live by bread, here were the jugglers returning to us with the news of the Moonstone to the house!

As they reached the corner of the terrace, and came in sight, I hobbled out to warn them off. But, as ill-luck would have it, the two Bouncers were behind me, and saw me. They whisked round to the terrace like a couple of sky-rockets, will to see the Indians exhibit their tricks. The other ladies followed, as the gentlemen came out on their side. Before you could say "Lord, bless us!" the rogues were making their salams; and the Bouncers were kissing the pretty little boy.

Mr. Franklin got on one side of Miss Rachel, and I put myself on the other. If our suspicions were right, there she stood, innocent of all knowledge of the truth, showing the Indians the Diamond in the hollow of her dress!

I can't tell you what tricks they performed, or how they did it. What with the vexation about the dinner, and what with the provocation of the rogues coming back just in the nick of time to see the jewel with their own eyes, I own I lost my head. The first thing that I remember after I saw the sudden appearance on the scene of the Indian traveler, Mr. Murthwaite, skirting the half-circle in which the gentlefolks stood or sat, he came quietly behind the jugglers, and spoke to them on a sudden in the language of their own country.

If he had pricked them with a bayonet, I doubt if they could have started and turned on him with more tigerish quickness than they did on hearing the first words that passed his lips. The next moment they were howling and salaaming to him in their most piteous and waky way. After a few words in the unknown tongue had passed on either side, Mr. Murthwaite withdrew as quietly as he had approached. The chief Indian, who acted as an interpreter, thereupon wheeled about again toward the gentlefolks. I noticed that the fellow's coffee-colored face had turned gray since Mr. Murthwaite had spoken to him. He bowed to my lady, and informed her that the exhibition was over. The Bouncers, indescribably disappointed, burst out with a loud "O!" directed against Mr. Murthwaite for stopping the performance. The chief Indian laid his hand humbly on his breast, and said the second time that the jugglers were over. The little boy went round with the hat. The ladies withdrew to the drawing-room; and the gentlemen (except-ing Mr. Franklin and Mr. Murthwaite) returned to their wine. I and the footman followed the Indians, and saw them safe off the premises.

Going back by way of the shrubbery I smelled tobacco, and found Mr. Franklin and Mr. Murthwaite (the latter smoking a cheroot) walking slowly up and down among the rose-trees. Mr. Franklin beckoned to me to join them.

"This," says Mr. Franklin, presenting me to the quiet traveler, "is Rachel Betteredge, the old servant and friend of our family of whom I spoke to you just now. Tell him, if you please, what you have just told me."

Mr. Murthwaite took his cheroot out of his mouth and bowed, in his weary way, against the trunk of a tree.

"Mr. Betteredge," he began, "those three Indians are no more jugglers than you and I are."

Here was a new surprise! I naturally asked the traveler if he had ever met with the Indian before.

"Never," says Mr. Murthwaite; "but I know what Indian jugglers are, and what they have been to-night is a very bad and clumsy imitation of it. Unless, after long experience, I am utterly mistaken, those men are high-caste Brahmins. I charged them with being disguised, and you saw how it told on them, clever as the Hindoo people are in concealing their feelings. There is a mystery about their conduct that I can't explain. They have doubly sacrificed their caste—first, in coming here; secondly, in disguising themselves as jugglers. In the land they live in that is a tremendous sacrifice to make. There must be some serious motive at the bottom of it, and some justification of no ordinary kind to plead for them, in recovery of their caste, when they return to their country. I am sorry I could not help you, Mr. Franklin, after what you have said, I feel bound, in the interests of Lady Verinder and her daughter, to tell you something more, and possibly put you on your hands. I speak to you in confidence; you will oblige me, I am sure, by not forgetting that."

With this preface he told the Indian traveler (speaking now in his clear-headed French way) all that he knew, and me all that I knew myself. Even the immovable Mr. Murthwaite was so interested in what he heard that he let his cheroot go out.

"Now," says Mr. Franklin, when he had done, "what does your experience say?"

"My experience," says the quiet traveler, "says that you have had more narrow escapes of your life, Mr. Franklin Blake, than I have had of mine—and that is saying a good deal!"

It was Mr. Franklin's turn to be astonished now.

"Is it really as serious as that?" he asked.

"In my opinion it is," answered Mr. Murthwaite. "I can't doubt, after what you have told me, that the Indians mean to follow Rachel to its place on the forehead of the Indian idol, is the motive and the justification of that sacrifice of caste which I alluded to just now. Those men will wait their opportunity with the patience of cats, and will not spare the ferocity of tigers. How you have escaped them I don't imagine. They saw eminent traveler, lighting his cheroot again, and staring hard at Mr. Franklin. "You have been carrying the Diamond backward and forward, here and in London, and you are still a living man! I am very glad to see you for it. It was daylight both times, I suppose, when you took the jewel out of the bank in London?"

"Broad daylight," says Mr. Franklin.

"And plenty of people in the streets?"

"Plenty."

"You settled, of course, to arrive at Lady Verinder's house at a certain time? It's a lonely country between this and the station. Did you keep your appointment?"

"No. I arrived four hours earlier than my appointment."

"I beg to congratulate you on that proceeding! When did you take the Diamond to the bank at the town here?"

"I took it on shore after I had brought it to this house—and three hours before my body was prepared for seeing me in these parts."

"I beg to congratulate you again! Did you bring it back here alone?"

"No. I happened to ride back with my cousin and the guests."

"I beg to congratulate you for the third time! If you ever feel inclined to travel beyond the civilized limits, Mr. Blake, let me know, and I will go with you. You are a lucky man."

Here I struck in. This sort of thing didn't at all square with my English ideas.

"You don't really mean to say, Sir," I asked, "that they would have taken Mr. Franklin's life, to get their Diamond, if he had given them the chance?"

"Do you smoke, Mr. Betteredge?" says the traveler.

"Yes, Sir."

"Do you care much for the ashes left in your pipe when you empty it?"

"No, Sir."

"In the country those men came from they care just as much about killing a man as you care about emptying the ashes out of your pipe. If a thousand lives stood between them and the getting back of their Diamond—and if they thought they could destroy those lives without discovery—they would take them all. The sacrifice of caste is a serious thing in India, I tell you like. The sacrifice of life is nothing at all."

I expressed my opinion upon this that they were a set of murdering thieves. Mr. Murthwaite expressed his opinion that they were a wonderful people. Mr. Franklin, expressing no opinion at all, brought us back to the matter in hand.

"They have seen the Moonstone on Miss Verinder's dress, Mr. Franklin. What is to be done?"

"What one uncle threatened to do," answered Mr. Murthwaite. "Colonel Herncastle undoubtedly stood the people he had to deal with. Send the Diamond home under the double guard of more than one man) to be cut up at Amsterdam. Make half a dozen diamonds of it instead of one. There is no end of the sacred identity in The Moonstone—and there is an end of the conspiracy."

Mr. Franklin turned to me.

"There is no help for it," he said. "We must speak to Lady Verinder to-morrow."

"Shall you tell her what we have been talking about?" I asked. "Suppose the Indians come back?"

Mr. Murthwaite answered me before Mr. Franklin could speak.

"The Indians won't risk coming back to-night," he said. "The direct way is hardly ever the way they take in any thing—let alone a matter like this, in which the slightest mistake might be fatal to their reaching their end."

"But suppose the rogues are bolder than you think, Sir?" I persisted.

"In that case," says Mr. Murthwaite, "let the dogs loose, Mr. Blake. Have you got any big dogs in the yard?"

"Two, Sir. A mastiff and a blood-hound."

"They will do. In the present emergency," Mr. Betteredge, the mastiff and the blood-hound have one great merit—they are not likely to be troubled with your scruples about the sanctity of human life."

The strumming of the piano reached us from the drawing-room as he fired that shot at me. He threw away his cheroot, and took Mr. Franklin's arm, to go back to the ladies.

I noticed that the sky was clouding over fast as I followed them to the house. Mr. Murthwaite noticed it too. He looked round at me in his dry, droll way, and said to me:

"The Indians will want their umbrellas, Mr. Betteredge, to-night!"

It was all well for him to joke. But I was not an eminent traveler; and my way in life would lead me not like me into playing ducks and drakes with my own and other persons' sins and murderers in the outlandish places of the earth.

I went into the library room, and sat down in my chair in a perspiration, and wondered helplessly what was to be done next. In this anxious frame of mind the reader might have excused by working themselves up into a fever—I ended in a different way. I lit my pipe, and took a turn in the garden to cool.

Before I had been at it five minutes I came to this amazing bit—page one hundred and sixty-seven of Betteredge:

"Fear of Danger is ten thousand times more terrifying than Danger itself, when apparent to the Eyes; and the Misery and Heartburn of Anxiety greater, by much, than the Evil which we are anxious about."

The man who doesn't believe in Robinson Crusoe after that is a man with a screw loose in his understanding, or a man lost in the mist of his own self-conceit. My sentiment is thrown in upon him; and pity is better reserved for some person with a livelier faith.

I was for my own part the second pipe, and still lost in admiration of that wonderful book, when Penelope (who had been handing round the tea) came in with the news that Mr. Godfrey and Sergeant Cuff had left the Bouncers singing a duet—words beginning with a large "O," and music to correspond. She had also heard that my lady made mistakes in her game of whist for the first time in our experience of her. She had seen the great traveler, Mr. Murthwaite. She had overheard Mr. Franklin sharpening his wits on Mr. Godfrey, at the expense of Ladies' Charities in general, and of the Bouncers in particular. She had left him back again rather more smartly than became a gentleman of his benevolent character. She had detected Mr. Franklin, apparently engaged in appeasing Mrs. Threadgall by showing her some photographs, and really occupied in thanking Mrs. Threadgall, which no intelligent lady's maid could misinterpret for a single instant. Finally, she had missed Mr. Candy, the doctor, who had mysteriously disappeared from the drawing-room, and had then mysteriously returned, and entered into conversation with Mr. Godfrey. Upon the whole, things were prospering better than the experience of the dinner gave us any right to expect. If we could only hold on for another hour, did Father Time would bring up their carriages, and relieve us of them altogether.

Every thing wears off in this world; and even the comforting effect of Robinson Crusoe wore off after Penelope left me. I got fidgety again, and resolved on making a survey of the grounds before the rain came. Instead of taking the footman, whose nose was human, and therefore useless in any emergency, I took the blood-hound with me. He is none for a stranger was to be depended on. We went all round the premises, and out into the road—and returned as wise as we went, having discovered no such thing as a lurking human creature any where. I chained up the dog again for the present; and, returning once more by way of the shrubbery, met two of our gentlemen coming out toward me from the drawing-room. The two were Mr. Candy and Mr. Godfrey, still (as Penelope had reported them) in conversation together, and laughing softly over some pleasant conceit of their own. I thought it rather odd that those two should have come up a friendship together—but passed on, of course, without appearing to notice them.

The arrival of the carriages was the signal for the arrival of the rain. It poured as if it meant to pour all night. With the exception of the doctor, whose gig was waiting for him, the rest of the company went home snugly under cover in close carriages. I told Mr. Candy that I was afraid he would get wet through. He told me, in return, that he wondered I had arrived at my time of life without knowing that a doctor's skin was water-proof. So he drove away in the rain, laughing over his own little joke; and so we got rid of our dinner company.

The next thing to tell is the story of the night.

ON A SPITEFUL LETTER.

By ALFRED TENNYSON.

HERE, it is here—the close of the year,
And with it a spiteful letter.
My fame in song has done much more wrong,
For himself has done much better.

O foolish bard, is your lot so hard,
To have your verses scorn'd?
I think not much of yours or of mine:
I hear the roll of the ages.

This fallen leaf, isn't fame as brief?
Yet rhymes may have been the stronger.
Yet here too I see, little song, your lot:
I last but a moment longer.

O faded leaf, isn't fame as brief?*
What room is here for a hater?
Yet the withering leaf hears the greener leaf,
For it hangs one moment later.

Greater than I—isn't that your cry?
And I shall live to see it.
Well, if it be so, so it is, you know;
And if it be—so be it.

O summer leaf, isn't life as brief?
But this is the time of hollies.
And my heart, my heart is an evergreen:
I hate the spites and the follies.

ELEVEN THOUSAND POUNDS.

"TAKE care of it, Hugh."

"All right, dad—good-morning."

"Good-morning;" and Mr. Hugh Randall put on his hat, and, passing through the bank, took his way into the town with £11,000 under his charge.

Oh, Hugh, Hugh, did it never occur to you that you might have been picked before that, and that some such trifle as a few odd thousands might not come amiss to any one who, with limited means of his own, was desirous of increasing them at his neighbors' expense? Whether the thought of danger entered his mind or not, Hugh risked it, and went lounging up the street for Mr. Hugh was one of those people who make a point of never being unduly excited. He was frequently employed in the course of his bank transactions as the present between his uncle's bank and the other banks of the city; consequently he was at home with the route of taking his destination, he marched up to that portion of the bank counter which was appropriated to the business transactions of a multitude of people whose surnames happened to fall within the bounds marked out by the letters "L to R."

The elderly and precise clerk who received the high stool on the opposite side of the counter was almost shaken out of his propriety by Hugh's smart and cheerful exclamation, as he stood whistling vanily in the depths of his pockets for the precious notes, the fact dawned upon him that the money was unmistakably gone.

"What's the matter, Mr. Hugh?" "What is it?" was repeated more than once before his sensations were sufficiently recalled, and then the query was only met by another, and one which, alas! was not to be so easily answered. "What am I to do?" were the words with which he at last demurred out. Had any one kindly suggested some plan by which he might, without loss of time, have shipped himself for the antipodes, Hugh would gladly have adopted it; and perhaps this idea would have been quite as great had the floor opened and swallowed him up, hiding from his bewildered eyes the inquiring faces around, which seemed to be dancing waltzes with the green lamp-shades, to the sound of the sovereigns clinking in the little scales. Unfortunately, neither of these sensible openings presented itself, and, in default of either, he returned in the most cress-fallen condition, as first to Mr. Hudson, who could only look at the spot which he had left so complacently less than an hour before.

How Hugh managed his confession he could never afterward remember; but nothing could efface the recollection of the grave kindness which, amidst his extreme annoyance, his uncle showed toward himself, and which was harder to bear than the sternest reproofs. Half unconsciously, Hugh felt that even then the uncle, who had been as a father to him, had not forgotten the young brother, whose dying message from a field of battle had commended the baby-boy whom he had never seen, to a care scarcely less kind and watchful than his own might have been. Once in possession of the facts of the loss, Mr. Hud-dall's views instantly shaped themselves into the definite form of "the police station," whither the hapless steed of the patent Hansom was urged by every inducement that could be afforded by the driver's whip, to which, but for a lingering sense of propriety, Hugh would fain have added the strokes of his umbrella.

As he and his uncle were ushered into the inspector's presence, Hugh experienced, to an uncomfortable degree, a return of the feelings which years ago possessed him, when the discipline of school life brought him into unpleasantly close communication with the head-master. The inspector was a gentleman who had seen many days since Hugh's birth; one on which he rose from the inferior position which called for the exhibition of his prowess in whatever field might be afforded by the display of skill in dodging consequently his personal appearance had now assumed a portly dignity much in accordance with his more dominant, but chiefly commensurately more elevated, sphere of labor. He had apparently been aroused from an afternoon doze by the entrance of the visitors; but the air of dull business which he had contrived to assume very soon gave place to an excitement which he could scarcely conceal under a veil of decorous sorrow for Mr. Randall's loss. Rubbing his hands, he took up his position behind an official-looking desk, and proceeded to address Mr. Hugh in a tigurous examination upon every particular of the theft.

Poor Hugh! he began to feel as if the thumbscrew itself could be a mild form of torture compared with the neatly-turned questions by which the inspector made him confess himself guilty of the most grovelling meanness in the presence of his uncle, and one or two attendant policemen, who he felt were standing behind him open-mouthed with wonder and, no doubt, admiration of the phenomenon of a man who, having come to years of discretion, had been so devoid of common sense as to walk down a crowded thoroughfare, in the busiest part of the afternoon, with eleven thousand pounds in his coat-tails. The examination, indeed elicited little else—being ended, an ominous silence ensued, broken after a few minutes by the inspector, who, striking his hand on the desk, ejaculated, "I have your man!" with a warmth which almost made the less experienced expect to see the suffered form of the thief lying upon the desk when the official hand was withdrawn. Further explanation was then in the possession of the first accelerated detective was at the moment in the city, nay, in the very police-station itself, having come down with a friend in the course of an investigation in which he was engaged; "and," added the inspector, "if any one can find your money, he is the man."

Mr. Taplin soon added his presence to the council of war. He was a great contrast to his brother official, being rather below the middle height, and of a spare, wiry figure; and was, moreover, possessed of sharply-cut features and a pair of keen gray eyes, which, without the small est symptom of restlessness, seemed to take in to the full every thing around. As Hugh glanced from the one man to the other, the vision of a bull-dog and a greyhound flashed through his mind, and he instinctively came to a conclusion as to which of the two was the more likely to run down the game. His meditations were brought to a close by the request for "particulars," and once more he went through the meagre details, which he felt only sufficed to make him an object of pity to all beholders. Wasn't it enough to have made away with eleven thousand pounds of other people's money, without having perpetually to refresh his memory on the subject? and his felt stronger than ever the appropriate to his case sundry poetical similes of "stags at bay," "hunted lions," and so forth; consequently the detective's assurance of his certainty that the money was on its way either to London or America was rather crossly received.

"I don't see what the use of your being certain," he answered, somewhat sharply; "better say the North Pole at once; I should be quite as likely to find it."

Mr. Taplin vouchsafed no other reply than the shadow of a smile, showing his pitying sense of the young man's inability to estimate the merit of his resources. He was not one of the people who carry on all their mental processes outside their heads, and a silence fell on the whole party for several minutes, during which, with amazing rapidity of thought, the detective laid his schemes, the first step in which was a visit to the postoffice just before the bags were made up.

By that time Hugh's fit of injured innocence had been successfully by despondency, and he watched with extreme anxiety while, in accordance with the detective's directions, the registered letters were spread out before them. There was a line which bounded even Mr. Taplin's powers; here he might look, but he might not touch. At he bent over the letters Hugh saw a flash of pleasure in the grey eye as it rested on an envelope addressed, in a scrawling hand, to "Mrs. J. Hopkins, 19 Pleasure Street, London." The detective just laid one finger on it, turned to Hugh, and said, with an emphasis which contrasted well with it, "Your money is in that letter, or it's gone beyond our reach. You must come up to town with me to-night."

A few hours later the two were shooting along the line on their way to London. Now, if there was one thing which Hugh Randall hated more than another, it was traveling by night, and with the words "wild-goose chase" running races with each other in his head, he was not likely to look with favor on the present expedition, or to compose himself very tranquilly to sleep. The middle-aged gentleman by his side was soon snoring sonorously; the old lady at the farther end of the carriage began a gentle accompaniment; and Hugh was reduced to watching, with some degree of interest, the young lady whom she chaperoned, while she divested herself of her bonnet, and enveloped her brown hair in a bewitching arrangement of blue wool, such as he now beheld for the first time in perfection, having hitherto only seen the article in a transition state, trussed on the knitting-pins with which his sisters toiled in anticipation of a bazar which was to come off the following Christmas. But even this little amusement was soon denied; for the owner, evidently being disposed to follow her chaperon's example and go to sleep, Hugh with drew his eyes, only to meet the perfectly sleepless ones opposite him. After a few words of conversation, but Mr. Taplin appeared more disposed for meditation, and Hugh sought solace in the contemplation of the same young lady now as reflected in the window-pane. He grew provoked as time went on, and sleep, which reigned undisturbed at the other end of the carriage, evidently declined to visit either his companion or himself. "Not that I think he wants it," he soliloquized; "I never saw a man's eyes look those eyes, so terribly wide-awake. I don't believe a fly could sit on that carriage and he not see it. I wonder if he thinks me old lady is a case; how he looks at her!" In a few moments more Hugh was nothing, by means, any more than a material railway, but down a fathomless abyss in pursuit of a Bonnson containing a stout old lady in a blue head-dress, and numerous bank notes, who was being driven to Newgate by Mr. Taplin. He awoke, with a start, to encounter the grey eyes once more, and found his acquaintance had fallen; and when the hours of the weary night had dragged through, and a succession of jovially-inclined porters had given way to the cold reality of a London station in the early dawn, the detective was as perfectly himself as though he had enjoyed hours of undisturbed repose in the ringing cheerful voice which proposed a bath and breakfast sounded wonderfully fresh and pleasant.

The curtain next rises upon a trio passing along the streets of London. This trio consisted of our friend Hugh, with his portmanteau, Pleasure Street was situated. By a hasty visit to the district post-office, Mr. Taplin had possessed himself of all the information he required in that quarter, and having given minute directions to the postman, had joined him again when he reached the door of Mrs. Hopkins, to see that the money had faded from Hugh's mind again and again, but his heart beat faster than usual as they turned into the public-looking street in which the last scene of the play was to be enacted, and by the time they reached the door of No. 19 it was beating at a tremendous rate. Taplin desired him to be quite quiet, and by a look enforced on the postman the remembrance of the directions he had given him. Hugh's face was far too canny to risk, by their reiteration, the calmness upon which the chance of their being carried out depended.

The double knock was quickly answered, and Hugh started back almost as if he were the thief when the door opened, only disclosing, however, a rather showy-looking woman. Mr. Taplin stood back, just hidden from her sight, but in the quiet street the dull sound of the word came distinctly through the frosty morning air.

"Registered letter, Mrs. G. Hopkins." Can she again the paper?"

Then the answer: "I am Mrs. Hopkins. Give it here."

In accordance with his orders the postman only produced the paper, while apparently searching in his pouch for the letter. Mrs. Hopkins took it with most satisfactory, and went away, and after a few moments of suspense the anxious listeners heard her footsteps as she returned with the signed paper and handed it to the postman, who then placed the letter in her hand. In another moment—Hugh scarcely knew how, so rapid was the change—the postman was double round the corner of the street, with a well-earned coin in his pocket, and Mr. Taplin was in the narrow passage, and had snatched the letter from its owner's hand. As Hugh pressed up to his side he tore open the seal, and the rustling notes lay in his hand! Hugh could scarcely believe his eyes; but a motion of his companion checked the torrent of wonder that was rushing from his lips. The unhappy woman had realized something of what had happened, and, with a faint cry of "It's all up with us!" fell back against the wall. A feeling akin to reverence took possession of Hugh Randall, as, without a shade of triumph in the success of his work, the detective supported her into the shabby parlor, and laid her on the black horse-hair sofa. Is was a daring and perilous move to seize the letter, but his instrctions certainly led him to run the risk. With a muttered "Are there no women-kind in the house?" he left the room, and Hugh heard the firm step sounding along the passage, and the clear voice calling at the top of the stairs, "Mrs. Betty—Susan—whatever your name is, where are you?" A slatternly maid-of-all-work answered the summons, in no small amazement at the sight of two strange gentlemen, and to her charge Mr. Taplin left her mistress, while he and Hugh assured themselves of the identity and completeness of the notes. Mrs. Hopkins soon recovered sufficiently to pour out a flood of tears and bewildered lamentations; but with calm patience the detective at length drew from her the facts which he needed. "Ah," she cried, bitterly, "he told me he would make our fortune this time, and I should have plenty then. He drank every thing he made before, the wretch! and left me less in this miserable hole. But I'll be revenged on him yet."

"Ah, poor thing! poor thing!" remarked the detective to Hugh; "there are generally women mixed up in this sort of thing. Money stolen in this sort of way is almost always sent to women. I suppose they think it is not so likely to be suspected."

As they left the room, when Mr. Taplin had made such arrangements as suited his good will and pleasure, he desired Hugh to look at a photograph hanging in a frame over the chimney-piece, and no sooner were they in the street than, with the wonder with which one watches the rise of many-colored ribbon drawn out from a conjuror's cars, Hugh beheld issuing from Mr. Taplin's pocket-book the duplicate of the carte.

"Thank your mam," observed Mr. Taplin at last, with a ring of triumph even in his calm voice, "after whom I came down to your parts. Strange, now, isn't it? That was a little matter which took place weeks ago, and we were altogether off the scent. Well, we got on a new track early this week, and I went down, believing if I caught my bird-any where it would be there. Then your business turned up, and, like a fool, I crossed my mind that in finding out the one I should just be carrying on the work I came after. I can't in any way account for it, but that was my impression; and you see how true it was. I knew enough of the fellow I was after to be pretty sure that, if your notes were in his hands, they would either come to town or go direct to America. But it was just a toss up between the two; and I should have been altogether at sea if it hadn't been for seeing this letter at the office. When I saw 'Mrs. Hopkins' I was as sure as that I was a living man that the money was there, for I knew 'Hopkins' was one of my man's aliases, though he was going by another name when he did the bit of work about which I went north. It was a queer thing seeing the photograph which I had to trace him by, and which had gone about in my pocket these few weeks till I knew the face as well as my own, hanging up over that poor thing's fireplace."

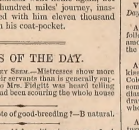
And so Hugh Randall went home again, not grudging his five hundred miles' journey, inasmuch as he carried with him eleven thousand pounds—but not in his cost-pocket.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NOT SO BAD AS THEY SEEM.—Mistresses show more consideration for their servants than is generally supposed. Not long ago Mrs. Fidgett was heard telling Mary Ann that she had been scouring the whole house for her.

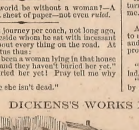
What is the key-note of good-breeding?—B natural.

What would this world be without a woman?—A perfect blank—like a sheet of paper—not even ruled.



Brown, on his first journey per coach, not long ago, worried the driver beside whom he sat with incessant inquiries about every thing on the road. At last he gave his quietus thus:

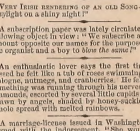
DRIVER. "There's been a woman lying in that house more than a month, and they haven't buried her yet."



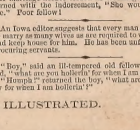
BROWN. "Not buried her yet! Pray tell me why not?"

DRIVER. "Because she isn't dead."

DICKENS'S WORKS ILLUSTRATED.



"A TALE OF TWO CITIES."



"DOMBEY AND SON."

"HARD TIMES."

"GREAT EXPECTATIONS"

"BLEAK HOUSE."

WANTED.

A pair of spectacles to suit the eyes of potatoes. The club with which an idea strikes the point. A stick to measure narrow escapes. The identical hook and line with which an angler caught a cold. An umbrella used in the reign of tyrants. A knot from the board a man paid seven dollars a week for.

At the time when we were in the midst of our warfancy, and men had got their piety and their patriotism so mixed up that they didn't know which from t'other, the elder of one of our populous churches having refused to scream and clamor at his Bible, looked round upon his congregation with a countenance which indicated that he had something of importance to communicate. The audience, as in duty bound, rustled a little, and then subsided into the silence of intense expectation. After the surprises proper before the delivery of a weighty matter he elder announced the month and announced: "The closing prayer will be made by a brother-in-law of General Grant."

A little boy in Lowell was asked how many mills make a cent.

"Ten, sir," was the prompt reply.

Immediately a bright-faced little girl held up her hand in token of assent.

"Well, miss, what have you to say?"

"Please, Sir, ten mills don't make a cent. I pays all the mills in town don't make a cent."

A FEW-TYPE JOKE.—Why would it be economical to present your wife with a set of musical chairs?—Because it would luxuriate as long as she lived.

TOUCHING MELODY.—The most affecting instance of the power of music is that presented by the chambermaid mentioned in the song. He sang so sweetly that he actually "touched his guitar."

A bright, keen-little girl was much interested in preparing for an excursion about to take place. A certain lovesick beau asked her if she could repeat the alphabet backward. She said, "No, Sir," when the gentleman remarked, "Then you can't go on the excursion." She looked very demure for a moment, when she asked, "Can you say the Lord's Prayer backward?" "No, dear," "Then," replied the girl, "you can't go to heaven." Her interrogator stopped.

THE IRISH RENDERING OF AN OLD SONG.—"Tis my Daylight on a shining night!"

A subscription paper was lately circulated with the following object in view: "We subscribe and pay the amount opposite our names for the purpose of paying the organist and a boy to blow the same!"

An enthusiastic lover says the first time he was kissed he felt like a tub of rose swimming in honey, Cologne, nutmegs, and cranberries. He felt also as if something was raining through his nerves on feet of diamonds, escorted by several little cupids in chariots drawn by angels, aided by honey suckles, and the whole spread with melted rainbows.

A marriage-license issued in Washington was returned with the indorsement, "She wouldn't have me." Poor fellow!

An Iowa editor suggests that every man be allowed to marry as many wives as are required to wash, cook, and keep warm his linen. He has been unfortunate in procuring servants.

"Boy," said an ill-tempered old fellow to a noisy lad, "what are you hollerin' for when I am getting by?"

"Hoopa!" returned the boy, "what are you going by for when I am hollerin'?"

Associate Justice Davis. Associate Justice Swayne. Associate Justice Grier. The late Associate Justice Wayne. Chief Justice Chas

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT

Associate Justice Nelson. Associate Justice Clifford. Associate Justice Miller. Associate Justice Field.

UNITED STATES.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.—[SEE PAGE 74.]

THE JUSTICES OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

As we write this article Congress is engaged in debating a bill further regulating the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the nation by declaring what shall constitute a quorum of the Justices of the Supreme Court; doubtless before it shall reach the eyes of our readers that body, the highest judicial tribunal in the land, will be invested with the power by which this bill contemplates giving it. In view of this fact, and the additional importance given to the Chief Justice and his assistants, a great deal of interest has been manifested to know more of them; and we therefore give on other pages of this issue of the Weekly accurate portraits of Mr. CHASE and the Assistant Justices. Our engraving is taken from an imperial photograph recently published at Washington by Mr. ALEXANDER GARDNER. It represents the members of the court attired in the official robes worn by them when upon the bench, but in reality they are in a room or consultation-chamber, not in the hall of the Supreme Court.

The sessions of the court for hearing arguments and deciding causes are held always at Washington, commencing on the first Monday of December and continuing through the winter, a greater or less time according to the amount of business before it. During the spring, summer, and fall, the judges are largely occupied in holding circuit courts for the trial of causes, each one of them presiding over a circuit composed of various States assigned to him.

Below will be found brief biographical sketches of the Chief Justice and the Assistants at the time when our photograph was taken.

CHIEF JUSTICE SALMON P. CHASE.

The public life and services of Chief Justice CHASE are familiar to every intelligent reader, and those of this journal published soon after his elevation to the Chief-Justiceship. A native of New Hampshire, his removal in youth to Ohio was followed by calls to public service in the State and national councils—calls, too, culminating in an election to the United States Senate for the term from 1849 to 1855. To the Governor's chair in 1855; and again in 1857; and again to the Senate in 1860, from which office which he resigned the port-folio of the Treasury Department in President Lincoln's first cabinet. He was appointed by that President Chief Justice of the Supreme Court on December 6, 1864, to succeed Judge TANEY, then recently deceased. As a judge he has been distinguished by the exhibition of great legal acumen, comprehensive and liberal views, and for a judicious and sound application to them of legal principles, together with a high degree of administrative ability—a quality in which many profound and learned judges do not excel, and which is of the highest value to the position which he fills. He is now in the sixty-first (61st) year of his age.

JAMES M. WAYNE.

The senior of the Associate Justices at the time when our illustration was taken, is now no longer living. He was a native of Savannah, Georgia, was educated at Princeton College; chose the law for his (before-mentioned) profession, and began its practice in what was early called upon to enter public life. After filling several subordinate judicial stations in the State he was elected to Congress where he served until 1835, in which year he was appointed by Democratic President Jackson. He was esteemed as a sound judge and a learned lawyer in his opinions, particularly while the department of admiralty law, by which he elevated several of which are highly respected. His death occurred at Washington early in July, 1867, the result of which was that the vacancy was, however, no vacancy in the Court. It was statute passed in 1866, Congress provided that upon the occurrence of a vacancy the Justice shall be filled until the number of Associates becomes reduced to six.

JUSTICE NELSON

Is, since the decease of Justice WAYNE, the senior member of the Court, in the order of appointment. His commission dates from February 14, 1845. He had previously had a long judicial experience in the State courts of New York. From 1823 to 1831 he was, under the former judicial organization of this State, one of the Circuit Judges, and from 1831 to 1836 he was, first a Justice, and afterward Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of that State. As a member of the United States Supreme Court, he presides over the Second Circuit, comprising the New York, Vermont, Connecticut: in which the volume of judicial business is unusually large, and very important. His residence is at Cooperstown, in this State.

JUSTICE GRIER

Is a native of Pennsylvania; born March 5, 1794. His father was a distinguished and successful teacher, and Judge Grier's early education was carefully conducted by him in the duties of his position as the head of a college at Dickinson, and afterward at the academy at time prosecuting his legal studies. In 1817 he commenced the practice of the law, which he continued till 1846, when he was appointed "President Judge" of the District Court of Allegheny County. In 1846 he was appointed and unanimously confirmed a Justice of the United States Supreme Court. He resided in the United, embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, and he resides at Philadelphia.

NATHAN CLIFFORD

Is a native of New Hampshire, but his public career has been chiefly identified with the State of Maine, in which he removed in 1827. After serving as member of the Legislature in both branches, and as Attorney-General of the State, and as Representative in Congress from that State, he became, in 1846, Attorney-General of the United States. He was a Commissioner and afterward Minister to Governor Governor Guadalupe Hidalgo, upon the conclusion of the Mexican war. After an interval spent in the practice of the law at Boston, he was, in 1858, appointed to the Supreme Court by President Buchanan, to fill the vacancy in the first place by the predecessors in it being Severn, Woodbury, and Curtis. The duties and labors of this court have always been very eminent place in American jurisprudence, and have been rendered more arduous and responsible during a recent date. A series of reports of Judge Clifford's decisions is, we believe, nearly ready for publication.

NOAH H. SWAYNE, S. F. MILLER, DAVID DAVIS.

These three gentlemen, who reside respectively at Columbus, Ohio; Keokuk, Iowa; and Bloomington, Illinois, were appointed in 1862 by President LINCOLN. Their previous public and professional services were satisfactorily rendered to the country at the time. The circuits which have been of late assigned to them are—to Justice SWAYNE the eight, consisting of Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee; to Justice MILLER the eighth, of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Arkansas; and to Judge DAVIS the seventh, of Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

STEPHEN J. FIELD

Is one of a famous quadrate of brothers, the other three being DAVID DUDLEY, distinguished as an advocate and successful friend of law reform; CYRUS W., the founder of the Atlantic Telegraph; and HENRY M., the religious journalist and author. Judge FIELD is, we believe, a native of the East, but his professional life, before his appointment to the Supreme Court, was spent in California. He was, from 1857 to 1859, an Associate Justice, and from 1859 to 1863 the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of that State. This period was the era of litigation in land claims. While California was under the dominion of Spain and Mexico, her wild lands were, by the easy management of colonization, freely granted to persons who would engage to make settlements upon them. The treaty by which California was ceded to the United States provided for the confirmation of these claims founded upon these grants. The question and the discussion of their genuineness, and of titles which had been comparatively worthless a few years previous, and a class of land speculators, in a degree almost without precedent for number, intricacy, difficulty, and importance, which soon overburdened the Supreme Court. His understanding that Judge FIELD's experience with the invisible rules and unwritten usages which prevailed in the former government of California was a large element in enabling the Court to develop the harmonious and philosophic system of jurisprudence by which these titles have now very generally become adjudicated.

LOIS AMBLER.

"As old maid!"

That was what the young people of St. Paul's began to say of Lois Ambler.

St. Paul's was the pretentious name of the unpretending church where Lois and the young people made feint of worshiping. We say feint, because so few of us, even the best, ever do more than make feint of worshiping.

Lois Ambler's own brothers and sisters began to say, "An old maid for certain."

Lois herself, in her own private sanctum, sitting in a low rocking-chair at the window, looked out into the gathering autumn twilight, and wrote of herself "old maid." Not with any bitter or cynical air Lois wrote. She had laid them carefully aside an hour before in the little desk at the other side of the room, and her pretty face looked as fair, as still! over her white-aproned lap. But Lois, without ink or paper, was writing current words. They were not words worth writing, nor to be called to-morrow. They were not careless, jesting words. They were words like those we find in books and those we think and feel, but do not execute their purpose. There is something fearful about such words. They are absolute as inevitable as necessity they are impossible as fate. Lois Ambler was very calm as she wrote them. We are nervous over our trifling words, our little lies, our petty retorts, our restless love to hear or speak our solemn words we are grave; when we do our great deeds we are calm; in the presence of our deep griefs we are still; in the shadow of our great joys makes us quiet.

Lois was a girl of deep feelings. Some people thought her. Looking at her quiet face and dignified manner—a manner that seldom forsook her, even when her few intimate friends were present—a manner impressible nor warm-hearted, hence she lived in a perpetual calm. These people only looked at surface things. They had no eye or no ear or no instrument to measure heights and depths of human character. Their judgments were consequently of little value. Their judgments of Lois were full of pitiful, superficial critics who sit in judgment on women like Lois Ambler and never learn to believe that they are mistaken. Lois was of better readers of human nature, who detected reserve forces, strength, intensity, enthusiasm, keen sensitiveness, and delicate shrinking under the sudden flash of Lois's expressive gray eyes, in the arch and quiver of lips that would not always be repressed, in quick, impulsive gestures that would still at distance, and most of all in occasional words and tones that leaped out as crowded waves overleap their dykes.

Lois Ambler, sitting in the September twilight still as death, was not thinking of other people's thoughts concerning her, but was thinking her own thoughts of herself and another.

That other, a man, had become a regular attendant at St. Paul's as soon as the first leaf fell in the earlier spring. That was not the first of it either. The very first was earlier than the spring, before the leaves had begun to bud, the tops or the buds swelled on the trees. Lois, walking to the village on a woman's errand—a word of comfort, a bright smile, and a little of Swiss—thinking intently, as was her way of thinking, found her thoughts broken in upon by the sound of a horse's hoofs close at her elbow. As the horse and rider approached Lois's lips parted with a smile. If she had a weakness, her father was conscious of it in the smile that Lois's lips. She is a miserable judge of horse-flesh, too," he would add, with a laugh. "Strength and steadiness are the only points she will see. She would sacrifice them all to style."

The horse was without question upon the road and into Lois's thoughts that chill February morning possessed in a marked degree this requisite style. It was a magnificent bay, arching its neck and its coat as well. Lois thought, and the arch of his neck was right royal. You see Lois's ideas of royalty were somewhat peculiar to herself. She pronounced him immediately an importation. All the horses in their town were steady, going horses, excellent in their way for carts and hearses, but they lacked the spirit and pride of this creature. She had seen Black Hawk a few years ago, but he had passed his prime then, and had often said she had not seen the animal since that was worthy to be mentioned the same day. Never she said within hearing of he shall be written in my memory with Black Hawk."

Lois Ambler, being a woman, had not taken up in mind the name of the gentleman who rode also. The man was not handsome in Lois's eyes. He had light hair and blue eyes, and she had a fancy for dark-haired, black-eyed men. Dark men and black horses were among her likings. "I hate blonde in a man and white in a horse," she would say, decidedly.

If any thing could have atoned to Lois for the lack of color in the complexion and hair and eyes of the rider was that not morning, it would have been the manner of his riding. He sat the horse with the conscious dignity of masterhood. As he passed Lois a gale of east wind made him shiver, and he let the reins fall on his horse's neck while he buttoned his coat tighter around him.

"Our men here would keep a watchful eye and a tight rein on such a horse," thought Lois. "Evidently he knows the flesh and blood he deals with. More likely still the horse knows that manner and knows that he is his master."

Lois was fond of poetry. Snatches of verse were ever running riot in her brain, and as she hummed her walk to the village, she was repeating to herself the opening lines of Bernardo del Carpio:

"The warrior bowed his crested head and tamed his heart of fire,
And eased the haughty king—"

She paused suddenly in her mental quotation, condemning it as inappropriate. In all probability the man was no warrior. Ten chances to one if he had raised his finger in defence of the national flag in its recent peril. His head was not crested save by a hideous beaver hat, hideous in spite of its being fashionable, and sleek, and shiny, and he had not bowed it either. It would have been a piece of unpardonable assurance if he had. As the quality of fire she was taking a poetical license with that too. Possibly the man's heart never had any fire in it. She was of opinion that rapid riding was apt to be in souls that shone out of dark-eyed men. It might so that the fires had gone out too, leaving only ashes and cinders, but the man was not cruel. She remembered how proudly he sat upon his steed, and wondered if terrible extremity even would drive him to cruelty or pencil dil

Lois Ambler's thoughts were not altogether consistent, you perceive; but by way of excuse for Lois for inconsistency, and by way of self-justification for writing them, I would inquire just here, where is the woman who is altogether consistent in thought and word and deed?

Lois's walk accomplished for her all she intended—namely, the securing of the spool of cotton, the paper of needles, the few yards of Swiss. It accomplished more. Ah! there is a world of mystery in this seizing of our intentions by powers over which we have no control, conveying our lightest words and smallest acts into levers that move all of the future for us.

She was on her way in a rush that night to Mary Hogarth's party. Time had been when Lois was a belle because of youth and beauty. Publishin it is not to be gainsaid by the matrimonial reaper, is apt to blossom into a wallflower. Lois Ambler never will be that. I write it confidently. She has the budding womanhood were germs of character rare as the ovaries that chaste excites beer.

This night of Mary Hogarth's the young people flocked around Lois. They were mainly of the Opera House set. Lois, in her New York country village church makes caste. They had an axe to grind; they wanted to organize a set of exhibits. They came to one like Lois for such things. She was popular, she had experience, she made people do as she wished. If the younger blood started them they would soon have a score of jealousies and bickerings that would act like centrifugal forces, driving them off at a generous tangent from each other. Lois was a centripetal force; people gravitated toward her; they did not understand it, but it was a fact. Shall I tell you why? Because it lay in her power of self-control. It is a greatness all the world acknowledges.

She was talking to John Decker, and looked slightly weary and bored, when Mary Hogarth brought a stranger to her corner—Mr. Gregory was called him.

"He looked sensible and as if he wouldn't relish school-girl talk, and I didn't know what else to do with him, so I left him over to Lois," she explained to her mother. "Lois is a trump at talking, and when I don't know what to play I always take her for a trump. He came home with the Clarks. He could bring no better credentials for respectability."

A artful little Mary! She was one of the people to whom Lois Ambler was a mystery, but she prided herself on her skill in grouping people harmoniously.

Lois looked up at the announcement of Mr. Gregory's name, and saw the rider of the morning.

"I think I passed you on my way from the village," said Mr. Gregory, fixing his clear blue eyes on Lois's face in a way she never knew. I think you did not see me?" he added.

Lois smiled. In that moment she read the man's vanity—a vanity she expected and was accustomed to receive gratification. A spirit of assistant took possession of her, and she replied, evasively:

"Your horse is a splendid animal."

Mr. Gregory looked annoyed.

"Raven looks well," he said. "He would be stubborn if he dared."

Lois Ambler was keenly sensitive, and her sensitiveness made her quick to draw inferences.

"He thinks me stubborn," was her mental comment. "Mine is a spirited horse."

There was a sudden flash in her eyes, then her face was calm as marble.

"It is a rare quality for a horse!" she ejaculated, half musing. "It is the 'Ghastly, grim, and ancient Raven, wandering from the nightly shore,' Mr. Gregory is, on the night's Plutonian shore, Nevermore?"

"Your quotation is not flattering," said Mr. Gregory, with a curl of his lip. "Neither horse nor rider hails from a nightly or Plutonian shore. We are just down from New York."

The man was sarcastic in his wounded vanity. Lois's womanly impulse to heal the wound she had carelessly made prompted the quick apology:

"I beg your pardon—"

She would have said more, but Mr. Gregory, with a wave of his hand, stopped her.

"No need," he said. "Women like you decapitate your victims as surely as Herodias beheaded the Baptist. The next minute you offer an apology to repair the injury. It were as easy to heal a broken heart with Spalding's glue."

Lois's face lost its calm. "Women like me!" she echoed. You saw in a moment by the pain in her face it was the thorn in her flesh to be classed with old women. Mr. Gregory made no attempt to extract it.

"Is it pain even in the summer?" he asked.

Lois replied, absently, that strangers generally liked it.

"Do you like it?" demanded Mr. Gregory.

"Yes," Lois replied. "I like it exceedingly."

"Humph!" ejaculated Mr. Gregory. "I should think it would be stupid."

"You would doubtless find it so," Lois retorted. A moment after she blushed at her rudeness.

The blush made Mr. Gregory smile.

Add consistency to your jewels," he said; "and teach your face and tones to harmonize in their testimony."

"I do not understand" exclaimed she, helplessly.

"Every word uttered should be established by two witnesses," explained Mr. Gregory. "Your face contradicts your lips—your lips, your face."

"You do not believe in physiognomy?" asked Lois, coldly.

"I believe in psychology just now," was Mr. Gregory's answer. "What do you believe in, Miss Ambler?"

"That Alps," was Lois's quick reply, as the "No Rest Galop" rippled from beneath the musicians's fingers, and John Decker claimed her hand.

Mary Hogarth, congratulating herself on her skilful disposition of party elements, suddenly found herself left alone in her comfortable room by the sight of Lois Ambler whirling down the room with John Decker, and Mr. Gregory deep in conversation with Captain Brungen.

"What upon earth!" was her involuntary exclamation. "Lois Ambler and Mr. Gregory!" and there is Mr. Gregory, scarred in defense of the national flag, who finds nobody better to talk to than Captain Brungen, an ignorant man and a very bad rebel. Oil and water would assimilate as easily. I must put an end to that."

In a few minutes she was chatting with Mr. Gregory. She hardly knew how she came to do it, but she was talking of Lois Ambler. It was not Mary Hogarth's way to speak of people by name. Mr. Gregory answered, "Ah, but there are flashes in the women's eye that make me think rudeness becoming sometimes."

Lois remembered in that September twilight, with the sharpened memory that comes to us when our life's destinies are changed, after that first meeting, sitting in this same little room, she had picked up a volume of poems and read Poe's Raven from beginning to end. She remembered the shudder with which she laid it down, repeating over and over again that last despairing verse:

"And the Raven, never flitting, still is sitting, still is sitting,
On the pallid bust of Pallas, just above my chamber door;
And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming,
And the lamp-light o'er him streaming, throws his shadow on the floor;
And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor
Shall be lifted—never more!"

She remembered that in her vivid imaginings of the pallid bust, and croaking raven, and dejecting soul, she had not imagined the horror of a coal-black steed and a resolute rider who had searched her face with a pair of calm, piercemen eyes, and asked her if she had spoken, "What do you believe in, Miss Ambler?" She remembered that she had said to herself she could never speak with that man. She was glad they were not likely to meet often. She remembered now—oh, so strange was the remembrance!—that the likelihood was founded on acts of her own will that had led from the places where Mr. Gregory frequented.

It had been the result of the straining of hers that she had met him one morning as she returned from a long, refreshing walk to her home. Lois had purposely wheeled his horse. "I will ride with you—if you do not object," were the words he used, in a manner implied, "I shall ride with you any way."

Lois bowed. That wordless bow conveyed the idea of resignation to the inevitable, and more. "If you deserted me ingloriously the other evening," said Mr. Gregory, going back to their former meeting with a straightforwardness that did not try to hide the scar of the wound received.

"Discretion is the better part of valor," replied Lois, meekly.

"Original!" exclaimed Mr. Gregory, as if he opened he justification.

"In its application," answered Lois, calmly.

Looking up, suddenly, she saw that Mr. Gregory was laughing a good-naturedly. Though neutralized her mood and disarmed her rebellion. She laughed herself. Sparring was such silly work for such grown-up men and women!

Mr. Gregory took a rose-bud from the lapel of his coat. "Would Miss Ambler take it as a peace-offering?" he asked. Lois took it with a smile. She would keep the peace if Mr. Gregory would not provoke her to rebellion. He did it the next minute. It was a beautiful rose-bud; a sanguina, he explained. He admired flowers on bushes. Mrs. Clark had the bad taste to pluck it and fasten it in his coat. It was boyish and unsophisticated for men to wear flowers. It was an affectation of sentiment. He was glad Miss Ambler liked it, for he did not.

Hugh Gregory's conduct reminded one of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. All the good conferred and immunities granted one moment he revoked the next. It was hard telling why he did it—perhaps to test his power, perhaps to preserve a non-committal posture.

Lois would have flung the flower back to its giver had she followed out her impulse; but the self-control, which was her greatness, triumphed, and she was carelessly placing it in the waist of her habit when her horse sprang suddenly and the flower fell to the ground.

Hugh Gregory made a motion to dismount, but she arrested him, partly from a foolish fear of giving trouble, and partly because the flower was valueless to her.

"Let it go," she said. "It does not signify at all."

Hugh Gregory in a twinkling sat upright, his face full of wounded feeling.

"I offer you a calumet, and you give me a quiver full of arrows," he said, indignantly.

"I beg your pardon!" exclaimed Lois, penitently. "I would really like it. Will you get it for me?"

"Never! I can not stoop so low," was the deep, earnest answer.

Lois was troubled. Vain as the man was, selfish as she suspected him to be, and uncompromising as she saw him, she had not meant to wound him so. Beneath all the rebellion he aroused within her there was that in his face and character that interested her. Some womanly instinct may have hinted even then that they whose lives were strung so finely that each with blundering fingers developed discords unknown before had power with better skill to evolve the sweetest harmony. It was only a hint half-comprehended and half-believed, but it made her sorely vexed and troubled.

That afternoon the sewing circle of St. Paul's held its monthly meeting. Lois Ambler was late, as she was apt to be where she was not wholly interested, and in her heart she voted sewing circles bores. She made election of her group, standing at the door and surveying the knots of women who chatted and sewed in the basement of St. Paul's. Mary Hogarth was talking animatedly to a bevy of girls who listened with apparent interest. That group promised the most entertainment, and she crossed over. Mary was talking of some hero in the war—a lieutenant who, in the thickest of the battle, had taken his captain's place in making an advance movement upon the enemy's lines, and all because he had once done the man injustice. The girls were loud in their admiration.

"Who told you?" asked Susan Morgan, a shrewd girl, who always wanted data.

"Captain Clark himself," answered Mary Hogarth. "He almost worships the man."

"Who is the man?" asked Lois Ambler.

"Lieutenant Gregory—Mr. Gregory, as he insists on being called now," answered Mary Hogarth.

Lois Ambler, not given to blushing, blushed and fell to self-communing. She had fallen into the error of condemning what she doubted—she whose heart clamored for justice and righteous judgment. These women, less just in general than she, had rebuked her. She thought of the rose-bud by the way-side signifying a quiver full of arrows, war to the end. Peace was infinitely better.

Lois left St. Paul's early. Mary Hogarth would have detained her, but a sight of Lois's face checked and restrained her, and she made no further effort.

"We meet to-night at the Widow Barton's to sew for the freedmen," said one of the elderly ladies to Lois as she passed out. "Will you come? The gentlemen are coming."

"It was foolish in me to add that, I suppose," said the lady, resuming her sewing and chat with her neighbor. "Lois isn't the girl to need a beau as inducement to do her duty."

The old lady might have withheld her self-condemnation, for Lois had certainly no thought of coming until the supplement was added to her invitation.

Lois was at the Widow Barton's at an early hour. A faded sanguina-bud drooped from one of the button-holes of her waist.

"It's awful withered!" said Mrs. Barton, disparagingly. "Do throw that out of the window, and go to my rose-bush and get a fresh one."

Lois shook her head.

Hugh Gregory came late. It was later still before he came in Lois's vicinity. He would not have come then, but Captain Clark called him to examine a fernery.

The girls rose to go, Lois among them.

"Miss Ambler has a fine face and form, don't you think so?" asked Captain Clark of Hugh Gregory.

"A fine form—yes," assented Hugh Gregory, frowning and turning to Lois. All his face changed as he looked at her. "Excuse me," he said, and crossed over.

"Is it a rose-bud, a sanguina?" he asked of Lois in a low tone.

"You should recognize it," she answered, blushing.

"Where did you get it?" he demanded.

"I walked out for it. It was not far," Lois began. "I do not like to be at enmity with any one. It is unchristian, and—"

Hugh Gregory stopped her.

"Don't dilute your act with weak words," he said, with a gentle pleading, strangely at variance with his old imperiousness. "It was a kind act, and I appreciate it. Going, are you? Good-by, then! I go away to-morrow, but we will meet again. Good-by!"

He had taken her hand, and grasped it firmly in his.

He came back again in the spring, and that was the beginning of the affair with Lois Ambler, according to the parishioners of St. Paul's. People pay little heed to the upheaving of loose earth and the laying of foundation walls; not until the structure rises above the surface does it command their notice or regard.

It was a strange summer for Lois. In her dreams of it in that September twilight it was like a picture full of high lights and deep shadows, or a piece of music full of exquisite harmonies and wailing misereres, or a poem with the mingled blessedness of "Paradise Regained" and the horrors of "Inferno." There were neutral tints in the picture, quiet passages in the music, and prosy pages in the poem. John Decker made them and Captain Clark; but beneath, and above, and running through them all were the days when Hugh Gregory crossed her path, and stirred her life.

Lois dwelt on one night in her musings as we dwell on last moments and last words of our dead friends. It was at the end of the summer, "the end of all things," she said, with a blush for saying it. The young people were all at Susan Morgan's. Hugh Gregory had come in with a stern face that did not soften till he talked with Lois. Lois had such a trusting way, that sat so sweetly on her old dignity that Hugh Gregory could not but be charmed. He gave himself up to the charming a while, all his face glad with a fullness of content. They were out on the long veranda; in their mood it was quite natural to get away from the crowd into the moonlight. Lois, in the frankness of her intercourse, fell into chat of their first meeting.

She quoted Hugh Gregory's remark, "'Women like me.' Describe them."

It had been the thorn in the flesh all this time. Hugh Gregory extracted it.

"Women resolute and high-minded, so just that but for their womanhood they would be severe; so trusting in their womanhood that mercy dethroned justice; loving honor, self-controlling, patient, and full of pity; not altogether consistent, not always self-comprehending, and not by nature humble. Women that were hard to win, but once won were kept forever. Lois Ambler—"

The sweet womanly face was bowed reverently and her eyes were dim with happy tears. Heaven was not far away.

Captain Clark tapped Hugh Gregory on the shoulder and handed him a letter, which he held in his hand.

"It was given me in New York," he said. "I give it to you now lest I forget it."

He stopped then and there, with his heart in flames, and read it, slowly and coldly, with but the slightest tinge of a blush on his cheek; the slightest of scornful curls on his lip. When he had finished it he did not speak, but stood looking at her who watched him a little way off. He gazed at her for a moment, sadness and scorn strangely mingled in his look; and then crushing the letter in his hand he turned to her and spoke, huskily, yet determinedly,

"It is cold here. Let us go in."

Lois's eyes for a moment were filled with great astonishment, then a change came over her. The gates of the Paradise that Hugh Gregory held ajar were closed and she shut out. But the expression to which her countenance had changed was not the one he expected to see when he had so coldly said, "Let us go in." He knew that Lois was not by nature humble. But there are other passions than pride in this world. He had expected her to look scornfully at him. Her eye had nothing of pride and contempt in it; she looked sadly in his face, and approached him with her gentlest air and laid her hand on his arm.

"Let us go in," he said, with nervous haste, "people are silly in the moonlight."

The Lois Ambler of a year before would then have glanced at him a look of scorn that would have annihilated him, but Lois was no longer proud with the man she loved.

"Let me see that letter, Hugh," she said, commanding, not entreating.

He hesitated a moment, still bending on her his strange look.

"Certainly," he said, at length, straightening the crumpled sheet and handing it to her. "It is nothing, my dear—"

He stopped at the words. A strange shiver ran through Lois Ambler's frame; her fingers grasped more nervously his arm; at length she took his hand in both of hers, and bending down kissed it. Strange action for the proud and haughty Lois Ambler!

She read it and blushed for him even more than he blushed for himself. It was a reminder of indebtedness, a dun for wine and cigars, for riotous living! She looked up at him inquiringly as she handed it back.

"Let us go in," he said.

"No. Not till you tell me what you mean. Why does this thing change your purpose?"

"It has made me see how contemptible I am. I would have asked you to share life with me—I who live without purpose, in idleness, in worse than idleness. I am disgusted with myself. You can not have a greater contempt for me than I have for myself. I am not worthy to love you."

"You are worthy to be loved, Hugh, and you know how I love you. You shall live for me, will you not? You shall labor for me, will you not? You shall endure all things for me, will you not?"

Lois Ambler is not an old maid, and Hugh Gregory no longer lives without a purpose, or wastes his life in riotous living.

And, moreover, reader, Lois Ambler is no imaginary character, and more than one Hugh Gregory walks Broadway in this our day.

TREASURE.

Two youthful schoolmates, blithe and free,
Wander'd together by the sea.

Said one, "My hopes are high as heaven;
To me the Future shall be given."

Said his companion, "I will stand
Among the foremost of the land.

"My fame shall thread the maze of men,
And lightnings quiver from my pen."

They met again in forty years,
And told their boyish hopes and fears.

The one had set his heart on gold,
And found it—growing frail and old.

The other, living fuller life,
Had fled the haunts of worldly strife,

And fill'd his soul with purpose high
And wisdom of the earth and sky,

But had not gather'd golden store,
To scare ill-fortune from his door;

Nothing but Courage, Hope, and Faith,
And Love, the conqueror of Death.

The rich man, with a mournful smile,
Said to the poor, and sigh'd the while:

"Oh, friend! thou'st dream'd thy life away,
And now that thou art old and gray,

"Hast not a penny for thine age,
Or for thy children's heritage."

The poor man cheerily replied:
"What matters? Life and joy abide.

"My children, sporting in the sun,
Can do at least what I have done.

"I've had my pleasure as I went,
And known the riches of content.

"Thou hast thy treasures—I have mine—
My heart my judge, men's verdict thine.

"But, friend, who'st chosen other ways
Than those I've trodden all my days,

"When comes the hour, as come it must,
When thou shalt mingle with the dust,

"Whose treasures shall the best endure—
Those of the rich man or the poor?

"Thine cease at portals of the grave,
Not even their shadow can'st thou save!

"But what I've won with heart endeavor
Is mine forever and forever.

"I take it with me through the tomb,
And find it when I pass the gloom!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE inventor of Nitro-Glycerine has written an elaborate article on the subject to the London Times. He thinks it is taking a very narrow view of the matter to try to check improvements on the plea of accidents. Certain restrictions respecting the transportation of this material seem to have disturbed him. Probably his nearest relative has not yet been blown to pieces; otherwise he would scarcely regard—as he seems to do—wise regulations in regard to Nytro-Glycerine "measures to paralyze the circulation of a powerful and useful agent." He recommends that the public be enlightened in regard to its use. That is surely what should be done, and as rapidly as possible. And meanwhile? Shall the use of explosive materials "be left to the understanding" of the ignorant? "Civilization" need not "be stopped," but prudence is wisdom, and "prevention is better than cure."

Our system of letter-delivery is to be improved. Postmaster Kelly has secured an addition of over one hundred carriers, and after the first of February letters will be delivered nine times a day in the upper part of the city, and eight times a day down town.

It is said that a section of the Nicolson pavement is to be laid before the gates of Plymouth Church, that the services may not be disturbed by passing vehicles. Other churches might adopt the same plan with great advantage.

It now comes to light that a French savant, Dellisier by name, actually predicted the earthquake and hurricane at St. Thomas. He made his calculations from astronomical observations, and from the influence of planets upon the surface of the earth, and foretold that the 12th of November would be the date. As the convulsions of nature commenced just about that time, he may be considered a true prophet—provided he really did predict as is stated. Report says that he is preparing a work on the subject, to be read to the Academy of Sciences at Paris.

Among the curiosities of literature the following letter should be preserved. It was recently received by a merchant of this city, who, a day or two before, had his pocket relieved of his porte-monnaie, in which, however, there was nothing of value. The porte-monnaie was returned with the letter, which is unique:

SIR,—After a great deal of trouble I was able to find out your name and address, and would request you in future to have more money in your pocket than you had yesterday, or my business would be spoiled altogether. For a gentleman of your standing and wealth I think it a d—d shame to go out with but two postage stamps in a pocket-book. The next time I shall have a chance to pick your pocket please to be provided with at least a few bank bills. If not, I shall publish you to some good cracksman. Yours, with no thanks,
A PICKPOCKET.

P.S.—The stamps I paid to the boy for bringing this letter.

It is pleasant when the conduct of our generals in the late war receives unsolicited commendation from Southerners. A resident of Savannah, giving in a recent private letter some retrospective account of Sherman's occupation of that city, thus writes:

"Sherman's army behaved nobly—so nobly as to win for itself and its gentlemanly chief a warm place in the hearts of our people. His very first act, after placing sentinels for the safeguard of the citizens, was to detail scores of men from his own ranks, with army wagons, to go out and obtain fuel for the supply of the inhabitants; and within three days every family in the city had received at least a temporary supply. He found Savannah destitute both of food and fuel, and he brought into the city about eighty thousand men as hungry as ourselves; yet there was no violence, not an occupied house was entered without leave of the resident, no depredations were committed, no noise, fighting, drunkenness, or profanity disturbed the quietude of our streets, either by day or night.

"But though there was no unnecessary suffering inflicted by the army of occupation, both they and we were almost without food—probably not ten days' supply of the barest necessaries in any house in the city. But the impending doom of starvation was averted by the noble philanthropy of our Northern friends. Ship-loads of provisions soon hastened to our relief, supplying temporarily our wants until business could be resumed, and money began again to circulate in our community. With us the worst was then over; and when, four months later, the Army of Virginia surrendered to Grant, I believe there was scarcely less rejoicing at the South than the North. True, our people were the conquered party—many had risked all friends and property in a losing venture—most of us had little in the way of worldly goods left—but we were worn out with the horrors of this unnatural strife, and longed for peace on almost any terms: and when it came, and folded its balmy wings over our troubled land, there were few indeed who did not bid it welcome, and utter a fervent 'Thank God' for the coming of the white-winged messenger."

A new method of punishing children has been invented, which is said to quell the turbulence of small children in a marvelous manner. It comes from Paris, as so many other good things do. For example:—James is seven years old; and he is a naughty boy one day. His papa remarks to him, in a serious tone, "James, you have been a bad boy to-day; I shall take a year off your age. You are now only six years old." Overcome with grief at this fearful calamity, the rebellious child subsides into complete docility, and promises perfect obedience if the abstracted year may be restored. We do not know whether this invention has yet been patented.

A revelation has been made to the Mormon leaders, and they have decided that all under their authority must give up the use of tea, coffee, and tobacco. No drinking-saloons are allowed in Salt Lake City—which fashion might be followed elsewhere with immense advantage.

A farmer in Phillips, Maine, while digging a well, came upon some irregularly laminated rock. Through this ledge he worked down by blasting four feet further, at which depth he found three frogs, completely imbedded in the rock. These frogs were each from three to four inches in length, but about an eighth of an inch in thickness, appearing as if flattened out by pressure. In about ten minutes after they were thrown out they showed signs of life, by slight motions or twinges of the eye. They also commenced inflating themselves and growing thicker, and in the course of half an hour hopped off. They were nearly the same color as the ledge in which they were found.

What delightful surroundings they have in South America! A Brazilian officer thus describes some of the beauties of soldiering in that tropical clime: "Amphibious creatures abound. In my own tent I have already killed four snakes. Every morning I find myself accompanied by a body-guard of fifteen or twenty monstrous toads, which have quietly spent the night under the corners of the hides that serve me as a bed. Enormous alligators promenade regularly every night from lake to lake. In a major's tent, the other day, one was killed that measured about six feet in length, and an unfortunate Brazilian soldier was unexpectedly taken off his legs by one of these horrible creatures and carried into the nearest lake."

It is stated that the profits of the Paris Exhibition amount to about $600,000. The sum gained during the three supplementary days for the poor of Paris was 176,000 francs.

At a recent convention of clergymen it was proposed, after dinner, that each should in turn entertain the company with some "interesting remarks." Among the rest, one drew upon his fancy and related a dream. In his dream he went to heaven, and he described the golden streets, etc. As he concluded, one of the divines, who was somewhat noted for his penurious habits, inquired, jocosely:

"Well, did you see any thing of me in your dream?"

"Yes, I did."

"Indeed! what was I doing?"

"You were on your knees."

"Praying, was I?"

"No—scraping up gold!"

The following statements, gathered from an English journal, may not be uninteresting to the scientific reader: The recent discovery by Schiaparelli, of Milan, that the orbits of many of the comets are filled with a circulating band of meteoric stones explains why the earth experiences a star-shower nearly every time it rolls through the orbit of a comet. These stones, or such as reach the earth, are mostly composed of iron, nickel, cobalt, and phosphorus. Some of them are a kind of sandstone. When the meteorites strike our atmosphere, with a velocity infinitely greater than the rush of missiles ejected by human artillery, the friction of the air sets fire to them, and ere they have penetrated in a vertical direction as much as twenty or thirty miles the intense heat usually bursts them into powder. If they contain any combustible substance it ignites, so that few ever find their way unbroken to the earth. Those that do reach the earth fall in an intensely heated state.

An Irish surgeon who had couched a cataract and restored the sight of a poor woman, in Dublin, called together his professional brethren, declaring that he had discovered a phenomenon in optics. He stated to them that the sight of his patient was so perfectly restored that she could see to thread the smallest needle, but that when he presented her with a book "she was not capable of distinguishing one letter from another." This very singular case excited the ingenuity of all the gentlemen present, and various solutions were offered. Doubt crowded on doubt, and the problem grew darker from every explanation, when at length a servant in attendance suggested that perhaps the woman had never learned to read! And so it was!

A lank-looking young man recently entered a bank in one of the Eastern States, and loitered about for some time, as if "waiting for an opportunity." The eye of the cashier was upon him; but at length he sidled up to the counter, and said, "Is there any way a fellow can find out if any body has any money in the bank?" "Oh yes," the cashier blandly answered; "you can ask any one, and he will probably tell you." This did not seem satisfactory to the youth, and he made another effort. "Well," said he, "I suppose I must tell you; I am engaged to a girl, Miss M—— D——, and folks say that she has a hundred dollars in the bank, and I want to know if it is so." "Ah yes, I understand it," said the cashier; "you can ask the girl, and she will probably tell you." At the last accounts the young man had not obtained his marriage-license.

ROMEO (Seward). "Courage, man; the hurt can not be much."
MERCUTIO (Johnson). "No, 'tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a church-door; but 'tis enough, 'twill serve: ask for me to-morrow, and you shall find me a grave man. I am pepper'd, I warrant, for this world:—A plague o' both your Houses."

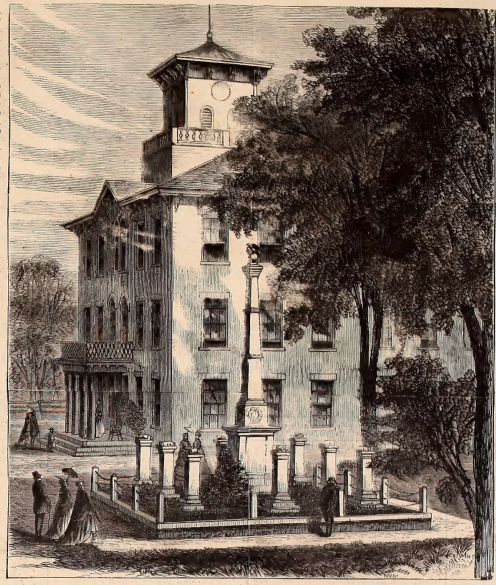
SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

We give on this page an engraving of the "Grant County Soldiers' Monument," lately erected at Lancaster, the county seat of Grant County, Wisconsin, by the patriotic people of the county, to the memory of the Volunteers who fell in the recent war for the Union.

The monument is placed in the northeast corner of the Court-house square; and is of most beautiful design and elegant finish. It is made of the purest white marble, the main shaft is 27 feet high, the sub-base 7 feet, and the base 5 feet square. The first die upon which the inscriptions are wrought is 3½ feet square, surmounted by a cap and cornice and indented by means of raised corners. Over this is the second die upon which the emblems are carved, which is 24 inches square and 30 inches high, from which the column tapers to the top. On the east side of the first square die is a beautiful laurel wreath, within which is inscribed the following:

"Dedicated to the memory of the brave soldiers of Grant County, who fell in defence of universal liberty in the great rebellion of A.D. 1861. This marble contains their names: the many bloody battle-fields of the South contain their ashes: their memory is forever enshrined in the hearts of their countrymen."

Over this, on the second die, are a couple of American flags, a cannon, and an anchor, spanned above by an arc. On the north side of the first die is inscribed the following extract from LINCOLN'S Address, at Gettysburg:



"We here highly resolve that these honored dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Over this, on the second die, is cut the anchor of hope, garlanded with laurel leaves, resting upon the Holy Bible. On the west side the following couplet—a translation of an inscription found on a monument at Thermopylæ—is engraved:

"Go stranger; to your country tell
For her we fought, were buried where we fell."

Over this are four swords and mountings grouped together.

On the south side is this quotation from LINCOLN'S emancipation proclamation: "I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves..... are, and henceforward shall be free."

GRANT COUNTY SOLDIERS' MONUMENT, LANCASTER, WISCONSIN.

And over this, on the second die, beautifully wrought, a pair of broken shackles upheld by a right hand. The column is surmounted by an eagle standing on a globe with outstretched wings holding a wreath in its beak.

The monument is placed within a hollow square formed by eight uniform columns, on which are engraved the names of the honored dead of Grant County, 750 in number. Each column is capped by a cannon. These are surrounded by a fence formed by twelve posts of marble connected with a chain. Outside of this is a gravel-walk and a row of evergreens.

The design of the whole monument is elegant, chaste, and appropriate; and the work is executed in a manner rarely excelled. The cost of the whole was about $7000. It was formally dedicated with appropriate and impressive ceremonies July 4, 1867.

THE WAR OFFICE.

We give on this page an engraving representing the Secretary's room of the War Department at Washington exactly as it appeared on the day of the memorable transfer of the office to Secretary STANTON by General GRANT at the bidding of the United States Senate. The sketch was made by our artist, THEODORE R. DAVIS, on the day that the transfer took place, and General GRANT and Mr. STANTON are represented in the engraving as they appeared at that time.

This apartment of the War Department is known as the "Secretary's Room," and is the one used by Mr. STANTON and General GRANT. Mr. STANTON ordinarily receives his visitors standing at the corner of the high table in the right of the picture. General GRANT, while acting as Secretary of War, usually did his work and conferred with visitors seated at the table near which the great chair is placed.

CIVILIZED FLIES.

A SINGULAR circumstance has lately been reported by scientific men on the subject of the domestic fly of Europe and America. Every body knows that the civilized man is, and always has been, more than a match for the savage; and that before the continually encroaching steps of the Anglo-Saxon and other European races—but more especially the Anglo-Saxon and Scandinavian—the aborigines of the American continent, of the Cape of Good Hope, of Australia and New Zealand, have been gradually disappearing. If two races refuse to amalgamate, the weaker goes to the wall. Civilization is too much for them, and they retire from its presence only to linger a little while in the land of their fathers, conscious of their inferiority, and driven to the grave at last. That this should happen in the case of men is not very surprising, but that it should happen in the case of house-flies is not a little remarkable. Dr. Hunt, a Fellow of the Linnean Society, writes to Dr. J. D. Hooker, from New Zealand, that not only does the British house drive away the Maori or original inhabitant, but that the European house-fly drives away the New Zealand fly. Of two evils New Zealand colonists prefer the lesser, and as the spread of the European insect goes on slowly, they are actually impassive to house-flies in boxes and bottles to their new island stations. Is it that all living things that are much in the society of civilized medium especially so, man in a high state of civilization have their faculties sharpened by the association—sharpened, as it were, by friction, and the necessity of protecting themselves against such formidable foes? Is it that similar animals and insects in all countries, where men are free, are not so highly educated by adverse circumstances, but so acute, clever, and savvy; and that when survivors of their own race are brought into contact with them, the weaker flies before the stronger, as we see it among men?

THE SECRETARY'S ROOM IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

Captain Carleton's Great Story of Frontier Life.

THE MYSTERIOUS HUNTER; Or, The Man of Death.

CHAPTER I.

CAMP LIFE IN CALIFORNIA.

How an unpronounceable, some twenty years ago, fortified the country from the Lakes to the Gulf! How super-civil it turned all preconceived notions of the heavily-accented world, and opened up dazzling vistas of unlimited riches to the universal Yankee race!

Some of these have not suddenly and became almost instantaneously so, while others, more slowly, but surely, reached the golden vasilie, the merchant stored his indigo, the planter his cotton bales, and the miner his nuggets, and sought left his bench—all in thorough digust with the old match—"down east," and with their faces turned toward the Eldorado of the Pacific.

Some went by steamer, via the Isthmus; others around by sail, and about the perils of the latter, old and bodily across those unexplored deserts of the West, for to them it was perhaps, the easiest perils of the three hundred and more men.

It is of such, of perils, and dear reader, let me introduce myself.

Hour Gregory, aged twenty-two—a victim of the "gold fever" of 1849.

That I, of all others, should be attacked by the fever, momentarily expected by my friends, is not to be wondered at. My life seemed to be, as it were, my birthright.

My father and grandfather had been New England farmers, and their lives had been full of perils and hardships, and I was the only child of my father, and he had run away at the early age of twelve, and entered the merchant service as a cabin boy, had been a master of ocean-man, and had been shot down on board the ill-fated Chesapeake, during the attack of the British frigate Lawrence. Thus I grew up, my mind stored day by day with stirring tales of the sea and adventure.

I was not to go alone. New Bedford was full of adventurous youths. My friends were to go as well. Had was my second self, the playmate of my boyhood, and together we had plied the oars in my father's boat, and had shared our naturally coming fire.

Had's father, too, had been a sailor, a captain of a ship engaged in the Havana trade; but he had, at the time of which I write, been dead several years, and illustrate the character of the father and the son, let me relate a brief incident of one of their voyages.

When Had was only nine years old, his father took him with him on a trip to Cuba. There were two children aboard, and he proposed in case of necessity; many miscreants who carried a cutlass or a pair of pistols arms for the crew. The Nancy—that was the name of Captain Pitman's ship—carried a cargo of powders, and muskets and cutlasses for thirty men.

When about two days out from Havana, a suspicious looking craft hove in sight, and gave chase. She was apparently about to be a pirate, and so she proved. Captain Pitman had on board a very valuable cargo, for the owner owned all but a few shares. Unfortunately, it was not a stern chaser, and the pirate was provided with one. She bowed along quite like a proud corner, and was soon nearly athwart the fore-foot of the Nancy, and within pistol-shot.

A flash from the bow-port of the pirate, and a twenty-four pound shot came through the main-rigging of the Nancy. All hope of escape by flight was cut off, and defiance was the only manly course. So the crew of the pirate was covered with men.

But the captain was not to be outdone: but he saw no hopes to save life in any other direction, and with a calm look, grave and deeply appreciative of danger. The two six-pounders were loaded, and the one aft was pointed through the pirate. And then came the entire scene with intense interest, and when the roar of the engines of the pirate's crew ran over the quarterdeck from the bulwarks, it seemed to fire his young blood.

He crept stealthily aft, and, unseen by any of the crew, applied the match to the vent of the cannon. The little six-pounder roared out furiously, startling the entire crew.

Captain Pitman darted aft in a towering passion to see who had presumed to do so, for he was in no such orders, and was overwhelmed with surprise on beholding his little favorite seen dodging in the smoke.

Before the angry parent could reach the erring son, a cry of triumph arose from the deck of the pirate, and great confusion was visible among the enemy.

It was a random shot.

The six-pounder had been loaded with a solid shot, and this had come crashing through the pirate's hull an inch below the water's edge.

The pirate was sinking.

The entire aspect of affairs was changed; hope sprang up in the breasts of all on board the Nancy. The captain secured all at once endured with marvelous spirits. And after gun was discharged, one most happily carrying away the pirate's fore-topmast, and essentially disabling her speed. As the pirate sprang up, and the Nancy crowded on more sail, and now the pirate was left behind out of sight, and in half an hour darkness fell, and what became of the pirate vessel none on board the Nancy ever knew.

Had's spunk had saved the ship, and he was daring the balance of the voyage a great pet with all on board.

This same Had was to go with me to the land of gold. We considered that our arrangements, mutual as failure to our friends, and were as rosie to the new Eldorado.

CHAPTER II.

LIFE IN SAN FRANCISCO.

In due course of time we reached this young and growing frontier city; a city that was to us the limit of civilization, and the initial point of our journey across the seemingly illimitable prairies of the Far West.

We attached ourselves to a train that was to start in three days. It was to contain fifty souls and ten wagons, each vehicle provided with a team. There were several females and children in the party, and altogether we looked as well equipped for life.

Had and I had but little "baggage;" indeed a stout and somewhat capacious carpet sack contained, and pistol stock; and for the transportation of this we arranged with the owner of a wagon for twenty-five dollars in gold.

In our personal outfit we were, perhaps, somewhat extravagant; but the reader must not forget our comparative youth and dazzling prospects. He will also bear in mind that we were determined to combine pleasure with profit.

We bought a regular hunter's garb, consisting of hunting shirts, leggins, striped cotton undershirts, fine buckles, shouldered felt hats with low crowns, stout boots, and brass spurs. In dress we were now alike in two pens, and, being about the same size, we bore a striking resemblance to each other.

We were emphatically "armed to the teeth." In the belt we carried a pair of Colts revolvers, and in our shoulders: in our belts, old-fashioned bowie-knives; each commanded a rifle completed the armament. We had also flasks and pouches, canteens and haversacks.

We thought we had made good bargains in purchasing our horses; mine was a powerful bay, Had's a dark iron-gray. They were both American horses, stout, of good proportions, and possessed considerable speed. Our saddles and bridles were after the Mexican style, quite serviceable, and richly ornamented.

We were really and truly about to start on the next morning at day-break.

Independence we, as I have stated, a sort of smallroom city. Like Josiah's gourd, it had sprung up in a night.

Its population was a floating one, and composed of the most heterogeneous material; and, after the manner of all frontier towns, it abounded in drinking-saloons and gambling-resorts.

The evening prior to our departure was oppressively sultry, and the streets were full of people. Had and I sat our cigars and started for a stroll.

Upon our entrance we were attracted to a scene under a little clump of trees in front of a "canvas" drinking-saloon. A well-dressed man and a rough-looking fellow were seated, and apparently in the act of having a game of cards. They were both engaged in earnest conversation, and the former, a handsome, portly, middle-aged man, with a fine head of gray hair, and a large nose, possessed a brilliant eye, which was very observant. His partner was a Mexican. There was no mistaking their close-cut, sharp, peculiar features, their dark, swarthy faces, their white, glaring teeth, that dress-up, yellow, peppery eye. He wore a large straw sombrero over his head, a medium; but every movement and word indicated the ruffianism and treachery of the half-breed Mexican. He was, beyond doubt, every inch a knave, and even more to be dreaded than a well-looking companion.

The two were Strength and Craft—always formidable when combined.

These two worthies appeared to own the establishment, and to be in command of the numerous and ferocious specimens to entice by-standers and passers-by to try their fortune in a game of hazard. They were not too successful, for the spirit of gaming ran high. Here we met Had, the old Colts revolver, and the bowie, his most powerful of wealth? If wealth were to be gained by the use of the knife, by close quarters, he reasoned, and were fleeced of what they had, instead of gaining by it.

"Hold on!" whispered Had into my ear. "This seems to be a gambling-saloon, and I'll bet that the young fellow has just lost fifty dollars. What's precious to all of our fortunes is gone."

He guessed at the table. A half dozen wood torches flaming in the night-air, a big glass case was upon it, and a good many-player. His father had requested it to be kept for him, for the Spaniards and Indians are famous for their proficiency in all such games, and had become quite a gambler.

As we passed at the table, the heavy-whiskered desperado glanced at us from beneath his shaggy brows, and I thought I beheld a sudden furtive gleam in his eye. That moment I felt a chill.

"He'll try that luck next!" said he, in a heavy gruff voice, and with a strong Spanish accent.

Of a storm—a splendid diapason bass.

The young fellow looked up at the sound, did not seem inclined to indulge any further in the play, all of which he had manifestly carried on under false pass for the gambler.

"Come, boys!" continued the fellow, "faint heart never wins a fair lady, we know. Hyer's ser'eal piles o' yaller boys a waitin' for yer pockets. Say, stranger, you've got my face. I'll bet you fifty dollars, boy!"

This last remark was addressed to Had, who instantly replied, in a manner much to my surprise:

Where do you s'pose a poor devil like me could raise half that sum? Say ten dollars, and I don't mind."

"Small pertaters, boy!" sneered the bully, who was a little nettled at the suspicious many-frends. Ten dollars hain't worth counters' skeerce: but as trade's gettin' a leetle dull, we'll try ye on ten d'yer ax?"

"All right. Proceed," replied Had.

The cards were cut and the game was quickly played—the golden eagle going to increase the piles on the shirts.

"He! he!" laughed the whiskeranado. "Got any more ten spot handy?"

"Stumped," replied Had, with a suggestive shrug, "unless you will put up fifty dollars against my diamond ring."

"Hough! the ring's too small for me," growled the bully.

But not for me, Tom Landers," interrupted his companion, the crafty, smooth-tongued Mexican. "Caramba! I will play for it, if you please."

"Crack ahead, then!" growled the brutal Tom Landers. "I don't play for no such penny-ante as that. If ye wabt to do it, Senor Guaymas, I hain't nothin' ter say."

The ring, with a cluster of several diamonds, was of a valuable size. It had been presented to Had's father years before by a rich Cuban planter, and the sparkling brilliants were of precious stones had stirred up the avarice of the Mexican gambler.

The stranger rose, and Had's fellow were put up.

The cards were cut—the game played swiftly. My heart was the winner.

"Stop now, Had," said I. "Let's go."

"Caramba!" muttered Senor Guaymas, with a most seductive smile: "surely you will not leave fortune just as she comes to you. There is more gold to be won!"

"Certainly," answered Had, with a merry laugh. "We've found a rich gold mine. Let us work it."

Fifty dollars against fifty dollars. Again Had is the winner. His blood is rising. I see the flush on his cheek, and know that the excitement which ever attends gaming is thrilling his nerves.

"Cover up handsomely—if you please."

"Of course," was the reply.

Another quick game. Astounding luck! Had sweeps the board.

"Blest ye!" growled Tom Landers, getting up, and displaying his mammoth proportions. "This hyar's not for me stopped."

Then the two monte-dealers held a short consultation; they were both getting nervous. Two hundred dollars lost in twenty minutes!

The crowd gradually increased: they knew these two bankers to be a precious pair of knaves—knaves who fleeced their victims by the coarse hoarse. They are seldom beaten; yet the youth scarcely out of his teens was winning their gold rapidly.

There is sport ahead, reasons the crowd.

"Cover up handsomely!" mocked Hal, lighting a fresh cigar as he spoke.

Senor Guaymas and Tom Landers were still consulting. Two hundred dollars was all they had left. They hesitated. Suppose they lost! Their confidence in the bank was broken; if they declined to play, they were to be fleeced of their money already lost—that was certain. They muttered: "We cover the two hundred."

The fascinating game was now progressed. A yell from the crowd announced the result.

The bank is broken!

The crowd spoke the truth, for my chum was the possessor of four hundred dollars in gold. There was not a quarter eagle left upon the table. I was amazed.

Senor Guaymas was followed in such quick time by Tom Landers's face was in a tempest of passion, and his eyes had brooded over the counter like demons. The bowie-knife was now, as a horned, but too politic to show it.

"Cover up, Senor Guaymas!"

How fascinatingly Had asked that! It stung Senor Guaymas to the quick, for I saw his lip quiver and his eye gleam. It was the last hair that broke the camel's back. He hesitated, then replied, with an expression of malice once his thin, sallow features, that I never can forget:

I regretted now that Had had pushed matters so far with Senor Guaymas as to passionate and so vindictive. A street fight was by no means desirable, especially with such desperadoes as these two gamblers. We had not take much on the frontier to bring blows and blood.

Suddenly Senor Guaymas decided; he threw his hand into the inner breast pocket. I had seen motions before: the wretch was about to draw a pistol. Quick as thought I drew my revolver in such a position that I could use it on the instant, and watched the Mexican.

My suspicions were at fault. I did the rascal injustice. He threw out a roll of notes, and placed a diamond-studded brooch upon the table. It was superb: a splendid lady's head, with a fine bust in rubies and pearls.

"That brooch is worth double your pile," said the Mexican, glancing swiftly over the crowd. "Will you cover it? I warrant it is worth more."

"More jewelry," laughed Hal. "Certainly I'll cover it."

The game went on, and, terrible fatality! the banker lost, and the diamond brooch was my friend's.

"El demonio! what accursed luck!" hissed the Mexican between his clinched, tiger-like teeth. His face grew livid.

"Cover the whole pile now—gold, watch, ring, and brooch I" continued Hal, with frigid coolness.

"No, curse you," roared the baffled man, unable to control his feelings. "I've nothing left. You've ruined me!"

My chum bit off the end of his cigar, and threw it down. Then a peculiar twinkle in his eye. He leaned over the table and said,

"What will you wad I'll do."

"What?"

"Your fair wife!"

The Mexican started back aghast. Then his black eyes gleamed hideously and in a frenzied tone he said:

"Done, by all the saints!"

"No, no!" I interposed, laying my hand on my chum's shoulder. "For Heaven's sake, stop! this has gone far enough already. Don't carry it further."

I was horrified at the proposition, and dreaded the bloody scene that was certain to follow. Had was in no mood to listen to my objections, but pushed away my hand rather unceremoniously, and replied,

"Humph! we must finish the contest in good style. If the scoundrel wants my pretty, he's welcome to get it. I'm sure I can lift his with marvelous grace. Come, man the ante, and let's play on!"

The excitement was at a white heat: the crowd, which had increased to a full score, jostled and swayed to and fro in a tremor of expectation.

Senor Guaymas was livid and jaunty: he threw down the cards, which were hastily cut, and the game proceeded. All held their breaths and strained their eyes.

Cards! lost, lost!" greeted the unfortunate Mexican, striving to steady himself at the table as the crowd yelled and jeered at his terrible luck. "Satanas take you and your tricks! You are in league with the Evil One. I am undone: take the stakes!"

"No, by hokey! nothin' o' that sort hyar," roared Tom Landers, in a voice like a bull. "My partner hain't a goin' ter be scalped by no such leetle wiffler as you pup!" A blow sends by my friends, and I'm not your'er play false to 'em now."

The bully pushed forward and drew his mammoth proportions up to their full height: his face was red with anger and strong whisky. The crowd drew back a little, apparently awed somewhat by the defiant and formidable aspect of the fierce Bergerode.

Had leaped square upon the table and glanced over the crowd. He saw with a score of excited faces upturned; he saw the gleam of fiery flashing eyes; he heard the murderous in pauses.

"Say, men!" he cried, in a clear, calm voice. "You have watched the game. Did I win it fairly?"

"Yes, yes!" yelled the crowd.

"Is the diamond brooch fairly mine?"

"Yours, yours!" poured a score of throats.

"Then, by St. Gerard, I'll have it!" said my chum, drawing his formidable bowie. "Down with your hands on that table, Senor Guaymas."

The Mexican grew pale, and his knees smote together: he seemed in an aspect of terror that was appalling; he stood rooted to the ground.

Click! went the cocking of a revolver. Tom Landers had drawn his six-shooter and thrust it toward Had. His finger was upon a pistol-lock, and his knife in his right hand, and eyed the bully. I leaped upon the table, holding my Colt ready, with finger on the trigger, and stood by my chum's side.

"Now, Tom Landers, you cowardly cut-throat!" I said, with as much coolness as I could command. "I will be your match."

There was a rustle in the crowd, and the next instant a tall, fine-looking trapper, carrying in his hands an enormous rifle, emerged from the crowd, and confronted the bully of Tom Landers. The latter threw his rifle to a level, and drew a bead upon the bully.

"Shoot if you dare, you cowardly cut-throat!" I said, with as much coolness as I could, command. "I will be your match."

There was a rustle in the crowd, and the next instant a tall, fine-looking trapper, carrying in his hands an enormous rifle, emerged from the crowd, and confronted the bully of Tom Landers. The latter threw his rifle to a level, and drew a bead upon the bully.

"Shoot if you dare, you cowardly cut-throat!" I said, with as much coolness as I could, command. "I will be your match."

The balance of this exciting story is continued in No. 14 of the FIRESIDE COMPANION, issued on Friday of this week. Also, and for sale by all News Dealers in the United States and Canada, and mailed from the office of the FIRESIDE COMPANION, at 137 William Street, New York.

TERMS OF THE FIRESIDE COMPANION.

One Copy, one year, 52 No.s.....	$1.00
Three " " "	2.50
Nine " " "	5.00

GEORGE MUNRO & CO.,
137 William Street, New York.
Communications, Postmasters, and Subscribers.

READ THIS. HARPER'S BAZAR, WEEKLY, or MAGAZINE FOR ONE YEAR, and a SUPERB ISAAC REED & SON GOLD PEN AND HOLDER, FOR $5 00. The Price of this PEN AND CASE is $2 50, and each Pen is WARRANTED. Send for a Circular.

By special arrangement with Harper & Brothers, we are able to make the above liberal offer.

G. W. REED & BRO.,
266 Broadway, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, any one can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
36 Cortlandt Street, New York.

CHASE'S IMPROVED DOLLAR MICROSCOPE. Adapted to all trades and professions. Agents wanted. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1, with directions. Address O. N. CHASE, 81 Washington St., Boston. FOWLER & WELLS, New York City.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.
D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.
Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

BARD & BROTHERS,
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES, SILVER, RUBBER, and GOLD-PLATED TELESCOPIC PEN-CASES, POCKET-BOOKS, &c.
JAMES D. BARD, Agent,
No. 32 Maiden Lane, New York.

TRADE MARK.
GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of T. Y. KELLEY & CO., 30 Vesey St., New York. We have supplying families throughout the country with TEAS, warranted in all cases perfectly pure as they purchase their Teas from the importers, thus saving to them five or six per cent. profit. Clubs may be formed in any city or town, by any person, male or female, and those clubs we will make the Purveyor to furnish them Teas and Coffees for their own use free of charge; to those clubs and their patrons, on each order they send us. On application, we send, by mail, circulars containing terms for all of our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms to Agents in detail.

We forward all goods, based on delivery, by the Express Company, and members of the Club can file with the Express Company charges equally among themselves.

Finest Oolong (black), 50, 60, 80, & $1 00 best.
Mixed (green and black), 60, 70, 80, 90, & $1 00 best.
Young Hyson (green), 60, 70, 80, 90, & $1 00, $1 10, & $1 25.
Imperial (green), 80, $1 00, & $1 25.
English Breakfast (black), 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20.
Japan, 80, & $1 00, $1 25.
Gunpowder, $1 25, $1 50.

We import a very superior quality of Kiangsi Oolong and Mixed Young Hyson Teas, put up in original Chinese packages, which we sell at $1 00 the Oolong and $1 00 the Young Hyson, per piece.

Ground Coffee, 20, 25, 30c. per pound. Best Old Government Java, ground, 40c.

All goods put up by us bear our trade mark, and no others are genuine. Address all orders to

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of
T. Y. KELLEY & CO., 30 Vesey Street,
P. O. Box 974. NEW YORK.

LAMB KNITTING MACHINES,

NEW YORK OFFICE AT
BARTLETT'S MACHINE and NEEDLE DEPOT,
No. 569 BROADWAY. SEND FOR CIRCULARS.

HOLIDAY JOURNAL—FREE.

16 LARGE PAGES of Parlor Plays, Magic Sports, 30 Games, Jokes, Recitations, Puzzles, SENT FREE. Address ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples sent for 25 cents. A. ELLAM, Springfield, Vt.

HOVEY & CO.'S Illustrated Guide to the Flower and Vegetable Garden, for 1868, is now ready, containing 150 pages, large type, illustrated with 50 new and beautiful engravings, and will be mailed to all who remit 25 cents, which will fall deductions of nearly 300 Varieties of Flower and Vegetable Seeds, accompanied with concise practical directions for their cultivation and treatment, and prices of Roots. Many thousand applicants on the receipt of 25 cents. Address, HOVEY & CO., 53 North Market Street, Boston.

CURES! CURES! One application will cure your hair instantly, and last six months, and but one bottle in every case, or money refunded. Sent by mail, postage paid, for $1 00 per bottle, or three for $2. Address M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address on receipt of 20 cents by
W. HEPBURNE, 109 Nassau St., New York.

$50 a Week for Agents. Local or Travelers. No capital required. Address MEDIA & Co., 209 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS. LLOYD'S $100,000 REWARDING DOUBLE MAPS OF RUSSIA AND MEXICO are just out; only 50c.; 2,000,000 names on them. "HOW TO CANVASS WELL" pamphlet and terms $20 00 a day sure.
J. T. LLOYD, No. 33 Cortlandt St., New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., Removed from 42 to 37 Nassau St., Opposite the Post-office.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are manufactured at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are well and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they are fully warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For the coming $15 00 Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered to the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite the P. O. (up stairs).

BAKER'S CHOCOLATE AND COCOA
PARIS EXPOSITION, 1867.
W. BAKER & CO'S
and
VANILLA CHOCOLATE
PREPARED COCOA,
BROMA,

Leaf, Flower and Fruit of the Cocoa with a perfect Cocoa, &c.

Shells, Cracked

THESE Manufactures, to which FIRST PREMIUMS have been awarded by the entire SYSTEMS and PAIRS of the UNITED STATES and the PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1867, are an excellent diet for INVALIDS and PERSONS in health, and are used in preference to any other, by the previous enjoyment of constant upon the use of these preparations, by the most eminent physicians.

For sale by the principal Grocers in the United States.

W. BAKER & CO.,
Dorchester, Mass.

The Best are the Cheapest.

MASON & HAMLIN, having been awarded a GRAND FIRST PRIZE MEDAL, for the Superiority of their Cabinet Organs at the Paris Exposition, in competition with the best makers of instruments of this class from all countries, and having been extensively awarded First Prizes Medals at the most important Industrial Exhibitions for a series of years, with scarcely any exceptions, have REARRANGED TO PLACE THEIR INSTRUMENTS IN COMPETITION AT HOME with the best foreign manufactures, and the fact that the public may not receive wrong impressions from announcements of previous awards by other makers. Many celebrated European Organists have added their testimony to that of the great majority of the most eminent musicians of this country to the overwhelming superiority of the Mason & Hamlin Cabinet Organs. Prices, $75 to $600 and upward, each; sold for CASH or monthly payments, or rented, with a view of greatly inferior instruments. Circulars with full particulars sent by mail.

Warerooms,—154 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.
596 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

ESSAYS FOR YOUNG MEN on Errors and Abuses incident to Youth and Early Manhood, sent free of charge. Address, HOWARD ASSOCIATION, Box E, Philadelphia, Pa.

A GREAT OFFER FOR THE HOLIDAYS. Robbins Warner & Co., No. 481 Broadway, New York, dispose of 50 Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of six superior makers, at low prices, for CASH, or small hire, one fifth cash, and the balance in monthly installments for rent, and such money applied if purchased. The above offer will be continued during this month.

AMATEUR CULTIVATOR'S GUIDE
FOR
Kitchen and Flower Garden.
NOW READY.

A DESCRIPTIVE WORK of 148 pages, fully illustrated with a beautiful colored plate and 100 engravings, containing a list of over 2,500 varieties of Flower and Vegetable Seeds; also, 150 varieties of the choicest French Hybrid Gladiolus. All the novelties both of the Flower and Vegetable, for 1868, will be found described in the above work.

The following testimonials are unsolicited by us, and can be multiplied to hundreds:—

From Mr. John Madeira, Woodcrypt, Pa.:—"Your Germs came safe, and I assure you much; it is the best I ever saw."

From Mr. Wm. Bartlett, East Sanbornton, Belknap Co., N. H.:—"It is with great satisfaction and pleasure I have ordered seeds from your house. I have ordered it highly. Its pages are full of valuable information, reliable, plain and practical, and attractively covered—just what every seed customer wants."

From Prof. Lewis Knapp, Clinton College, Yonkers, N. Y., March 2, 1867.—"It is without exception the best gardening book, and the only one which I have seen, for amateurs especially."

From Rev. Jos. B. W. Miller, Rockaster, Randolph Co., Ind.—"I have received your Germs for the Flower and Kitchen Garden, for which you have my sincere thanks. It is very valuable, and all who write to call-customers. But praise from me is needless: it must recommend itself to any one."

From Mr. R. G. Shindig, Greenville, S. C., March 11, 1867.—"Thanks for your Amateur's Guide. It is indeed pleased, useful, and instructive."

Tastefully bound in cloth, three colored plates, price, 25 cents; in cloth, on paper covers, postpaid, 50 cts. Address, WASHBURN & CO., Horticultural Hall, Boston, Mass.

THE CHRISTIAN, 60 CENTS,

A large, five, 8-page Monthly Religious and Family paper, containing facts, incidents, tales, sketches, music, poetry, true stories, pictures, reading for young, old, saints, sinners, men and all. No controversy, controversy, politics, puffs, pills, or patent medicines. 60 cts. a year; 10 cts. and 5 cts. For Sunday Schools, 50 copies $4. Send 10 cts. for 3 specimens before you forget it. Vol. III. began Jan. 1. 1868 now ready. Five Tracts for $1. Address H. L. HASTINGS, Tract Depository, 13 Lindall-Street, BOSTON, Mass.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make all kinds of Essences, Extracts, Perfumery, Toilet Articles, Cosmetics, Candies, Wines, Cordials, Soaps, Dyes, and hundreds of other articles in daily demand. Easily made, and sold at large profits. Sent postpaid for 25 cents, by O. A. ROORBACH, No. 122 Nassau St., N. Y.

GOLDEN HILL SEMINARY for YOUNG LADIES, at Bridgeport, Conn. Address, Miss EMILY NOBLE.

PHOTOGRAPHS—All kinds. Samples, 25c. Address A. Seymour & Co., Box 37, Station A, New York.

$25 for 1798 Cent. Coins wanted; collections bought; Book describing Coins paid for cents, 20 cents; Monthly Coin and Stamp Magazine, 15 cents; 81 yearly; History of Cents, 25 cents. Coin, $1 00. Mason Brothers, No. 624 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
HAVE JUST RECEIVED
TWO FULL CARGOES
OF THE
FINEST NEW CROP TEAS
22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,
12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Young Hyson Teas from the Merchants of China, which are unrivaled for freshness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 per lb.
JAPAN (No. 2), 60c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 25, best $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee. We sell at 35c. per lb., and warrant it to give perfect satisfaction.
Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

The large system of supplying Clubs, by which the consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and send it to us. We will then put up the small, not full, parcels in proper packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution among the members, or exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation to the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $50, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We will not sell a package of Tea or Coffee for less than $50.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

TWO PATHS IN WOMANHOOD—with Engraved Illustrations. For effects, see ANNUAL OF PHRENOLOGY AND PHYSIOGNOMY, 1868. Now ready. 25 cents. Sent by return post, by S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

"MAY I MARRY MY COUSIN?" Read ANNUAL OF PHRENOLOGY AND PHYSIOGNOMY for 1868. Only 25 cents. Newsmen have it. S. R. WELLS, New York.

"A MAN'S COUSIN." Read ANNUAL OF PHRENOLOGY AND PHYSIOGNOMY for 1868. Only 25 cents. Newsmen have it. S. R. WELLS, New York.

INDISPENSABLE. THE NEW HAND-BOOK. How to Write, How to Talk, How to Behave, and How to do Business. By Prof. JOS. H. SEARS, Brooklyn, New York. Agents wanted.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the country."

Harper's Magazine.
FEBRUARY, 1868.

CONTENTS:

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR. (Frank Payne.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—War Critics—Hall at Charlsburg—Bloody Lane.—Last Offices of Friendship.—View from my Tent.—Confederate Prisoners.—Mourning.—The dead Horse.—Writing House on Book Soldiers.

THE CEDAR.

A SUMMER ON THE PLAINS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Indian Village.—The Coach in the Storm.—Indian Pony in Spring.—Indian Pony Skeleton.—Indian Pony Tracks.—Indian Implements.—Indian Grave.—Rattlesnake.—Camp Supper.—Indian Fire.—How Race.—The Counting Camp.—The Scalp-Lock.—Cheyenne Beauty.

THE WOMAN'S KINGDOM: A LOVE STORY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bedtime.—In the Free Seats.—Theseus and Ariadne.

THE ELDER'S WIFE.

JOHN ALBION ANDREW OF MASSACHUSETTS. With a Portrait.

MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS.

THE PORCH.

A LITTLE LEAVEN.

MARY NEALEY.

DERRICK HALSEY.

THE BANKRUPT'S WIFE.

FOUND OUT.

VALENTINE'S BIRTHDAY.

WARFARE OF MODERN RELIGIOUS THOUGHT.

EDITOR'S LITERARY CHAIR.

ETIQUETTE.

A PLEASANT OMBRE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

NEW BOOKS.

In the Number for JANUARY was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by DORAN MEADOWS CRAIK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It merits precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading.—Boston Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.
AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the issue of "The Woodstock," a Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Independent.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of h political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Literature, and Art.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Crease," a Novel, by AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all fashionable topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albany Argus.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

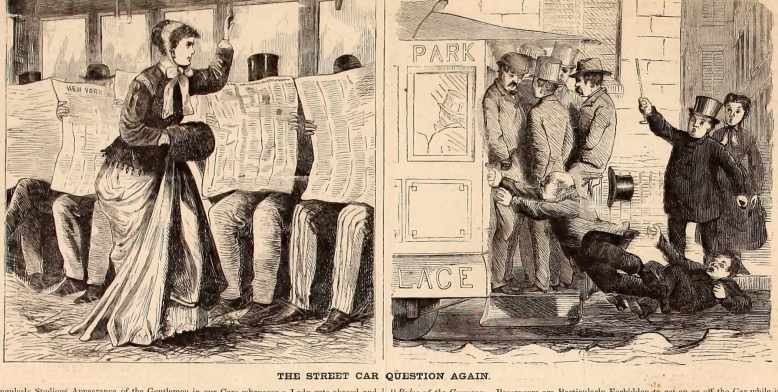
An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR, will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, or one remittance; or, six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for SIX Months, will be furnished for $2 50 each, by express, free of expense, or sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volume of the WEEKLY, each containing the Numbers for One Year, will be furnished for $6 00, the right paid by the Publishers.

Back Numbers can be sent to the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 40 cents a year, payable invariably quarterly, and commencing with the time of subscription. Subscriptions from Canada must include the United States postage, which is 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, which must be paid at the office of reception.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. This notice is stamped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to receive a receipt for remittance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and new address must be given.



In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, 25 cents per line—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

THE STREET CAR QUESTION AGAIN.

Singularly Studious Appearance of the Gentlemen in our Cars whenever a Lady gets aboard and there are no Vacant Seats.

"Rules of the Company. Passengers are Particularly Forbidden to get on or off the Car while it is in Motion. The Company will not hold itself Responsible," &c., &c.

Our Entire Stock

IS NOW OFFERED AT

REDUCED PRICES,

in view of our REMOVAL up town in the Spring.

WHITE CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 143 pieces, $30.

PLATED WARE FROM ROGERS, SMITH & CO.

GOLD-BRIDE TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $21.

DECORATED TEA SETS, $15.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 470 Broadway, 4 doors below Broome Street.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Square, & Upright Piano-Fortes,

were awarded at the Paris Exposition the First Grand Prize, the Legion of Honor and a Grand Gold Medal, making 43 First Premiums during the past 44 years.

WAREROOMS, No. 652 BROADWAY.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.

Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cts.; six do., $5.00, postage 25 cts.; twelve do., $9.00, postage 42 cts. Sold by all druggists.

TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

WANTED, AGENTS,

$75 to $200 per month, in every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner.

Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURG, PA., or BOSTON, MASS.

Caution.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical machine manufactured.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.

New Designs, $1 50 postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, ARCHITECT, 191 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

GOLD PENS.

Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact cash wholesale prices. All goods warranted. Remitting at 56 cents each by mail. Manufactory 15 Maiden Lane. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

LOOK! LOOK! LOOK!

NO MORE BOOKS BURNED BY CARELESS USE WITH A SPIRIT-LAMP.

MILLER & WATSON'S

PATENT BOOK CLAMP

Saves Time, Money & Trouble. Recommended by all Book Sellers.

Sent to any P. O. Address in the United States on receipt of 50 cts.

Miller & Watson,

SOLE MANUFACTURERS,

311 Centre St., N. Y. City.

PATENT OFFICES.

Inventors who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for over Twenty Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A Pamphlet containing full instructions to inventors, is sent gratis.

☞ A handsome Bound Volume, containing 150 Mechanical Engravings, and the United States Census by Counties, with Hints and Receipts for Mechanics, mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address

MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

NOTICE.

TO

"ALL MEN WHO USE PLANE IRONS."

We hereby authorize all "HARDWARE DEALERS" to allow their customers to try our "CLOVER-LEAF PLANE IRONS," and, IF IMPERFECTLY SUITED, take them back, refund price paid, and charge irons over to us.

WE WANT MECHANICS AND DEALERS TO ADD NO RISK IN BUYING OUR PLANE IRONS.

See that our

TRADE MARK

Is on each Iron.

REYNOLDS, BARBER & CO.,

STEEL TEMPERING WORKS,

AUBURN, N. Y.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,

And others should send to all parts of the United tates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

Important to Farmers.

A HORSE DOCTOR FREE.

The attention of farmers, and of all owners of horses and Cattle, is called to the fact that the old established weekly newspaper, "WILKES' SPIRIT OF THE TIMES," employs upon its staff Coleman a celebrated Veterinary Professor, whose duty it is to answer all questions relating to sick or injured horses and cattle that may be sent to the paper by mail. The replies of the Professor to these questions appear in the next number of the paper, and are always accompanied by a prescription, thus enabling every body to ascertain for his noble self treatment, and to avail themselves of the remedy. These answers and prescriptions are given free to whoever may ask for them, whether a subscriber to the paper or not. So that the whole cost of the great specialty is the price of the letter stating the complaint and the price of the number of The Spirit. Many remarkable cures of valuable animals have been made through the medium of this department. Owners of horses or cattle are therefore advised to go to any news-stand and buy a copy of the paper, that they may examine this important feature for themselves. The subscription price of "THE SPIRIT," which is a high-class sporting journal of forty years' standing, is $5 a year.

Address

EDITOR WILKES' SPIRIT,

201 William Street, New York.

$25 PER DAY. Agents wanted in every city to sell Patent Porcelain-lined Gaslight Reflectors, for store windows. Excels all others. Never tarnishes nor grows dull. Four lights equal to any other eight lights. For further particulars, address

GREAT AMERICAN REFLECTOR COMPANY,

Office, 313 and 314 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just ready:

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL:

OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Portraits. New Edition. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS: From the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce. With a full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, LL.D., D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Portraits. Four Vols., 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

THE HUGUENOTS: Their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. With an Appendix relating to the Huguenots in America. Crown 8vo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled, $1 75.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Price.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "R. T. BARRETT'S LION COFFEE." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a ONE DOLLAR GREENBACK." For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.

R. T. BARRETT,

Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines

MADE PERFECT BY THE USE OF THE

Bruen Manufacturing Co.'s New Cloth Plate.

By substituting this Plate for the old one, three distinct and different stitches can be made, viz., the Lock, Double-Loop Elastic (or so-called Grover & Baker), and the newly-patented Three-Thread Embroidery Stitch.

Price of Plate, $10 00.

The Bruen Manufacturing Co.,

478 Broadway, New-York.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Ringworm.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.

WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

DOLLAR & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum goods, 77 John St., near Nassau, and 602 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Holders put to order and repaired. All goods warranted. Wholesale and Retail. Send for price list or retail circular. Letter-Box 5546.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

Upham's Fresh Meat Cure for Consumption and Bronchial Affections, is prescribed and recommended by Physicians all over the country, and is performing more cures than all other remedies combined. A trial will convince the most skeptical. $1 a bottle; six for $5. Sent by Express. Circulars free. Sold by S. C. UPHAM, 28 South Eighth St., Philada., and all Druggists.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

Fifty per cent. or more saved on Dry Goods of every description. Every package $1. Send for descriptive circular. S. SIMONDS & CO., 126 Chambers St., N.Y.

J. C. HULL'S SON, New York.

BAY RUM SOAP

Over 100 Styles Toilet Soaps. NONE BETTER IMPORTED.

DRUNKARD, STOP!

C. C. BEERS, M.D., Boston, has cured 10,000 Inebriates. Judge Russell, Collector of Customs, writes: "I know your practice is successful." It is harmless. Can be given secretly. Send stamp for Circular.

$20. Gold Coin. $20.

The new business cards, to imitate $20 gold pieces. Ornamental and useful, and the best advertising medium, as every body retains them. Manufactured by W. T. & J. MERSEREAU, 62 Duane Street.

PRINCE & COS. AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.

Forty thousand are now in use

BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 580.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

"PLEASE GIVE ME A PENNY, SIR!"—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"PLEASE GIVE ME A PENNY, SIR!"

In one of his pleasant letters to the Christian Times of London, Rev. NEWMAN HALL speaks in terms of the highest praise of what might be called "the organized charities" of New York, and more particularly of the various institutions of this city which have for their main object the care, support, and rescue from a life of crime and shame, of our "forty thousand city arabs," as he enumerates and designates the young vagrants and beggars of bold scars who live in the metropolis. The organized charities of New York have been praised by many others besides Mr. HALL; there is no doubt, given in the coldest of hearts and most uncharitable of minds, that they are practical and effective means of distributing charity and doing good; but there is also vast room for the judicious bestowal of unorganized, individual charity. Of special charities there can not be any too much, even if some of them be unwisely administered, nor can those who have the means to bestow go far wrong in giving freely in a general way. Especially is this the case at this time—during the present unusually hard winter, when so many worthy and industrious-disposed persons are, by the present commercial and industrial embarrassments, thrown out of employment; it is estimated that from 10,000 to 15,000 working men and women of this city have been discharged from regular employment since the opening of winter, and in the proportion in other cities and States is not less. Many of these must necessarily seek relief at the various charitable institutions; the vast majority, however, must depend on the general charity of the public. The public do not need to be reminded that applicants want exists, for needy applicants hourly asking for alms reminds them only too forcibly and unpleasantly of it, and it is to be hoped that they do not need urging to give freely, but perhaps the gentle reminder which we give in the beautiful picture on the preceding page will not be out of place at this time, when the need of charity is so great, and when the extravagance of our people in the pursuit of vain and ethereal pleasures is so unreasonable.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1868.

THE SITUATION.

AMIDST the loud shout of reactionary and partisan exultation which saluted the success of last November, we were told that now the State of New York at least could see daybreak, and that now the party of economy and public virtue and true principles of government having come into power in the lower House of the Legislature, the world could see what we should see. But before the first month of the session has expired a member of the majority is reported in the debates of the Assembly as saying, "We thought that any rich and powerful corporation could overcome any committee of the House."

What a statement is here of the character of the Legislature! That it was made by a Democrat is of no importance. It is a subject of the greatest interest to every citizen of every party. If the majority of the members of the Legislature has become a jest even to themselves, it is time for thoughtful men to devise a remedy for the disease. Yet we do not believe there is any royal road to the reform, nor that the difficulty can be removed by law.

There is an evident political demoralization observable upon every side, which is due in no great part to the enormous and constant sophistication of the last twenty years upon the subject of politics. We were politically obliged to call wrong right; to chaffer, and haggle, and explain with their consciences—and with the inevitable result. The political character of the whole country was morally weakened, and we are now paying the moral as the war was the material penalty. We are apt stoutly to deny any relation of politics to morality, but the truth imperatively asserts itself; and he is a very insufficient statesman who does not consider it.

We have elsewhere spoken of the education of freedmen. If any thing were clear when the war ended, it was our duty and interest toward them: a duty that might be overdone, but was not doubtful. The fact is undoubted. But the fact of emancipation, so beneficent and sublime in itself, has undoubtedly been misinterpreted. It was but right, in justice, long and cruelly delayed, and it seemed to imply a further elevation. But we have probably accepted the aspect of the act for the intention. For it was extravagant to suppose that a nation which had so long confused its conscience upon the subject could at once rise to such a height. And it did not. Those who supposed it possible were mistaken. Those who have thought that a policy founded upon the view of emancipation as a moral regeneration of the country would be warmly sustained have deceived themselves. The completion of emancipation is due to the same national necessity that began it; and they confuse their minds who persist in regarding it as a great moral victory.

That it will ultimately prove to be so is unquestionable. It will at length be seen by us that honesty is the best policy, and that an immoral social system is not expedient, but costs more than it comes to. Nor are we now complaining that nations delay reforms which morality demands until the demand is emphasized by self-interest. We are only looking for some explanation of the evident and painful demoralized state of the public mind in this country which is called the great reaction. Every aspect of it is but a mean to that of the reaction under CHARLES II. in England. The inexpressibly contemptible hostility to the colored population at its first appearance, a hostility which feeds itself by every kind of slander and wretched device to a wretched prejudice, and forever seeks to exasperate instead of conciliate mutual confidence. The second great symptom of demoralization called reaction is the evident tendency to repudiation in some quarters, or willingness not to fulfill the most moral understanding that existed when the national loans were made.

This reaction or demoralization will be the chief reliance in the approaching Presidential election of the party which fostered slavery and brought on the war. The two planks of its platform will be hatred of the negroes and repudiation. It will be observed that the name of Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR, of this State, is not often mentioned as a probable Presidential candidate of the Democratic party. The reason is better, indeed, late in the autumn, declining to be considered as an aspirant. Such a letter, of course, was naturally regarded as a polite reminder that the friends of Mr. SEYMOUR are declined to believe that it was a sincere performance. At the Democratic State Convention last autumn Mr. SEYMOUR made a speech, in which he substantially favored a policy of repudiation. But the movement of the reaction—the process of demoralization—was so rapid that, by the beginning of January, Mr. SEYMOUR found that his latest utterance was far behind the sentiment of his party, and that he had ceased to be a leader. Mr. PENDLETON, a frank secessionist and repudiator, had openly concealed his sentiments, and was saluted by the Northwestern reaction as the true interpreter of the party feeling. The clamor against the untaxed bonds grew louder and fiercer, and Mr. SEYMOUR, who had virtually spoken for that interest, was sagacious enough to see that he was already unavailable.

We are far from attributing intentional fraud to many of those who support the repudiating policy in whatever form it may be proposed. Nor is it difficult to see the reason of a widespread feeling upon the subject. Business is very much at a stand. The farmer's crops lie upon his hands. Gold is fearfully high, and the fluctuation ruins thousands of small country traders. Taxes are heavier than ever before. Yet people of reasonable minds say they and the great mass of the population—see that the holders of the gold-bearing bonds pay no tax upon them, while gold is at 120, or 130, or 140. The taxpayers vaguely feel that it is unjust. But there is an immense amount of property which contributes nothing at all to the taxes yet receives heavy dividends, and which is exempted by taxation. The mass of people are not thinkers; they know little of political economy, and they will be very friendly to any party or policy which promises, as they imagine, to equalize taxation.

Yet probably there is no one of the persons who have this feeling and wish this result who would not agree, upon reflection, that nothing can be gained by an actual breach of faith. If the United States should tax their bonds under the plea that they are constitutionally exempted only from local taxation, or if there should be a payment of the interest upon a part of the five-Twenties in greenbacks, or if the whole debt should be repudiated, the result would be morally the same; the national faith would be broken and the national name dishonored; and in either case substantially the same, for credit being destroyed, the whole business of the country would be prostrated. The first step might not be ill-intentioned, but the end of the policy would be the full view. The embezzlers whom every year discovers and sends to self-destruction or to the State Prison mount to millions, and would be but as any body could be a loser. Ye who listen with credulity to the whispers of BUTLER, and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of PENDLETON, attend to the history of every great fraud of every nation which deliberately breaks faith!

It is the duty of every faithful citizen, therefore, not to say that the people are evidently resolved to do an unwise or dishonest thing, but to show them that unwisdom and dishonesty can not be advantageous. There is a favorite and fallacious method of disposing of great public questions by saying, "Oh, the people have made up their minds to it." But if the people have made up their minds to a false or a wrong policy—what then? Is an honest man to be full into line and shout Great is Diana! or is he to persist in preaching the unknown God? We do not believe that the country is ready to break faith, and all honest men have a right to demand from Congress a financial policy which will be simple, efficient, and just. The reaction unresisted will be an incalculable moral and material misfortune to the country; and we respectfully suggest that the way to resist it is not to yield to it.

THE ALPHABET AND THE NEW CITIZENS.

THERE is no subject of profounder interest than that of education in the late rebel States; and while the Democratic journals are every where sneering and canting about the freedmen, and striving to inflame and perpetuate hostility between the races, the freedmen themselves are steadily advancing in education and intelligence. The moment emancipation was accomplished, whatever of done or left undone education of the freedmen became a national necessity. If the President and his supporters could have had their way, the new citizens would have been left wholly to the old. If the Freedmen's Bureau had not been sustained against the veto, the situation at the South would have been infinitely obscurer than it is. The question that was so persistently asked in some quarters, whether it were the proper business of Congress or the Government to educate a part of the people at the public expense? was answered by the plain necessities of the case. While four millions of emancipated persons among six or eight millions who had been a master class, who knew that emancipation had been wrought despite them, and who could not be expected in every freedman to be a living sign of their defeat and humiliation, there could be no more palpable national duty than to instruct the emancipated class.

From the beginning of the war there had been faithful men and women engaged in teaching, and voluntary societies rapidly arose to organize and extend the good work, which has now fallen very much into the hands of the American Freedmen's Association. But General HOWARD, the Chief of the Bureau, has always been in the most friendly relations with the various societies, and has taken care that every thing within the power of the Bureau should be done for the cause. Amidst the fierce storm of political blackness work has proceeded—a work of incalculable value, and largely dependent upon private subscription.

The whole system is so vitally related to the rapid pacification and prosperity of the country that we confess none of the reports which are made by the various Departments at this season are looked for with more interest than that of General HOWARD upon this subject. His name will surely live in the traditions of a grateful race as that of a good friend no class in this country ever had, a more patriotic and modest public servant has not been known among us. From time to time there have been rumors of his resignation, but they have been always upon the Presidential hand; and as the prolonged duration of the Bureau is doubtful, it may fairly be presumed that the General will remain to the end. In his last report he speaks in the most encouraging tone of the subject of education.

It appears that the organization of the educational department of the Bureau is constantly more complete and efficient. It works harmoniously with all the voluntary associations, and the General thinks that "the freedmen may, before long, be safely left with such instructors." For the last six months, reported by Mr. J. W. ALVORD, General Superintendent of schools in each State, it appears that the whole number of schools reported, including Sunday-schools, is 3695, and of pupils 238,342. This was an increase of the last three months of 1503 schools and 76,638 pupils. Of these schools 1056 are sustained wholly, or in part, by the freedmen, and 391 of the buildings are owned by themselves. The teachers in the day and night schools are colored, and 1388 white. 28,068 colored pupils have paid tuition, the average amount per month being $14,535; and only 6911 of the pupils were free before the war. There are 21 normal schools, with 1881 pupils. These schools, for the instruction of teachers, have been established during the last six months, and are to be multiplied rapidly. The total expenditure by the Bureau for all educational purposes during the six months was $220,833 01, and for the whole year $643,766 20.

The interest in education among the colored people, says the report, does not flag, and the educational effort has been extremely successful. The progress under necessarily unfavorable circumstances, the permanency of the schools, and their failing after beginning, and the rapid increase of general intelligence among the colored population, are such as to cause the General to say that "the hopes of the warmest friends of the freedmen have been more than fulfilled. The Future is full of promise for the entire race redeemed from bondage and ignorance." These are cheerful words, spoken by one who knows more of the matter than any body else.

General HOWARD recommends that when the term of the Bureau expires the educational division, "which is beyond measure important," shall be transferred to the Department of Education, with ample power to sustain and extend the present system. How agreeable it is after the stupid ribaldry of the Copperhead correspondence from the South, in which every thing ludicrous is distorted and derided, to contemplate the facts of this Report and all that they imply!

CHILD MURDER.

IN our paper for January 2: we published a view of the wicket of the Foundling Hospital at Florence, in Italy, and we called attention to the fact of the alarming increase of infanticide and of other unmentionable crimes. Indeed the most startling phenomenon of city life is the apparent decline of the maternal sentiment. Essays are constantly published by medical men which explain the mysterious advertisements in otherwise respectable newspapers. In some papers the reader may find nearly a column of such advertisements, which, in plain English, are merely murder made easy and decent made sure. They are both a cause and a symptom; and the essays of which we speak are the record of the experience of faithful and wise physicians. The late Dr. WORTHINGTON HOOKER, one of the most eminent among them, declared, in a former number of this journal, that the average of children in American families has declined from eight to less than three, and that one of the chief causes is the consent of the mother.

The inevitable consequence of such a condition is that human life declines in value, and that the unwilling mothers views infanticide with composure. It is therefore not surprising that the fearful secrecy of the Bureau of State Charities in Massachusetts has ascertained during the last year that eighty out of every hundred infants placed in public alms-houses die within a few days; and that the Bureau has been founded to care for the unfortunate children; and all the town authorities are authorized to send foundlings and abandoned infants thither. During the last week, also, another instance of this wanton carelessness of life, or in other words, murder, was exposed in this city. A woman applied to the Board of Health for a burial permit for a child two months old. Dr. HARRIS was suspicious, and upon inquiry it was ascertained that the body of the infant was brought from the house of CATHARINE D. PUTNAM, who keeps a lying-in hospital for women who are not wives.

The certificate upon which the permit was sought was given, according to the report in the morning papers, by Dr. JAMES W. RANNEY, and a false number of the house was mentioned. Upon inquiry, whether it was a disreputable house, Dr. RANNEY replied that if taking children from the breast and feeding them with "spoon victuals" tends to shorten their lives, and if keeping persons in a house doing this thing makes it disreputable, then this is a disreputable house." The cook testified that MRS. PUTNAM advertised children for adoption, and kept them until they were adopted, and that there was a death in the house every two months. That is, MRS. PUTNAM keeps a lying-in hospital for mothers who wish to abandon their offspring, and MRS. PUTNAM disposes of them. If there are no applicants for adoption the fate of the infants may be surmised.

The experience of Europe has led to the establishment of foundling hospitals as the surest method of diminishing child murder. The argument that such institutions tend to promote vice by alleviating its consequences is not sound. For we have no right to make the sacrifice of innocent lives as wholly innocent a means of restraining the guilty. Nor is the suppression of the evil from which this crime springs to be found in vehement denunciation and exclamations of horror, and then leaving it to cure itself. In the city of New York we believe that the Creche receives foundlings under certain conditions; but the time is fully ripe for such foundling hospitals as those of Europe. Nor have we any doubt that the revelations of every month and week, the testimony of science and of history, will rapidly persuade the public of this truth.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

As there is no report published of the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention at Albany except in the local papers, which are usually a fortnight behind the debates, it is edifying to observe the extreme anxiety which rests upon that body and its work. The Democratic papers were not favorable to the Convention before it assembled, and soon after its deliberations began the New York Tribune began the loud denunciation of its "windiness," and set the fashion of laughing at it, which has been faithfully followed by the press of that party.

But we believe that when the work of the Convention is submitted to the people they will heartily approve it; and this is an opinion which is not peculiar to the members of the dominant political party among the delegates. Even the Albany Argus, which upon the adjournment in the autumn denounced the probable action of the Convention as destructive of all that is most desirable in civil society, now that its labors are coming to an end describes the changes made by it as generally valuable. Doubtless the Argus thinks that the result is due to the fact that the Convention has as yet made very few radical alterations in the present Constitution. It has equalized the suffrage, and extended the term of the judges to fourteen years, and it has laid certain restrictions upon the Legislature in passing private laws. But it has been surprising in rejecting any proposition of fundamental reform rather than that of the voting qualification.

Thus the article reported by the Committee on Charities, proposing a complete system of State care of charities and charitable bequests, was—not to speak lightly—incontinently crumpled up and thrown out of the window. The Chairman of the Committee, Mr. ERASTUS BROOKS, who is peculiarly familiar with the whole subject, and made a long and valuable and interesting speech upon presenting his article, struggled strenuously to save his work from immediate and ignominious rejection; but Judge CONSTOCK bore down upon him with a legal argument upon charitable uses and the wisdom of leaving the whole subject to the Legislature, and was most decidedly supported by the Convention.

This debate seemed to have given the Convention a taste of blood; so when the Report of the Committee upon Education appeared another onset was made. The Committee proposed to organize in the Constitution the Land Scrip and Cornell University Funds, and to create a State Board of Education to do the duties which are now divided between the Board of Regents and the Superintendent of Education. The first proposition was so evidently proper that it was adopted after very little debate. But the second fell to a very animated discussion during two days. Mr. HALE, of Essex; Mr. ALVORD, of Onondaga; Judge PARKER, of Albany; Judge VERPLANCK, of Queens, and Judge CONSTOCK, of Onondaga, were the chief opponents of the proposition, which was supported mainly by Mr. GOULD, of Columbia, and the Chairman of the Committee. Finally the test question was raised upon an amendment of Judge CONSTOCK'S, virtually continuing the present system, for which the Chairman offered a substitute, in which the proposition in the section reported was made more precise. The division defeated the Committee by a small majority (71 to 67), which was not a surprise; but the question of quorum was not raised, and the defeat was accepted. The Convention then trampled the whole article under foot, excepting the first section. It is needless to guarantee the freedom of the common schools in the fundamental law; but on a subsequent day the Chairman of the Committee on Education moved that the Committee on Revision be instructed to report the guarantee.

As we write the Convention is engaged upon the article providing for the government of cities. It is not possible to foretell the decision, but our decided impression is that the Convention will not advise the people of the State to relinquish the right of municipal self-government in the city of New York. Judge VERPLANCK, of Erie, one of the leading Democrats in the Convention, declared that he brought the Constitution so far as completed the best State Constitution ever made; but he said that unless the government of the great cities, including the police and the health management and all other affairs, was left wholly to themselves, he was very sure that this best of Constitutions would be fatally injured and justly rejected. We do, on the contrary, it seems to us, both from reason and experience, that such a course would be, under the circumstances, a criminal renunciation of their unquestionable authority by the people of New York.

It is generally understood that the action of the Democratic party upon the Constitution will depend very much upon the decision of this question. If the subject is left as it stands at present, or if the Constitution expressly assert the system and the care of the municipal health, the party will oppose it; if the power of control is expressly renounced, the party may support the Constitution. But whatever be the fate of the work of the Convention, the faithful story of its deliberations will not shame those who have diligently devoted themselves to the duty which was imposed upon them.

MOTLEY'S NEW VOLUMES.

THE third and fourth volumes of Mr. MOTLEY'S History of the United Netherlands, finishing the work, are just published by the HARPERS. They are wholly worthy of the author, and the interest of the narrative is fascinating to the very end. That end is the truce between the State-General, the Archduke, and the King of Spain in 1609, which, after forty years of the most memorable heroism upon the part of the Dutch, virtually established the Republic. These two volumes are therefore the end of the historian's present undertaking. But he is already at work upon the natural sequel of the story here told, the Thirty Years' War, ending with the peace of Westphalia.

We are more than ever impressed in these volumes by the singular fitness of the historian for the particular task he has chosen. Mr. MOTLEY comes to his work not as a scholar merely, nor as a historian in the sense of mere annalist, but as a man of individual convictions and as a citizen with a full share of social and political responsibility. History, in his judgment, is not a mere or less imposing and brilliant romance, but a part of our own life and full of the most valuable experience. He, therefore, does not affect a judicial impartiality, except as to facts. For the rest he judges the times and persons of his narrative as he would his contemporaries, making the due allowance for the difference of epochs. Upon the great questions involved in the struggle of the Netherlands, the historian's convictions are so clear, his sympathies so fresh, and his interest so vital, that he has, as he ought to have, the warmth of an actual actor in the events he describes. And so, substantially, is he.

The same relentless and cruel hostility to liberty of thought that sustained the devilish war of PHILIP II. upon the Netherlands, the same feeling of caste which caused the Kings of England, France, and Spain to look upon any name of Republic and a government of burghers; under changed forms are the substance of our Revolutionary struggle with England. Mr. MOTLEY has seen both in Europe and at home.

The men and events treated in these volumes are of the highest interest. PHILIP II. of Spain, ELIZABETH of England, HENRY IV. of France, ALEXANDER FARNESE, Prince of Parma, MAURICE of Nassau, John of Olden-Barnevelt, JAMES I. of England, with the Marquis of Spinola and a crowd of other figures less eminently conspicuous upon the page. Then we have the brilliant opening campaign of MAURICE against ALEXANDER FARNESE, and the contest between FARNESE and HENRY of Navarre, with the latter's finally successful operations; the battle of Ivry, and the pompous farce of HENRY'S conversion; with the long and terrible siege and battle of Nieuport; HEEMSKERK'S great naval victory in the Bay of Gibraltar; the difference between MAURICE and BARNEVELT; the foundation of ELIZABETH; the rise of the Dutch East India trade; the arctic explorations; and the many and long negotiations leading at last to peace.

PHILIP II. died in 1600, and his character is elaborately analyzed by the historian. The whole history is indeed the record of his crimes; but the summary of his life is one of the most remendous of human retributions for his severity and force. PHILIP was the fearful illustration of what the logic of the Romish Church will make of a sincere mind with the whole stretch of vast power. PHILIP was the scourge of civilization. The misery which he caused is indescribable, and his sole excuse for it was that other men did not think as he did upon religious subjects.

The Netherlands stood against him with a zeal as unswerving as his own. And when, at last, FREDERICK, Prince of Orange of Navarre, the "Huguenot," as he was called, would have extinguished the hope of mankind with a smile, and had the Netherlands been conquered, England would have fallen. The heroic devotion of the Dutch, their tough tenacity, their indomitable industry and enterprise by which, during the constant and costly struggle, they became for the first commercial and, for their numbers, the first military power of the age, are well worth the most thoughtful study. Even in the midst of the war the citizens taxed themselves fifty per cent. of their individual incomes, and so doubled the public exchequer; and there were years when one man out of three of the whole male population was ready to be mustered into the field. There was hardly a Netherlander, man, woman, or child, who was not a soldier or sailor, and the schools were a public charge. Nothing but such a people could have exhausted and foiled the fanaticism of such a king as PHILIP.

Mr. MOTLEY exposes, with unsparing satire, the whole system of treachery and swindling called statecraft and diplomacy under which a King or a Pope, or any agent of theirs, would lie and cheat and murder, as if it were a game of cards, would cause him to be kicked out of the company. Diplomacy was not an encounter of wits, it was merely a bout of lying; and whoever succeeded best in making his lies believed was the ablest diplomatist.

The Netherlands were the cradle of modern Liberty; and no man has the intelligent lover of liberty than Mr. MOTLEY could have told their heroic story with such perfect appreciation, such sympathy and power.

THE HYGIENE OF GYMNASTICS.

WHEN Mr. HORACE GREELEY announced that, if appointed umpire in foot-ball matches, he would certainly give the "champion ball" to the "nine" who lost the game, as their defective playing at the outdoor sport was less reprehensible than when they were good husbands and brothers and sons, with a commendable love of home and homepleasures, he preached a sound and timely little sermon against an evil into which a great many young men of America are running at present with bewildering speed and gratuitous zeal. In gymnastics and calisthenics, as in many other things, the young men and women of this country have of late years committed a great many excesses; and they need to be warned of the dangers to health and strength, and beauty and grace of person, has undoubtedly conduced to a diminution of certain bad habits, and has been productive of temperance in diet and drink: but there is danger, and very great danger too, that we shall run into the other extreme, and get ourselves into much of gymnastics. There is now existing an undue interest, not only to witness, but to perform, feats of strength and agility, which are attractive merely because difficult and dangerous. We know of one gymnastic school in this city which possessed the "Flying mania" to such a degree that really healthful exercises were abandoned while the scholars risked their necks in attempting to transform themselves into Russian acrobats, and fly through the air on trapezes swung at a dangerous height, but not necessarily more difficult to catch or control on that account. In fact, the young gymnasts of the whole country, including pedestrians, yachtsmen, horsemen, rowers, runners, cricketers, and even our fair friends, the lovers of croquet, seem to be bent on becoming "professionals."

It is all well enough to cultivate the wonderful nerve that must be present in the man who walks a rope over the great cataract, and the energy and endurance necessary to walk a hundred miles in a day, or run innumerable somersaults. These are, however, not true gymnastics; they are the amusements of art, or the labors of a gymnaster, and tend to no advantage, mental or physical. Gymnastics and calisthenics should be taken, like medicine, "for their own sakes." The purpose of the first is to develop and regulate the strength of the body; the other to produce grace in the movements of the person: and it is a matter of great interest to know how and when to take each, and how much of each to take. Physical education is undoubtedly of the greatest value to mankind, not only as far as its own direct influence is concerned on the health and muscular power, but as an adjunct to mental advancement and culture. But physical exercise should be so regulated that the physique may be symmetrically and strengthened, at the same time so apportioned that exhaustion and fatigue may not occur. The sound physiologist and the sound mind embrace both these points: but of late we have not been physiologically "sound," and we are not likely to remain the better. It may be interesting to those amateur gymnasts who are ambitious to excel in these feats, to know the conditions which are presented by such athletes as Blondin, Pfaa, and others, that gymnotimists and acrobats should be lively people, and, as a doubtless, other extravagances and temptations assist in thus producing an evil result, it is not to denied that the physical system is in a state of sufficient knowledge as to the relation between food of a certain character and quantity, and exertion of a several kind, to enable us to say, and the foundation of disease, and been the primary cause of an early dissolution. If, then, we would obtain advantages from exercise, the proper requirements of food and support need particular attention. Perhaps in no way have the old rules of diet been so erroneously set aside as in the supply of fluids. We speak now as to quantity, and not as to quality. A certain waste must occur during excessive exertion, and water must be supplied from without, the muscle which is dependent to a great extent upon fluid for its function, and deranging the energy organization, and exertion and consequent respiration, it becomes an important matter to supply a proper amount of fresh air. For this reason in winter it will be better if all gymnastic exercises were taken in the open air, and the plan of building gymnasia is open to very serious and strong objection. Should, however, such an arrangement be necessary, the freest ventilation should be insisted on, and a particular room should not be crowded. One other matter, which may be considered a trivial one, and yet which is very important for good or evil, is the clothing that is worn during the course of instruction. Loose flannel clothes are in every way suitable, and particularly is it necessary that ample space be afforded about the chest and shoulders. But most important of all is the matter of proper protection; and no young man or woman should go through a course of physical exercise without good guide or some such valuable and practical work as the volume by Captain Wood, lately published by Harper & Brothers, and which has already reached a second edition as a decree as a standard authority on the subject of all sorts of Physical exercises.

LITERARY.

IN "Stories of the Gorilla Country," published by the HARPERS, PAUL DU CHAILLU gives us a young folks a most entertaining little book of African adventure, anecdote, and information. Monsieur PAUL was an ardent if not a mighty hunter, and his haps and mishaps with elephants, leopards, boas, and gorillas are full of excitement. The author, whose first work was justly lauded by the severest critics in England, has lived to see the fidelity of his statements confirmed, and, if he has written a romance, has the merit of actual experience, that this attractive volume appeals to the reader. It is written for the young people in copiously and artistically illustrated. But every body will find it amusing and interesting.

ART SCHOOLS OF NEW YORK.

WE give on the succeeding page a number of views in the several Schools of Design, or Art Schools, of this city, the most perfect, and indeed the only institution of the kind in this country which approach completeness.

The Art Schools are intended not only for the thorough education of painters and sculptors, but the practical instruction of designers in all the various arts and manufactures which require designing and engraving in any of their branches. Many people have opposed these schools as of no practical value, and even to this day the prosecution of the public who support and the youth who accept the advantages of these schools is but an insignificant fraction of the total population—not one in ten thousand. Perhaps this is because the schools are yet young and their practical value has not as yet been fully demonstrated in practical results or the development of many great designers. We are such a practical people in America that we occasionally fail to see the utility of many things which we do not required to learn. But a few visits to either of the Art Schools of New York would demonstrate their great utility to the most skeptical of Gradgrinds in search of the hardest of facts.

No worthy art school can be fully developed in an evening visit to the Academy of the Mechanics' Institute, at No. 472 Broadway. This is a school supported entirely by the Society of Mechanics and Tradesmen, and is for the benefit and instruction of any and all mechanics' apprentices. It is free and open to all of this class; and at the present time numbers 450 pupils. First-class teachers are always in attendance, and a desire of instructing as long as can be to learn. If the apprentice of a machinist enters the school he is put to work at first on the rudiments of mechanical and machine drawing, and gradually advanced until the most complicated engine is made plain to his understanding, and until his hand can copy correctly the design which has been set before him, or his mind originate a better. In the same way, if a carpenter, cabinet-maker's apprentice enters the school he is instructed in drawing designs for those painted window-shades which form a not insignificant part of our industry. The large boy in the engraving on the right and lower corner of our page of illustrations is evidently the apprentice of some wood and machine draughtsman of the first rudiments of designing. Eventually, when he shall have passed through the whole course of his study in the school, and learned his master's shop during the day, he will be able not only to work with the tools, as most journeymen can, the beautiful scroll-work which constitutes most of the furniture of the day, but also to design new and more beautiful and perhaps more beautiful patterns. The apprentices of carpenters and builders are also taught all manner of architectural and ornamental drawing, not with the intention of making complete architects of them, but to give them such a knowledge of architecture as to enable them, as foremen and overseers or builders, to clearly comprehend the architect's plans of the buildings which they shall be employed to erect. Mr. HUNT, the artist, who has been in charge of this school for eleven years, and who has done much to educate the young mechanics of this city, informs us that since the school was started, in 1856, several of his pupils have become designers in machine-work, truss-designing, and in furniture-work, in establishments, and that two have become architects. The practical results of the instruction in these schools, however, is to make more perfect mechanics of the apprentices.

The schools of the Cooper Institute are also free, and are conducted by the well-established chat noble institution. They are open alike to males and females, though different rooms are provided for the different sexes. The designing of all sorts is taught, and here are graduated designers in all known branches of manufactures, including silver, brass and iron work, tapestry, jewelry, etc., etc. The same general course of instruction is pursued here as in the school of the Mechanics' Institute, but results, perhaps, in producing more professional designers than does the latter school.

The antique (or statuary) school of the National Academy of Design is the principal and highest art school in this country. It has also an elementary school as are the others; before a student can enter it he must have already mastered the rudiments of art and acquired such a proficiency in the use of pencil or crayon as to be able to make a drawing, whose excellence shall indicate to the Council that the application by the applicant of a certain degree of talent for art. This drawing must be of a plaster head, cast, fig., or other object in the Life Academy. The student, once admitted, has the privilege of the large rooms of the Academy, where are to be found copies in plaster of all the famous and beautiful statues of the Old World. These they are permitted to copy and study. The teachers are merely critics, and occasionally point out the errors of the students, and suggest how they may be remedied or avoided. To this school males and females are alike admitted. Attached to this is also the "Life School," to which only the more advanced male students in the elementary school are admitted, and in which drawings are made from living models.

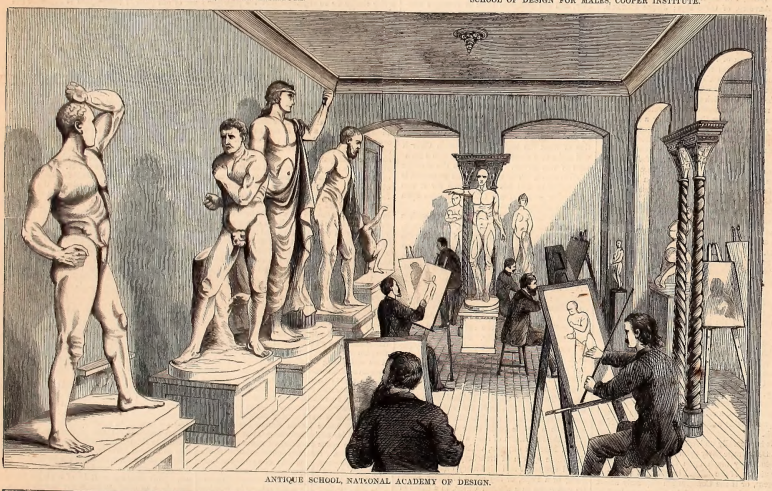
THE NEW RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

THE new Reconstruction bill, which originated with the House committees (and which proposes to deprive the President of all power to further oppose the Congressional plan of reconstruction), was, on the motion his present powers on General Grant, as the General-in-chief of the army, acquired such authority for several days' debate, on January 24, by a vote of 124 yeas to 45 nays—enough to carry it over a veto by the President. The bill was promptly introduced, on January 22, in the Senate; but no action had been taken on it, though it was thoroughly debated, up to January 28.

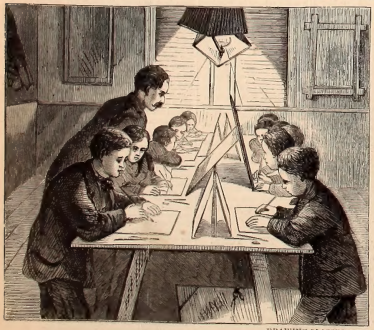
THE COTTON TAX.

THE Senate on January 22 discharged its committee of conference on the Cotton Tax bill, and passed an amendment to the House bill suspending the tax for 1868, and fixing it at one cent per pound after this year.

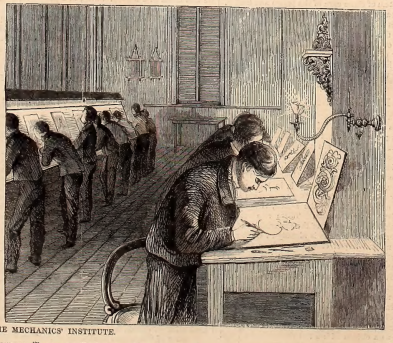
GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN'S DISCHARGE.



GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN, whose arrest by the English authorities at Queenstown, charged with Fenianism, was noticed in our last, was discharged at Cork on January 20, and the officers at London deny that they authorized his arrest. He immediately began a suit against the British Crown for illegal arrest, fixing his damages at $800,000.



SCHOOL OF DESIGN FOR FEMALES, COOPER INSTITUTE.



SCHOOL OF DESIGN FOR MALES, COOPER INSTITUTE.

ANTIQUE SCHOOL, NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

DRAWING-CLASSES OF THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

ART SCHOOLS OF NEW YORK.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 83.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER XI.

WHEN the last of the guests had driven away I went back into the inner hall, and found Samuel at the side-table, presiding over the brandy and soda-water. My lady and Miss Rachel came out of the drawing-room, followed by the two gentlemen. Mr. Godfrey had some brandy and soda-water. Mr. Franklin took nothing. He sat down, looking dead tired; the talking on this birthday occasion had, I suppose, been too much for him.

My lady, turning round to wish them good-night, looked hard at the wicked Colonel's legacy shining in her daughter's dress.

"Rachel," she asked, "where are you going to put your Diamond to-night?"

Miss Rachel was in high good spirits, just in that humor for talking nonsense, and perversely persisting in it as if it was sense, which you may sometimes have observed in young girls when they are highly wrought up, at the end of an exciting day. First, she declared she didn't know where to put the Diamond. Then she said, "on her dressing-table, of course, along with her other things." Then she remembered that the Diamond might take to shining of itself, with its awful moony light, in the dark, and that would terrify her in the dead of night. Then she bethought herself of an Indian cabinet which stood in her sitting-room, and instantly made up her mind to put the Indian diamond in the Indian cabinet, for the purpose of permitting two beautiful native productions to admire each other. Having let her little flow of nonsense run on as far as that point, her mother interposed and stopped her.

"My dear! your Indian cabinet has no lock to it," says my lady.

"Good Heavens, mamma!" cries Miss Rachel, "is this an hotel? Are there thieves in the house?"

Without taking notice of this fantastic way of talking, my lady wished the gentlemen good-night. She next turned to Miss Rachel, and kissed her. "Why not let me keep the Diamond for you to-night?" she asked.

Miss Rachel received that proposal as she might, ten years since, have received a proposal to part her from a new doll. My lady saw there was no reasoning with her that night. "Come into my room, Rachel, the first thing to-morrow morning," she said. "I shall have something to say to you." With those last words she left us slowly; thinking her own thoughts, and, to all appearance, not best pleased with the way by which they were leading her.

Miss Rachel was the next to say good-night. She shook hands first with Mr. Godfrey, who was standing at the other end of the hall, looking at a picture. Then she turned back to Mr. Franklin, still sitting weary and silent in a corner.

What words passed between them I can't say. But standing near the old oak frame which holds our large looking-glass, I saw her, reflected in it, slyly slipping the locket which Mr. Franklin had given to her out of the bosom of her dress, and showing it to him for a moment, with a smile which certainly meant something out of the common, before she tripped off to bed. This incident staggered me a little in the reliance I had previously felt on my own judgment. I began to think that Penelope might be right about the state of her young lady's affections after all.

As soon as Miss Rachel left him eyes to see with, Mr. Franklin noticed me. His variable humor, shifting about every thing, had shifted about the Indians already.

"Betteredge," he said, "I'm half inclined to think I took Mr. Murthwaite too seriously when we had that talk in the shrubbery. I wonder whether he has been trying any of his traveler's tales on us? Do you really mean to let the dogs loose?"

"I'll relieve them of their collars, Sir," I answered, "and leave them free to take a turn in the night, if they smell a reason for it."

"All right," says Mr. Franklin. "We'll see what is to be done to-morrow. I am not at all disposed to alarm my aunt, Betteredge, without a very pressing reason for it. Good-night."

He looked so worn and pale as he nodded to me, and took his candle to go up stairs, that I ventured to advise his having a drop of brandy-and-water, by way of night-cap. Mr. Godfrey, walking toward us from the other end of the hall, backed me. He pressed Mr. Franklin, in the friendliest manner, to take something before he went to bed.

"I WENT TO THE CABINET, THE DRAWER WAS EMPTY."

"SHE WENT UP TO MR. FRANKLIN WITHOUT APPEARING TO NOTICE MR. GODFREY."

I only note these trifling circumstances, because, after all I had seen and heard that day, it pleased me to observe that our two gentlemen were on just as good terms as ever. Their warfare of words (heard by Penelope in the drawing-room), and their rivalry for the best place in Miss Rachel's good graces, seemed to have set no serious difference between them. But there! they were both good-tempered, and both men of the world. And there is certainly this merit in people of station, that they are not nearly so quarrelsome among each other as people of no station at all.

Mr. Franklin declined the brandy-and-water, and went up stairs with Mr. Godfrey, their rooms being next door to each other. On the landing, however, either his cousin persuaded him, or he veered about and changed his mind as usual. "Perhaps I may want it in the night," he called down to me. "Send up some brandy into my room."

I sent up Samuel with the brandy-and-water; and then went out and unbuckled the dogs' collars. They both lost their heads with astonishment on being set loose at that time of night, and jumped upon me like a couple of puppies! However, the rain soon cooled them down again: they lapped a drop of water each, and crept back into their kennels. As I went into the house I noticed signs in the sky which betokened a break in the weather for the better. For the present, it still poured heavily, and the ground was in a perfect sop.

Samuel and I went all over the house, and shut up as usual. I examined every thing myself, and trusted nothing to my deputy on this occasion. All was safe and fast when I retired to my old bones in bed, between midnight and one in the morning.

The worries of the day had been a little too much for me, I suppose. At any rate, I had a touch of Mr. Franklin's malady that night. It was useless before I fell off at last into a sleep. All the time I lay awake the house was as quiet as the grave. Not a sound stirred but the splash of the rain, and the sighing of the wind among the trees as a breeze sprang up with the morning.

About half past seven I woke, and opened my window on a fine sunshiny day. The clock had struck eight, and I was just going out to chain up the dogs again, when I heard a sudden whisking of petticoats on the stairs behind me.

I turned about, and there was Penelope flying down after me like mad. "Father!" she screamed, "come up stairs, for God's sake! The Diamond is gone!"

"Are you out of your mind?" I asked her.

"Gone!" says Penelope. "Gone, nobody knows how! Come up and see."

She dragged me after her into her young lady's sitting-room, which opened into her bedroom. There, on the threshold of her bedroom door, stood Miss Rachel, almost as white in the face as the white dressing-gown that clothed her. There also stood the two doors of the Indian cabinet, wide open. One of the drawers inside was pulled out as far as it would go.

"Look!" says Penelope. "I myself saw Miss Rachel put the Diamond into that drawer last night."

I went to the cabinet. The drawer was empty. "Is this true, miss?" I asked.

With a look that was not like herself, with a voice that was not like her own, Miss Rachel answered, in my daughter had answered:

"The Diamond is gone."

Having said those words she withdrew into her bedroom, and shut and locked the door.

Before we knew which way to turn next my lady came in, hearing my voice in her daughter's sitting-room, and wondering what had happened. The news of the loss of the Diamond seemed to petrify her. She went straight to Miss Rachel's bedroom and insisted on being admitted. Miss Rachel let her in.

The alarm, running through the house like fire, caught the two gentlemen next.

Mr. Godfrey was the first to come out of his room. All he did when he heard what had happened was to hold up his hands in a state of bewilderment, which didn't say much for his natural strength of mind. Mr. Franklin, whose clear head I had confidently counted on to advise us, seemed to be as helpless as his cousin when he heard the news in his turn. For a wonder, he had had a good night's rest at last; and the unaccustomed luxury of sleep had, as he said himself, apparently stupefied him. However, when he had swallowed his cup of coffee—which he always took, on the foreign plan, some hours before he ate any breakfast—his brains brightened: the clear-headed side of him turned up, and he took the matter in hand, resolutely and cleverly, much as follows:

He first sent for the servants, and told them to leave all the lower doors and windows (with the exception of the front door, which I had opened) exactly as they had been left when we locked up overnight. He next proposed to his cousin and me to make quite sure, before we took any further steps, that the Diamond had not accidentally dropped somewhere out of sight—say at the back of the cabinet, or down behind the table on which the cabinet stood. Having searched in both places, and found nothing—having also questioned Penelope, and discovered from her no more than the little she had already told me—Mr. Franklin suggested next extending our inquiries to Miss Rachel, and sent Penelope to knock at her bedroom door.

My lady answered the knock, and closed the door behind her. The moment after we heard it locked inside by Miss Rachel. My mistress came out among us, looking sorely puzzled and distressed. "The loss of the Diamond seems to have quite overwhelmed Rachel," she said, in reply to Mr. Franklin. "She shrinks, in the strangest manner, from speaking of it, even to me. It is impossible you can see her for the present."

Having added to our perplexities by this account of Miss Rachel, my lady, after a little effort, recovered her usual composure, and acted with her usual decision.

"I suppose there is no help for it?" she said, quietly. "I suppose I have no alternative but to send for the police?"

"And the first thing for the police to do," added Mr. Franklin, catching her up, "is to lay hands on the Indian jugglers who performed here last night."

My lady and Mr. Godfrey (not knowing what Mr. Franklin and I knew) both started, and both looked surprised.

"I can't stop to explain myself now," Mr. Franklin went on. "I can only tell you that the Indians have certainly stolen the Diamond. Give me a letter of introduction," says he, addressing my lady, "to one of the magistrates at Frizinghall—merely telling him that I represent your interests and wishes, and let me ride off with it instantly. Our chance of catching the thieves may depend on our not wasting one unnecessary minute." (Nota bene: Whether it was the French side or the English, the right side of Mr. Franklin seemed to be uppermost now. The only question was, How long would it last?)

He put pen, ink, and paper before his aunt, who (as it appeared to me) wrote the letter he wanted a little unwillingly. If it had been possible to overlook such an event as the loss of a jewel worth twenty thousand pounds, I believe—with my lady's opinion of her late brother, and her distrust of his birthday-gift—it would have been privately a relief to her to let the thieves get of with the Moonstone scot-free.

I went out with Mr. Franklin to the stables, and took the opportunity of asking him how the Indians (whom I suspected, of course, as shrewdly as he did) could possibly have got into the house.

"One of them might have slipped into the hall, in the confusion, when the dinner-company were going away," says Mr. Franklin. "The fellow may have been under the sofa while my aunt and Rachel were talking about where the Diamond was to be put for the night. He would only have to wait till the house was quiet, and there it would be in the cabinet, to be had for the taking." With those words he called to the groom to open the gate, and galloped off.

This seemed certainly to be the only rational explanation. But how had the thief contrived to make his escape from the house? I had found the front door locked and bolted, as I had left it at night, when I went to open it, after getting up. As for the other doors and windows, there they were still, all safe and fast, to speak for themselves. The dogs, too? Suppose the thief had got away by dropping from one of the upper windows, how had he escaped the dogs? Had he come provided for them with drugged meat? As the doubt crossed my mind, the dogs themselves came galloping at me round a corner, rolling each other over on the wet grass, in such lively health and spirits that it was with no small difficulty I brought them to reason, and chained them up again. The more I turned it over in my mind, the less satisfactory Mr. Franklin's explanation appeared to be.

We had our breakfasts—whatever happens in a house, robbery or murder, it doesn't matter, you must have your breakfast. When we had done, my lady sent for me; and I found myself compelled to tell her all that I had hitherto concealed, relating to the Indians and their plot. Being a woman of high courage, she soon got over the first startling effect of what I had to communicate. Her mind seemed to be far more perturbed about her daughter than about the heathen rogues and their conspiracy. "You know how odd Rachel is, and how differently she behaves sometimes from other girls," my lady said to me. "But I have never, in all my experience, seen her so strange and so reserved as she is now. The loss of her jewel seems almost to have turned her brain. Who would have thought that horrible Diamond could have laid such a hold on her in so short a time?"

It was certainly strange. Taking toys and trinkets in general, Miss Rachel was nothing like so mad after them as most young girls. Yet there she was, still locked up inconsolably in her bedroom. It is but fair to add that she was not the only one of us in the house who was thrown out of the regular groove. Mr. Godfrey for instance—though professionally a sort of consoler-general—seemed to be at a loss where to look for his own resources. Having no company to amuse him, and getting no chance of trying what his experience of women in distress could do toward comforting Miss Rachel, he wandered hither and thither about the house and garden in an aimless uneasy way. He was in two different minds about what it became him to do, after the misfortune that had happened to us. Ought he to relieve the family, in their present situation, of the responsibility of him as a guest? or ought he to stay on the chance that even his humble services might be of some use? He decided ultimately that the last course was perhaps the most customary and considerate course to take, in such a very peculiar case of family distress as this was. Circumstances try the metal a man is really made of. Mr. Godfrey, tried by circumstances, showed himself of weaker metal than I had thought him to be. As for the women servants—excepting Rosanna Spearman, who kept by herself—they took to whispering together in corners, and staring at nothing suspiciously, as is the manner of that weaker half of the human family, when any thing extraordinary happens in a house. I myself acknowledged to having been fidgety and ill-tempered. The cursed Moonstone had turned us all upside down.

A little before eleven Mr. Franklin came back. The resolute side of him had, to all appearance, given way, in the interval since his departure, under the stress that had been laid on it. He had left us at a gallop; he came back to us at a walk. When he went away he was made of iron. When he returned, he was stuffed with cotton, as limp as limp could be.

"Well!" says my lady, "are the police coming?"

"Yes," says Mr. Franklin; "they said they would follow me in a fly. Superintendent Seegrave, of your local police force, and two of his men. A mere form! The case is hopeless."

"What! have the Indians escaped, Sir?" I asked.

"The poor ill-used Indians have been most unjustly put in prison," says Mr. Franklin. "They are as innocent as the babe unborn. My idea that one of them was hidden in the house has ended, like all the rest of my ideas, in smoke. It's been proved," says Mr. Franklin, dwelling with great relish on his own incapacity, "to be simply impossible."

After astonishing us by announcing this totally new turn in the matter of the Moonstone our young gentleman, at his aunt's request, took a seat, and explained himself.

It appeared that the resolute side of him had held out as far as Frizinghall. He had put the whole case plainly before the magistrate, and the magistrate had at once sent for the police. The first inquiries instituted about the Indians showed that they had not so much as attempted to leave the town. Further questions addressed to the police proved that all three had been seen returning to Frizinghall with their boy, on the previous night between ten and eleven—which (regard being had to hours and distances) also proved that they had walked straight back after performing on our terrace. Later still, at midnight, the police having occasion to search the common lodging-house where they lived, had seen them all three again, and their little boy with them as usual. Soon after midnight I myself had safely shut up the house. Plainer evidence than this, in favor of the Indians, there could not well be. The magistrate said there was not even a case of suspicion against them, so far. But, as it was just possible, when the police came to investigate the matter, that discoveries affecting the jugglers might be made, he would contrive, by committing them as rogues and vagabonds, to keep them at our disposal, under lock and key, for a week. They had ignorantly done something (I forget what) in the town, which barely brought them within the operation of the law. Every human institution (Justice included) will stretch a little, if you only pull it the right way. The worthy magistrate was an old friend of my lady's—and the Indian lot were "committed" for a week, as soon as the court opened that morning.

Such was Mr. Franklin's narrative of events at Frizinghall. The Indian clew to the mystery of the lost jewel was now, to all appearance, a clew that had broken in our hands. If the jugglers were innocent, who, in the name of wonder, had taken the Moonstone out of Miss Rachel's drawer?

Ten minutes later, to our infinite relief, Superintendent Seegrave arrived at the house. He reported passing Mr. Franklin on the terrace, sitting in the sun (I suppose with the Italian side of him uppermost); and warning the police, as they went by, that the investigation was hopeless before the investigation had begun.

For a family in our situation, the Superintendent of the Frizinghall police was the most comforting officer you could wish to see. Mr. Seegrave was tall and portly, and military in his manners. He had a fine commanding voice, and a mighty resolute eye, and a grand frock-coat which buttoned beautifully up to his leather stock. "I'm the man you want!" was written all over his face; and he ordered his two inferior policemen about with a severity which convinced us all that there was no trifling with him.

He began by going round the premises, outside and in; the result of that investigation proving to him that no thieves had broken in upon us from outside, and that the robbery, consequently, must have been committed by some person in the house. I leave you to imagine the state the servants were in when this official announcement first reached their ears. The Superintendent decided to begin by examining the boudoir; and, that done, to examine the servants next. At the same time he posted one of his men on the staircase which led to the servants' bedrooms, with instructions to let nobody in the house pass him till further orders.

At this latter proceeding the weaker half of the human family went distracted on the spot. They bounced out of their corners; whisked up stairs in a body to Miss Rachel's room (Rosanna Spearman being carried away among them this time); burst in on Superintendent Seegrave; and all looking equally guilty, summoned him to say which of them he suspected, at once.

Mr. Superintendent proved equal to the occasion—he looked at them with his resolute eye, and he cowed them with his military voice. "Now, then, you women, go down stairs again, every one of you. I won't have you here. Look!" says Mr. Superintendent, suddenly pointing to a little smear of the decorative painting on Miss Rachel's door—at the outer edge, just under the lock. "Look what mischief the petticoats of some of you have done already. Clear out! clear out!" Rosanna Spearman, who was nearest to him, and nearest to the little smear on the door, set the example of obedience, and slipped off instantly to her work. The rest followed her out. The Superintendent finished his examination of the room; and, making nothing of it, asked me who had first discovered the robbery. My daughter had first discovered it. My daughter was sent for.

Mr. Superintendent proved to be a little too sharp with Penelope at starting. "Now, young woman, attend to me—and mind you speak the truth." Penelope fired up instantly. "I've never been taught to tell lies, Mr. Policeman!—and if father can stand there and hear me accused of falsehood and thieving, and my own bedroom shut against me, and my character taken away, which is all a poor girl has left, he's not the good father I take him for!" A timely word from me put Justice and Penelope on a pleasanter footing together. The questions and answers went swimmingly; and ended in nothing worth mentioning. My daughter had seen Miss Rachel put the Diamond in the drawer of the cabinet, the last thing at night. She had gone in with Miss Rachel's cup of tea, at eight the next morning, and had found the drawer open and empty. Upon that she had alarmed the house—and there was an end of Penelope's evidence.

Mr. Superintendent next asked to see Miss Rachel herself. Penelope mentioned his request through the door. The answer reached us by the same road: "I have nothing to tell the policeman—I can't see any body." Our experienced officer looked equally surprised and offended when he heard that reply. I told him my young lady was ill, and begged him to wait a little and see her later. We thereupon went down stairs again; and were met by Mr. Godfrey and Mr. Franklin crossing the hall.

The two gentlemen, being inmates of the house, were summoned to say if they could throw any light on the matter. Neither of them knew any thing about it. Had they heard any suspicious noises during the previous night? They had heard nothing but the pattering of the rain. Had I, lying awake longer than either of them, heard nothing either? Nothing! Released from examination. Mr. Franklin (still sticking to the helpless view of our difficulty) whispered to me: "That man will be of no earthly use to us. Superintendent Seegrave is an ass." Released in his turn, Mr. Godfrey whispered to me: "Evidently a most competent person. Betteredge, I have the greatest faith in him!" Many men, many opinions, as one of the ancients said, before my time.

Mr. Superintendent's next proceeding took him back to the "boudoir" again, with my daughter and me at his heels. His object was to discover whether any of the furniture had been moved during the night out of its customary place—his previous investigation in the room having, apparently, not gone quite far enough to satisfy his mind on this point.

While we were still poking about among the chairs and tables the door of the bedroom was suddenly opened. After having denied herself to every body, Miss Rachel, to our astonishment, walked into the midst of us of her own accord. She took up her garden hat from a chair and then went straight to Penelope with this question:

"Mr. Franklin Blake sent you with a message to me this morning?"

"Yes, miss."

"He wished to speak to me, didn't he?"

"Yes, miss."

"Where is he now?"

Hearing voices on the terrace below I looked out of window, and saw the two gentlemen walking up and down together. Answering for my daughter, I said, "Mr. Franklin is on the terrace, miss."

Without another word, without heeding Mr. Superintendent, who tried to speak to her, pale as death, and wrapped up strangely in her own thoughts, she left the room, and went down to her cousins on the terrace.

It showed a want of due respect, it showed a breach of good manners, on my part; but, for the life of me I couldn't help looking out of window when Miss Rachel met the gentlemen outside. She went up to Mr. Franklin without appearing to notice Mr. Godfrey, who thereupon drew back and left them by themselves. What she said to Mr. Franklin appeared to be spoken vehemently. It lasted but for a short time; and (judging by what I saw of his face from the window) seemed to astonish him beyond all power of expression. While they were still together my lady appeared on the terrace. Miss Rachel saw her—said a few last words to Mr. Franklin—and suddenly went back into the house again, before her mother came up with her. My lady, surprised herself, and noticing Mr. Franklin's surprise, spoke to him. Mr. Godfrey joined them, and spoke also. Mr. Franklin walked away a little, between the two, telling them what had happened, I suppose; for they both stopped short, after taking a few steps, like persons struck with amazement. I had just seen as much as this when the door of the sitting-room was opened violently. Miss Rachel walked swiftly through to her bedroom, wild and angry, with fierce eyes and flaming cheeks. Mr. Superintendent once more attempted to question her. She turned round on him at her bedroom door. "I have not sent for you!" she cried out, vehemently. "I don't want you. My Diamond is lost. Neither you nor any body will ever find it!" With those words she went in, and locked the door in our faces. Penelope, standing nearest to it, heard her burst out crying the moment she was alone again.

In a rage one moment, in tears the next! What did it mean?

I told the Superintendent it meant that Miss Rachel's temper was upset by the loss of her jewel. Being anxious for the honor of the family, it distressed me to see my young lady forget herself—even with a police-officer—and I made the best excuse I could, accordingly. In my own private mind I was more puzzled by Miss Rachel's extraordinary language and conduct than words can tell. Taking what she had said at her bedroom door as a guide to guess by, I could only conclude that she was mortally offended by our sending for the police, and that Mr. Franklin's astonishment on the terrace was caused by her having expressed herself to him (as the person chiefly instrumental in fetching the police) to that effect. If this guess was right, why—having lost her Diamond—should she object to the presence in the house of the very people whose business it was to recover it for her? And how, in Heaven's name, could she know that the Moonstone would never be found again?

As things stood at present no answer to those questions was to be hoped for from any body in the house. Mr. Franklin appeared to think it a point of honor to forbear repeating to a servant—even to so old a servant as I was—what Miss Rachel had said to him on the terrace, Mr. Godfrey, who, as a gentleman and a relative, had been probably admitted into Mr. Franklin's confidence, respected that confidence as he was bound to do. My lady, who was also in the secret no doubt, and who alone had access to Miss Rachel, owned openly that she could make nothing of her. "You madden me when you talk of the Diamond!" All her mother's influence failed to extract from her a word more than that.

Here we were, then, at a dead lock about Miss Rachel—and at a dead lock about the Moonstone. In the first case, my lady was powerless to help us. In the second (as you shall presently judge), Mr. Seegrave was fast approaching the condition of a superintendent at his wit's end.

Having ferreted about all over the "boudoir," without making any discoveries among the furniture, our experienced officer applied to me to know, whether the servants in general were or were not acquainted with the place in which the Diamond had been put for the night.

"I knew where it was put, Sir," I said, "to begin with. Samuel the footman, knew also—for he was present in the hall when they were talking about where the Diamond was to be kept that night. My daughter knew, as she has already told you. She or Samuel may have mentioned the thing to the other servants—or the other servants may have heard the talk for themselves, through the side-door of the hall, which might have been open to the back staircase. For all I can tell every body in the house may have known where the jewel was last night."

My answer presenting rather a wide field for Mr. Superintendent's suspicions to range over, he tried to narrow it by asking about the servants' characters next.

I thought directly of Rosanna Spearman. But it was neither my place nor my wish to direct suspicion against a poor girl whose honesty had been above all doubt as long as I had known her. The matron at the Reformatory had reported her to my lady as a sincerely penitent and thoroughly trustworthy girl. It was the Superintendent's business to discover reason for suspecting her first—and then, and not till then, it would be my duty to tell him how she came into my lady's service. "All our people have excellent characters," I said. "And all have deserved the trust their mistress has placed in them." After that there was but one thing left for Mr. Seegrave to do—namely, to set to work and tackle the servants' characters himself.

One after another they were examined. One after another they proved to have nothing to say—and said it (so far as the women were concerned) at great length, and with a very angry sense of the embargo laid on their bedrooms. The rest of them being sent back to their places down stairs, Penelope was then summoned, and examined separately a second time.

My daughter's little outbreak of temper in the "boudoir," and her readiness to think herself suspected, appeared to have produced an unfavorable impression on Superintendent Seegrave. It seemed also to dwell a little on his mind that she had been the last person who saw the Diamond at night. When the second questioning was over my girl came back to me in a frenzy. There was no doubt of it any longer—the police-officer had almost as good as told her she was the thief! I could scarcely believe him (taking Mr. Franklin's view) to be quite such an ass as that. But, though he said nothing, the eye with which he looked at my daughter was not a pleasant eye to see. I laughed it off with poor Penelope, as something too ridiculous to be treated seriously—which it certainly was. Secretly, I am afraid I was foolish enough to be angry too. It was a little trying—it was indeed. My girl sat down in a corner with her apron over her head, quite broken-hearted. Foolish of her, you will say: she might have waited till he openly accused her. Well, being a man of just and equal temper, I admit that. Still Mr. Superintendent might have remembered—never mind what he might have remembered. The devil take him!

The next and last step in the investigation brought matters, as they say, to a crisis. The officer had an interview (at which I was present) with my lady. After informing her that the Diamond must have been taken by somebody in the house he requested permission for himself and his men to search the servants' rooms and boxes on the spot. My good mistress, like the generous, high-bred woman she was, refused to let us be treated like thieves. "I will never consent to make such a return as that," she said, "for all I owe to the faithful servants who are employed in my house."

Mr. Superintendent made his bow, with a look in my direction, which said plainly, "Why employ me if you are to tie my hands in this way?" As head of the servants, I felt directly that we were bound, in justice to all parties, not to profit by our mistress's generosity. "We gratefully thank your ladyship," I said; "but we ask permission to do what is right in this matter by giving up our keys. When Gabriel Betteredge sets the example," says I, stopping Superintendent Seegrave at the door, "the rest of the servants will follow, I promise you. There are my keys, to begin with!" My lady took me by the hand, and thanked me with the tears in her eyes. Lord! what would I not have given, at that moment, for the privilege of knocking Superintendent Seegrave down!

As I had promised for them, the other servants followed my lead, sorely against the grain, of course, but all taking the view that I took. The women were a sight to see, while the police-officers were rummaging among their things. The cook looked as if she could grill Mr. Superintendent alive on a furnace, and the other women looked as if they could eat him when he was done.

The search over, and no Diamond or sign of a Diamond being found, of course, any where, Superintendent Seegrave retired to my little room to consider with himself what he was to do next. He and his men had now been hours in the house, and had not advanced us one inch toward a discovery of how the Moonstone had been taken, or of whom we were to suspect as the thief.

While the police-officer was still pondering in solitude, I was sent for to see Mr. Franklin in the library. To my unutterable astonishment, just as my hand was on the door it was suddenly opened from the inside, and out walked Rosanna Spearman!

RIGHT.

Low to myself I said the word;
With deeper awe I hushed my voice and will
It rang as with a shout!
Such power was in it to be heard,
And from that hour my soul grew still,
And put away its doubt.

A battle-cry is in that word;
A force to wield on deadliest field,
Which he who grasps shall feel
As if his hand had drawn a sword,
And triumph were forestalled and sealed
With the first battle-peal!

A royal word! a conquering word!
Which none should speak with lip so weak
But straight they should grow strong;
As if, unknowing, they had heard
The mighty hest of victors passing by
And echoed the new song!

The grand word! the eternal word!
Given us wherewith to glorify
This daily work and care,
Building our temples to the Lord
After the heavenly house on high
Where the city lies four-square.

And straight and perfect lives do grow—
Whose image I see the form of Him—
From heavenly height to height.
So let us Will to be done below!
Oh, Duty, if that's the only flag,
And thou art named Delight!

ECCENTRICITIES OF THE FLESH.

THE vagaries the flesh puts on are quite as wonderful as those exhibited by the mind. We think nothing of a certain portion of mankind supposing man may express mentally. Half of us, indeed, act from sudden impulse, like or dislike. We can not give a reason for it even to ourselves; but we are indeed puzzled to find the body as well as the mind influenced by other bodies in the most remarkable manner, often without our being aware of the offending object's presence. We allude to the extraordinary susceptibility some persons have to the proximity in the most unpleasant manner the nervous system of some individuals. The presence of a cat in the room has been known to affect certain persons as though they were about to be seized with a fit: and such persons, again, are equally disturbed by the proximity of rabbits. The effect of touching the fur of the rabbit or that of the cat is still more distressing to the individuals thus eccentrically constituted. The direct contact of certain articles of food with the stomach affects some individuals in the most remarkable manner. Some persons can not eat a boiled egg without having a very curious effect upon their complexion. We know a lady who once indulged at supper-time in a salad of the most delicate green, upon her cheek the ball-room her face and neck immediately became covered with spots, obliging her to retire. Cucumber, we also know, has the like effect upon persons thus peculiarly constituted. A medical friend tells us that eating veal gives a lady of his acquaintance the nettle-rash, and that orange-peel has produced great nervous excitement. Figs, again, give rise in some people to what is termed "fig-emancation," or a sensation like the tickling movement of ants upon the palate. The most extraordinary example of the adverse influence of a common article of food upon the human stomach is related by a surgeon of one of our public hospitals. He says that a patient of his can not touch rice without the most extreme discomfort. "On one occasion, when at a dinner-party, the first symptoms of poisoning coming on, and was, as usual, obliged to retire from the table, although he had not partaken of any dish actually containing rice. It appeared, on investigation, that some white soup, with which he had commenced his dinner, had been thickened with arrowroot." In another case, similar symptoms having come on after a gentleman had partaken of bottled beer, that apparently excellent beer was exposed by the presence in the bottle of a few grains of rice, which had been placed there to excite a secondary fermentation. But what is this to the perverse stomach of a gentleman in a case cited by Doctor Prout, who was poisoned by eating a common tom-chop? This was digestible of all flesh to the ordinary mortal was to him positively as poisonous as though he had eaten toad-stools. He was at first imagined by his physician that his dislike to this kind of food arose from mere fancy, and in order to test the matter, disguised, was served to him as other flesh meat, but always with the same result—violent vomiting and diarrhea. Indeed, the effect upon him was so great, that had he been kept upon a mutton diet Doctor Prout believed he would have died.

Some persons can not touch honey without the very alarming symptoms appearing of swelling of the tongue, frothing of the mouth, and blindness of the fingers. Mustard applied to some eccentric skins will produce violent twitchings of the muscles of the face, arms, and legs.

Many persons we know can not remain in a room where there is a cheese; and we are told of an eccentric constitution that could not sit at a table where there was a cooked hare. Eggs, again, rebel in the most violent manner against some stomachs. The sense of touch, too, is very eccentric in some individuals, and the handling of a russet apple is intolerable to a gentleman we have heard of: and the mere passing of the hand along the bristles of a brush produces the most exquisite ferrous distress in a lady of our acquaintance.

The emanations arising from vegetable sources have a very marked effect upon some people. Indeed, there is a disease known as hay asthma, which, at the hay harvest, periodically affects many persons who reside any where near hay-fields when they are being moved. The reason is well known. Floating particles of the seed are always set free at such times, and, striking against the mucous membranes of the nose, mouth, and throat of the individuals liable to this affection, produce spasmodic action of the throat, which is not only very distressing but dangerous. Ipecacuanha, again, is most obnoxious to many individuals, producing vomiting and diarrhea. The mere removing of a stopper from a bottle containing this drug will produce in some persons an instantaneous effect, although far removed from the object itself. Persons thus affected by this emanation have been known to be seized with spasms in consequence, although removed by a couple of floors from the cause.

The ordinary spasmodic asthma arises from causes just as local. It often happens that patients so afflicted can not pass certain limits without bringing on a spasm. The distance of a length of a street will give many persons perfect exemption from his dire trouble, or precipitate him into it. As a rule, persons who are liable to seizure by the same disease in the country obtain great relief by a residence in towns; often, too, in the most disagreeable, and, to persons in health, unhealthy localities of the city. In this distressingly complaint it may truly be said that what is one man's meat is another man's poison.

THE BRONTÉ FAMILY.

THERE is very little that is new which can be told of that most interesting of literary families, the Brontë girls; but an Englishman who lately visited the parish of Haworth, their former home and present burial-place, recorded a son of the old sexton of the church over which the father of the family presided, and who stated that he knew every one of the Brontës well:

"No," he said, in reply to some of my questions about them, "they didn't visit much among the people in the village. They were fonder of taking long walks by themselves on the moors. Emily (Ellis Bell) was very reserved. Anne was the loveliest, Sir. Whenever there was illness in the parsonage, in she always took care to make me—I was a little lad, then, you know, Sir—an apple-dumpling, or a bit of jelly, or some simple pastry; or, if she could get them, a few grapes or a handful of raisins, or some such thing of that sort.

"Did you know Branwell, the son?" said I. "Was he not very clever?"

"That he was, Sir! I'll give you an instance of it. I'll tell you. He was very fond of his own and often. I have seen him take two quills, one in each hand, and write two letters at once on two different subjects, with the greatest ease. Writing to him. He wrote just as easily with the left hand as with the right. The way he first began to write with both hands, he told me, was this: One day he was at a railway-station, and he wanted very much to get two letters written before the train started, and he could not write fast enough, so that he might as well write them both at once. He tried, and found he could do it quite well."

Mrs. Gaskell, in her "Life of Charlotte Brontë," has stated that one reason of Branwell Brontë's having so early contracted those habits of dissipation which blighted his career was to be found in the fact that when a traveler for a commercial house came to stay at Haworth for the night, and dined with the Rev. Patrick Brontë, the place, the host of the "Black Bull" would then send up to the parsonage, with the traveler's compliments, and beg Mr. Brontë to come down to the inn and spend an hour or two there. The sexton, however, informed us that no such statement was ever published. "Mrs. Gaskell," said he, "went too far there." The host of the "Black Bull" had not the right of having his wine first sampled by the parson.

"Did you know Mr. Nicholls, the curate, who married Charlotte Brontë?" asked my friend.

"Yes; I knew him well. A nice man he was. Quiet, you know, but very kind, and a real good hard-worker."

"How long was Mr. Nicholls at Haworth?"

"Why, altogether, he was here for about seventeen years. Ten years he was here afore he married Miss Brontë, and seven years he was there afterward. Four months after Mr. Brontë died he went away."

"Did he apply for the living after Mr. Brontë's death?" we asked.

"Yes; he did, Sir, 'answered the sexton; "but he didn't get it."

"But surely," said we, "having been curate here for seventeen years of his life, having married the Brontë family so long, and having married Charlotte Brontë, he was the most suitable person to have been appointed."

"Well, I don't know how it was, Sir," responded the sexton; "but all I know is, he sent in his application to the trustees, and hearing there was going to be some opposition to him, he withdrew it."

He showed us the communion-pew, in front of which Charlotte Brontë was married, and under which she now lies buried, almost on the very spot where her feet must have stood during the performance of the marriage rite. All the family, also, except Anne, are buried close beside her. The sexton then pointed out to us the Brontë pew, which is close before the altar, and especially showed us where she (Charlotte) used to sit.

"She was," he said, "very little, and had a foot-stool for her feet. Yes, the pew was in exactly the same state as when they sat in it. Ah, Sir," continued the sexton, "I once saw Thackeray and an American, who they tell me, is a great man among the United Emerson, and Miss Martineau, and Miss Brontë, all sitting in that pew, one Sunday. Thackeray and Emerson came to visit Mr. Brontë for a day or two, that was how they all sat there on the Sunday."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

OUR newly acquired Alaska seems to be a sort of target to which are directed all the jokes of press and people. Every newspaper, almost, thrusts out one or two little wild words about our northern territory, and thus far we have not heard of its rising in Artillocracy to avenge these numerous insults. And so it is both interesting and amusing to cull from various sources, and compare bits of information—true and false doubtless—about the far-west sort of a matrimonial place Walrussia would be for neat summer's vacation. The correspondent of the August in Sitka would be prepared to decide what reports were true and what false.

The common impression is that Alaska is a very good country to emigrate from; but the idea that any person lives in it has held any affection for it is regarded as preposterous. Nevertheless it is said that many tears were shed in Sitka when the transfer was made from the Russian flag to the stars and stripes, "and the regret of civilization is gained from the statement that "of all the inventions of the past century only one has been purchased by the people—the fifteen puzzle match." Slavery is no mark of a domestic institution among the Indians, whose wealth of families is estimated by the number of their slaves. These Indians, by-the-way, are reported to have exhibited some beautiful ingenuity in the Russian garbage because they were not consulted when the transfer was made. As to the productiveness of the soil, the information seems to be uncertain and various; but, condensed, is something as follows:

"Hills raise potatoes."

"Alaska cabbages have no head, turnips and potatoes no body, and Alaska inventions, no tail. There is room no fruit."

"Only a cherry has been found in Alaska, and the trunk of a mastodon has been brought to San Francisco."

"Crabs six feet long, or wide, are found in Alaska."

"Double-headed monstrosities of calves have arrived in one vessel at San Francisco from Alaska."

"Dwarf trees are found on the hills of Sitka, and the dirigible promise to be as rich as any in California."

"The chief products of the Russian possessions never appears to have been expended for coddin."

"The Russians have left artichokes, stale parsnips, tasteless cauliflowers, insipid cherries, and indigestible pumpkins."

"Alaska must have been a glorious country to go mooning in, for the wild mustcdons and things were slashing around there."

"Alaska abounds in fish."

And from these items every body can draw their own deductions. Only the fishes really do deserve a good character, for they are the richest and the most weigh fifty pounds, and the halibut as much as three hundred and fifty pounds! But the crabs must take the palm, for they are "six feet" and "dirigible to be erected—by some—to become "the New England of the future." Snake country, full of nausea and dolphinmen and similarly adventurous folks." Land speculators predict that Sitka will have fifty thousand inhabitants in the next twenty years; and, finally, that somebody is reported to have already taken up his abode in Sitka, and that he has hard to run for Congress as soon as there is a chance.

Things are coming to a bad pass in our city railroad cars. A gentleman residing in Sixth Avenue not long ago since found the door-way blocked up by three men who seemed unwilling to stir. They presented, after the cars, however, and immediately the gentleman discovered that his pocket had been picked of seventy-five dollars. The conductor said he knew the men were pickpockets; but when asked why he had not informed the passengers of the fact he said that he did not wish to run the risk of having his skull kicked off! So it there to be no protection in the cars against known and systematic villainy?

Its said that the new process of engraving apparatus has recently been placed in the painting gallery of A. T. Stewart's new mansion on Fifth Avenue. The cost of the instrument has been hundred and twenty-five. Each burner is lighted by means of a platinum wire, made red-hot by an electric battery.

We do not understand economy in this country. A million tons of coal-dust are annually consolidated for fuel in Europe, and wasted.

Colonel Hoe, the lightning press inventor, is fitting up a press to print on both sides of a sheet at the same time. So it is said.

There is nothing like having a plenty of newspaper reporters around. They do a vast deal of good when it is least expected. Only the other day a rough old man, weary of life, was about jumping from a train in motion when a reporter, who was present, who seized his name, age, business, and residence for an obituary item. Still more recently a "newspaper man" in Canada was attacked on a bridge by a negro, who threw his assailant out into the river and made an item of him.

During the last cold snap a car loaded with barrels of cider was thrown from a railroad track in Connecticut. The cider became frozen, and the people carried it away in bags. A clear case of "hard cider."

Unreliable conduct in church service seems to be the order of the day in many sections of the country. A court in Indiana recently imposed heavy fines on a company of church whisperers and laughers, whose conduct had, at last, become so intolerable as to require judicial treatment. A Pennsylvania paper suggests that church pews be placed on pivots, so that the occupants may not be obliged to strain their necks every time somebody comes into church.

There is a match factory in Detroit which couples three and a half acres of ground, and is capable of turning out about 1,600,000,000 matches every year. Enough, remarks a local paper, to set all creation on fire.

Milwaukee has officially decided the value of a man's beard. In a fight a ruffian pulled out a man's beard, sold the same and kept the gilt handsome. It had just been colored by a nightly application of cabbage the damages might have been greater.

An American barber, in London, shaves a man a minute, and defies the world to beat him. People are shaved every day quicker than that—down in Wall Street.

There is one sensible, benevolent man in Pennsylvania—and two wh we know his name. But he lives in Pittsburg, and is an owner of real estate. In view of the general depression in business he has reduced the rents of his dwelling-houses.

A Chicago paper announces a sneezing match; and a tooth-pulling match is in prospect among the dentists. "Matches" are almost played out. A more commendable feat than any mere useless trial of strength but been performed by three boys, who have driven an aged father and a crippled mother and brother from Detroit to Montreal. Their vehicle was a rude wagon, and their motive power four-footed stables. The family are poor, and the object of the journey was to reach friends in Montreal, who are abundantly able to assist them.

The Brahmins keep their minds clear by temperate living. They regulate their appetites by a girdle of a single straw. This girdle is very cone-cealing.

A speedy method of paying off the national debt has been suggested. The fine for swearing in Manchester is 51 pence; in New York, 50 dollars. Statistics. If these fines should be rigorously collected there would soon be no an immense debt which could not be better applied than to help pay our debt.

Virginia is getting ahead of us. The people there are going to catch the lads by steam.

A certain Simon, a notorious public executioner in the south of France, has recently died in the hospital of Lazenaux. Charles Simon had been the hero of many adventures in the course of his career. One of these is recorded as being the original cause of the invention of the instrument of beheading. A fashionable culprit being brought up to be marked on the shoulder with a hot iron, the executioner by taken let the instrument fall just when he had applied it to the flesh, so that the mark was not considered valid. In order to avoid a repetition of this mistake he applied to his horrid work until the unhappy sufferer had passed away. The awkward executioner was dead three hundred franes, for the convict had been bound to the very bone. On a second occasion, in attempting to behead a condemned priest, Simon struck off only a portion of the skull, and in the next attempt cut off the head of a soldier, a frightful scene took place on the scaffold, the account of which has prevented the executioner from being guest since that time to that same city. The struggle ended in the defeat of Simon and his two assistance, and the culprit was conveyed back to prison. When the troops left the South resolved that, though forbidden to shoot the president of Abolish the executioner, and dismissed Simon from his office. But he loved his "profession," and his unnatural thirst were satisfied by a place as executioner at the dissecting-room of a Lyons hospital, where he remained until, worn out, he went to his native place to die.

A Western paper is responsible for the following "Yankee" story:

"Theodore Tilton had just entered a hotel in a Western city when he was politely accosted by a gentleman to change his toilet preparatory to lecturing. The gentleman showed on the evening and was dressed and vulgar woman. 'Are you the porter?' inquired the woman. 'No, madam,' he said upon, 'boodore's arm. 'No, Madam, was the quiet response; 'are you the lamber-maid?'"

It has been said that the word "would" in Rufus Choate's handwriting resembled a small gridiron struck by lightning. Those who have seen specimens of his writing will not consider the comparison inapt.

Foreign papers say that out of five young men in Berlin, Prussia, who recently tried to go a week without sleep, three died. Why didn't they go to sleep? And what, or who, kept them awake till they died?

THE OVERLAND MAIL-COACH.

ALTHOUGH the "passage of the plains" and the "ascent of the Sierra Nevada Mountains" by the Pacific Railroad has somewhat contracted the old overland route by the Rocky Mountains, Express and Mail-Coaches, these primitive institutions, ever seen in the van-guard of the army of civilization, continue across the Rocky Mountains and carry mails and passengers between the termini of the road.

In the last volume we gave some illustrations of the route of the Pony Express: on the next page we give a picture engraving, illustrative of the many difficulties which the Overland Coach has to encounter in making the toilsome and dangerous journey of the Rocky Mountains. The speed pursued by the coaches is necessarily very narrow, as it is made on the side of the steep mountains, and usually overlooking precipitous gorges. In winter portions of the road are found to be sheets of ice, and the streams which dash down the sides of the mountains are frozen into huge icicles, or rather glaciers of great size and magnificence. The coach in our engraving is represented in the midst of one of the heavy winds-storms which prevail in the ravines or gulches of the Rocky Mountains; and the air is filled with the snow-flakes which have been disturbed in their rest on the side of the mountain.

The scene which we have thus sketched was made by our artist in "Guy's Gulch," a ravine on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, about thirty miles west of Denver City, Colorado.

OVERLAND MAIL-COACH CROSSING THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS—SCENE IN GUY'S GULCH.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 87.]

WINTER SCENES ON THE SEA-BOARD—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 90.]

WINTER ON THE SEA-BOARD.

Our beautiful engravings on page 89 illustrate a peculiar phase of life full of hardships and excitements, but yet not without its attractions, financial or otherwise, since over three thousand persons actively pursue it in winter and summer on our coasts. The summer existence of a pilot is doubtless a delightful one, but in winter the life has few attractions, surrounded as those who pursue it must be by such scenes as we depict. In our series pilot boat No. 20 is seen cruising a few miles out at sea for an incoming steamer. The insurance companies require all vessels on which they take risks to enter and leave all ports under the charge of a regularly licensed pilot, and if a vessel is lost through any violation of this rule its owners can not recover the insurance money. This creates the demand for port pilots, a class of men intimately acquainted with the harbors in which they are licensed to pilot, and they are to be found in large numbers at all times just off the coast at the entrances to our principal harbors. Three or four pilots generally cruise in each pilot boat. When an incoming vessel signals that she is in want of a pilot a small boat puts off from the latter vessel, as in the second picture, and the required pilot goes aboard. Sometimes, while waiting for a pilot, and even after pilots have been taken aboard, the vessels get too near the shore, and are forced to hastily tack and "haul off shore" as it is called. In one of our scenes a vessel thus endangered is represented "hauling off shore." The fourth picture represents the ship, under the pilot's care, homeward bound, passing Sandy Hook; and the fifth and last represents her moored at her dock.

TRANSITION.

Its day is done—
The sweet and transient summer day,
Wherein unfolding to the sun,
It basked in light its little while away.

Now brown and dead,
This shrivelled and unsightly shell
Remains alone of grandeur fled,
The story of a life to tell.

But what is lost?
Does aught linger? Only die,
'Mid all the mysteries intercrossed,
That in the heart of nature lie?

Our weak souls cling,
Our fond affections still and weak
To some thing perishable thing,
Until we wailing cry—'tis dead!

Yet evermore
Does time renew in varied guise
The changeful year, and o'er and o'er
Awakes new life from that which dies.

The hope we mourn,
The tender blooms that fade and fall,
The love that death knew must return,
The kindly deed or word—these all

The future keeps,
And faithful will its trust restore,
Though not the same; the worm that creeps
Thus to its tomb, shall wake to soar.

STOLEN HEART'S-EASE.

JOHN QUINCY STEWART had read Shakespeare all the morning, lying on a sofa in the Elmendorf parlor.

He is not a nervous man who can not rest for one place two minutes at a time," Miss Elmendorf remarked, taking her old-fashioned watch from her belt, with a watch-pocket, and continuing her praise of the Shaksperian reader.

"A very sensible man is Mr. Stewart! For two hours, now, he has scarcely raised his eyes from his book. He has great concentration of mind. It is always a sign of weak characters to fly off at a tangent every two minutes. My brother thinks all the world of Mr. Stewart. He is a regular Damon and Pythias friendship."

A young lady, standing at the window of the Elmendorf library uneasily drumming on the panes, crossed her impatient tattoo and looked after Miss Elmendorf with a strange look on the young face. It was hard to say what that look meant, and it was not one very easy to make out either. The mouth indicated humility, as if it plead guilty to some charge the elder woman had made, but there was contradiction and rebellion in the eyes.

Miss Elmendorf walked into the parlor with a brisk angularity that was characteristic of the Elmendorf gait. The mantle shone like a mirror, but she dusted it carefully; the grate had not an atom of uncleanness on it, but she looked at it dejectedly; the furniture was the most orderly looking furniture in the world, but she rearranged it; the books on the table looked as if laid down by line and plummet, but she found work to do even there.

John Quincy Stewart's attention was diverted from his Shakspeare. He glanced from the open page to that, to good-looking Miss Elmendorf, and then back to the page again. He was a merry twinkle in his eye. He was thinking of what Miss Elmendorf's young wife had said the night before. "Sister Cynthia is prone to provocation. I really believe she don't sleep nights, thinking of dirt. When she dies I think she will have to be suspended, like Mohammed's coffin, between heaven and earth, for she wouldn't ever rest in peace if they placed her in the ground." He laughed, thinking of the way in which the young girl had said it as if under protest, and blushing guiltily a moment after as if she had committed an unpardonable sin.

Then passed from thoughts of the young Mrs. Elmendorf to observation of the elder Miss Elmendorf, his eyes went back to his Shakspeare again.

"To gild refined gold, to paint the lily,
To throw a perfume on the violet,
To smooth the ice, or add another hue
Unto the rainbow, or with taper light
To seek the beauteous eye of heaven to garnish,
Is wasteful and ridiculous excess."

He quoted, closing his book, and following Miss Elmendorf's motions. "Miss Cynthia," he added, "the care bestowed on this room is excess equal to gilding refined gold, painting the lily, etc."

Miss Elmendorf colored, but said, as she stood arrested, duster in hand, "My brother is very neat, and loves order. His wife hasn't a particle—"

She paused abruptly, for the door opened, and the young girl to whom she had spoken in the library entered. With the weary air of one in expectant amusement at nothing, she went to the table and turned over the books.

"You will find some excellent reading matter, there," commented Miss Elmendorf, rubbing some imaginary stain from the marble mantle with her duster. "There are several delightful romances."

The younger woman shrugged her shoulders.

John Quincy Stewart looked apprehensively at Miss Elmendorf. She disliked that shrug of the shoulder in Philip's young wife so much; it looked so French and rebellious. She supposed she had picked it up at boarding-school, from one of those trifling French teachers whose brains lay in their heels. She never did think much of the French, but she must not say anything of the sort now, for Elizabeth was of French extraction.

Elizabeth, Philip Elmendorf's wife, added to the disapprobation expressed by the shrug of her shoulders the quick words, emphatically said, "I hate memoirs. They are always about stupid good people, who die in their youth. As a rule they are poor stuff to read."

John Quincy Stewart's mouth curled mischievously under his mustache. He knew Cynthia Elmendorf well that he was prepared to hear his opinion of Philip's wife: "Entirely too decided for a woman, and so unreasonable!"

But Cynthia Elmendorf was a woman of vast control, and only by the look on her face betrayed her opinion. "There are some scientific works," she remarked, with an air of resignation.

Like a spoiled child's answer came the response: "I never read one in my life. I should fall asleep in five minutes."

"They are full of facts," remarked Cynthia Elmendorf, in an argumentative way.

Elizabeth Elmendorf shrugged her shoulders, and delivered herself of the heterodox opinion: "I hate facts."

John Quincy Stewart's mustache failed to cover his smile, and he placed the open volume between his hands, and read aloud, "'It bears Shakspeare,' he said to himself, 'the talk of these two women. Miss Cynthia is shocked beyond words at the last book.'"

"Elizabeth!" was all Miss Elmendorf said, but there was a volume of reproof and disapprobation in the name, and the young lady shut the book.

A moment after she said: "That is a good book you hold in your hand."

It was "Hamlet's Soul's Rest." Elizabeth Elmendorf laid it down with a sigh. "I am not a saint," she said, "I should not understand."

She left the books in a confused pile and walked to the window.

Miss Elmendorf, the tidy housekeeper, crossed directly to the pile of books and arranged them in orderly precision.

John Quincy Stewart looked after her and christened her Martha, "careful and troubled about many things." His eyes followed the two women with a merriment that the half veiling of the dark, heavy lashes could not hide.

His friend's wife drew the shade from the window and left the sunlight fall in golden bars across the carpet.

When she had left it his friend's sister let the curtain drop again and arranged the sunlight.

Elizabeth Elmendorf stepped to a little vase and bent her head over a cluster of flowers, scattering their petals with her breath.

Five minutes later Cynthia Elmendorf took the faded flowers from the vase and threw them out of the window. "I can only litter up the carpet and make a muss," she said.

Elizabeth Elmendorf went to the piano and dashed a brief, wayward melody.

"I wish you knew 'The Dead March' from 'Saul,'" commented Cynthia Elmendorf. "My brother thinks it has more music in it than all the dancing music that was ever written."

Elizabeth Elmendorf, standing over the grate, bit her lip. She looked nervous, or at her handkerchief.

It was a habit Cynthia Elmendorf had condemned more than once, it was such a childish, nervous trick, so little like a grown woman's ways, she had told herself, severely. But Miss Elmendorf did not find fault now. She was a woman who did not speak all her thoughts, and she remembered John Quincy Stewart's words the day before: "Your brother's wife is very young. Do not be hard with her. Hard? Miss Cynthia had been hard. Her sharp words came out of her lips as was a conscientious woman who only meant to do her duty.

But—Miss Elmendorf knit her brows and looked searchingly at the young girl before the grate—could it be? Was Elizabeth weeping? Elizabeth, with no lack of food and raiment—in fact, much better food and raiment than she had been accustomed to in former days—a house full of comforts, and a husband whom any woman for miles around would have esteemed it an honor to marry! Elizabeth weeping? Why, if there was a country in Christendom who ought to return thanks for her position, that woman was Philip Elmendorf's wife.

"Are you ill, Elizabeth?" asked Miss Elmendorf.

"No," was the low answer.

"Don't be a baby, then," chided Miss Elmendorf. "There is nothing my brother despises so much as silo tears."

"I never was such a child for her years!" exclaimed Miss Elmendorf, as the young woman hastily left the room. "She can't settle herself to any thing. Now wanders around from one thing to another, in a way that fidgets me half to death. She doesn't seem quite happy, as you say, but there is no sense or reason in that. I am sure I don't know what a woman can want that Philip's wife does not possess. In my opinion she can not appreciate my brother, and I think he committed the greatest mistake of his life in marrying such a woman."

John Quincy Stewart differed with Miss Elmendorf on the question of appreciation. Her brother's wife was young, perchance a little giddy, and to the smoothness of a luxurious home was very different from that to which she had been accustomed. Miss Cynthia must make some allowance for its accliminate. She was warm-hearted and enthusiastic, and her quiet ways chilled her, perhaps, but she would fall into their ways gradually.

Miss Elmendorf shook her head and sighed, reiterating her previous remark, "I fear Philip has made the greatest mistake of his life, and I think he begins to see it himself. Elizabeth's manner has been unbecoming."

"Hush!" whispered John Quincy Stewart, raising his hand, warningly.

"What do you hear?" asked Miss Elmendorf.

"Nothing," he answered, after a moment's pause. "I think it was a mouse in the wall."

That night Philip Elmendorf and his friend discussed some knotty point in law, sitting over the library fire. Cynthia Elmendorf, a little way off, seemed industriously sewing. She was thinking it was quite like old times, before Philip met that poor little Lizzie Whipple, and committed the unpardonable folly of making her his wife, because, forsooth, she was young, and bright and pretty.

There was a movement at the door, and Philip Elmendorf's wife entered.

"There is an end to any quiet, sensible talk now," thought Miss Elmendorf. Philip's wife had such a way of flitting around like a butterfly, or bird, or any other unsteady thing, and she broke into the grave talks with the most unreasonable assertions, and had not an atom of dignity or propriety about her.

But Miss Elmendorf was mistaken. Philip's wife walked into the library that night with a propriety and dignity that was a match for Miss Cynthia's own. The girl-wife called Miss Elmendorf's manner. She placed her work basket on the table, and gravely seated herself to the arrangement and folding of patchwork blocks.

Miss Elmendorf arched her eyebrows incredulously. Was there something in the girl, after all?

Philip Elmendorf smiled approvingly. He had liked Lizzie Whipple's bright and merry ways when a girl, but the dignity and grace of a woman in Elizabeth his wife.

John Quincy Stewart wondered. Companies though the friend of Philip Elmendorf and friend of Philip's sister, there was a geniality in his nature that formed no part of the Elmendorf character, and the former wife, curbed and checked on every side, had detected the sympathy glowing in his dark eyes and smiling from his handsome mouth, and sometimes in her rebellious moods had poured out her indignant protests in his presence.

This patchwork was her especial aversion. "Such nonsense!" she would say, flinging it into her work-basket, and leaving the room. "Such nonsense! Cut muslin in pieces, with malice aforethought, and sew it together again! It is contrary to all rules of domestic economy. I am a labor-saving machine. I don't believe in it, and I have a mind to say I won't do it!"

But that night she sewed the pieces meekly, scarcely lifting her young head. She was overwhelmed with a consciousness that rebellion were not possible in her life.

John Quincy Stewart wondered, and contrasting the two women—the one girl with this unsophisticated, cold as Niobe, sunless and tearless, he asked himself, doubtingly, the question, "Was the mouse in the wall a mouse in the wall?"

After that night there was a change in the Elmendorf mansion. The new spirit of antagonism that had entered in the shape of Philip's young wife, and fought against the coldness and hardness of the Elmendorf character, lay still as if it had become smitten with its death-blow. Elizabeth Elmendorf took to dusting of furniture, and rubbing of furniture, and eschewing the sunlight and flowers, after the manner of Philip's proper sister.

Miss Elmendorf said Mr. Stewart was right. He was a man of great discernment and penetration. He had said that Elizabeth would fall into their ways gradually.

John Quincy Stewart shook his head sadly. The woman had not fallen into their ways gradually. She might become dead to that, and for some sustained no shock, but no sudden revolution takes place without the crushing of inner forces.

He watched her one day as she dusted and laid the books straight, and piled the music, and shut out the sunlight. She did it like a born Elmendorf, he thought: but he did not smile as when he had observed Miss Cynthia. Miss Cynthia's rigid ways were as little cause of wonder as the silence of the granitic hills, but to a woman of Elizabeth Elmendorf's nature this new mood was as little to be trusted as the solemn stillness of Yosemite. In her bright flowers, and smiled to see the smouldering fires in the woman's soul flash out of her dark, beaming eyes; he read poetry, and saw that underneath the calm exterior the woman's heart was stirred; he brought new music, and waked some of the melodies she was sigh fingertips.

Neither Philip Elmendorf nor his sister objected. John Quincy Stewart was a man among a thousand, Philip thought, and his sister nodded her approval. In her eyes he had no equal among ten thousand.

There came a day when John Quincy Stewart passed out of the Elmendorf mansion with a sad and thoughtful face. Years must elapse before he could see its familiar walls again.

Two women watched him from the windows. Cynthia Elmendorf, grave and dignified, with a great sorrow in her eyes, stood at the library window, gazing after the retreating figure; and Elizabeth Elmendorf, crouching behind the damask curtains that shaded the bay-window in the parlor, sobbed as if her heart would break.

The old eight-day clock in the hall striking the hour of four some time later, roused the two women. Cynthia Elmendorf came out of her reverie with a guilty start. She had been sadly dreaming and wasting time, this practical economist, and the parlor was in disorder, as parlors are sure to be after the departure of guests. Sighing heavily, and arising with the air of one who puts away some haunting memory, she walked into the parlor with the old, brisk angularity of gait.

The eight-day clock had roused Elizabeth Elmendorf too. "Four o'clock!" she had exclaimed, mentally. "Philip will soon be here, and all things must be in perfect order. Perfect order! He does not see the chaos in my inner life."

She said the words sneeringly, and for a moment Elizabeth Elmendorf was a defiant rebellious woman. Only a moment, and the rigid calmness came back with the memory of words Cynthia Elmendorf had spoken. "I fear Philip has made the greatest mistake of his life, and I think he begins to see it himself." You could see by the look on her face how that woman had vowed in her pride that he who had chosen her should have no reason henceforth to repent his choice. For a moment a bad her hungry heart uttered its cry of need, only a moment signed for the crumbs that had fallen to her from John Quincy Stewart's genial kindness.

The door opened and Cynthia Elmendorf entered, processing to the dusting of mantle and arranging of furniture and piling of books. On the table was a vase of faded flowers. She took them to the window with intent to fling them out. Suddenly she paused, and her face grew tender and pitiful. She remembered that John Quincy Stewart had brought them there with the apology, "They will keep our hearts young." Never mind the litter, Miss Cynthia." She surveyed the flowers meditatively. No! she could not throw them away. They would keep them a few hours. She laughed at herself. It was such an odd thing for Cynthia Elmendorf to preserve such trashy things as withered flowers. She had always held such namby-pamby doings in contempt. She could hardly bring herself to such a pass of folly, should she throw them away? She deliberated, vase in hand. "Keep our hearts young," she quoted. "So, we will save them. So let them down and went for a paper to put them in.

Elizabeth Elmendorf stepped from behind the damask curtains. She had known a woman in her sister's deliberation. "He brought them to me," she said to herself. "I shall keep one for remembrance."

She bent over the vase and took a heart's-ease, the only one, from the faded leaves and flowers. She had seen Cynthia Elmendorf admire like a young girl over the little cluster of withered flowers, thinking tenderly of the hand that plucked them, and determined that the woman shall snap that hand again, check your smile as you have checked others, cease your tenderness and needless sympathy, and bring down your dreams and be practical and severe, for a younger hand and fairer has stolen the heart's-ease from your flowers."

It was years after that John Quincy Stewart stood in the Elmendorf mansion, noting the old right-angled order and painful neatness of the place. Cynthia Elmendorf entered, scarcely changed from the rigid and dignified woman he had left. Time had been great changes. Philip was dead.

"And his wife Elizabeth, where is she?" asked John Quincy Stewart.

Cynthia Elmendorf frowned. Elizabeth was a strange creature, she said. While Philip lived she had shown him their ways and been a grave and steady woman. It was different now. She was strangely rebellious and had returned to her old childish ways. She could not understand why Philip married such a child.

There are other things Cynthia Elmendorf will never understand. Life itself is incomprehensible and full of mystery since.

"I want Elizabeth, your brother's wife."

John Quincy Stewart stood before Cynthia Elmendorf with that petition.

"Elizabeth!" faltered the woman with white lips. And what became of her dreams?

But the discipline of that woman's life had not been in vain, and she stood in the same moment after and said, "I have no right to deny you your choice."

With glad hearts and happy faces John Quincy Stewart and Elizabeth Elmendorf talked of their future joys; and just the other side of a partition wall Cynthia Elmendorf stood over a blazing fire and dropped into the glowing coals the tokens of a lost love, books, letters, and a single cluster of faded flowers. Dreams were over and hopes dead. Elizabeth Elmendorf had stolen the heart's-ease from her life.

WHEN NOBODY'S NIGH TO HEAR.

BY JEAN INGELOW.

The snow lies white, and the moon gives light,
I'll out to the freezing mere,
And ease my heart with one little song,
For none will be nigh to hear.
And it's O my love, my love!
And it's O my dear, my dear!
It's of her that I'll sing till the wild woods ring
When nobody's nigh to hear.

My love is young, she is young, is young,
When she laughs the dimple dips.
We walked in the wind, and her long locks blew
Till sweetly they touched my lips.
And I'll out to the freezing mere,
Where the stiff reeds whistle so low,
And I'll tell my mind to the friendly wind,
Because I have loved her so.

Ay, and she's true, my lady is true!
And that's the best of it all;
And when she blushes my heart so yearns
That tears are ready to fall.
And it's O my love, my love!
And it's O my dear, my dear!
It's of her that I'll sing till the wild woods ring,
When nobody's nigh to hear.

MY WIFE AND MY SON'S WIFE.

HARKING the selfishness of the old man's prayer—

"Oh Lord, bless me and my wife,
My son John and his wife.
Us four.
No more.
Amen!"

it is a petition that has literally expressed my heart's desire for years, with this result, that the Lord has blessed me and my wife, but He has not blessed my son John and his wife. Thinking it all over to-night, as I have, reclined in my easy-chair before the fire, I have come to the conclusion that my blessing and my son John's curse are attributable to the differences in our wives.

For some of these differences vide below.

As a lass, my wife was bred at home in a great many old-fashioned notions, like the honest due parents, veneration to superiors, the value of time, human accountability, and woman's responsibility. She was instructed, moreover, in the art of bread-making, and a variety of useful employments.

My son John's wife received her education at one of the fashionable boarding-schools that turn out young ladies with all the modern improvements. Among these improvements, so called, was the conviction that interfamilias, as she learnedly dubbed him, was a dear old fellow to pay bills, a delicious sort of honking institution that had no credit pages in its system of bookkeeping, and never balanced accounts. Farther than this, pater was something of an old fogy, whose opinions were entirely out of date and too ridiculous for respect or adoption. Materfamilias also was a very good woman in her way. As a medium of communication between herself and the exchequer she had no equal, and a better understood with the dealer could not be found. But mater too was full of obsolete notions, and not up to the times by any manner of means. Another modern improvement was the conviction that the time not consumed in eating, drinking, sleeping, dressing, party-going, and novel-reading was an unmitigated bore, to be killed by my possible expedient. The other modern improvements were mainly playing indifferently on a piano, painting poorly in oils, dancing gracefully, flirting skillfully, gossiping recklessly, and dressing genteelly.

As a lass, my wife was a buxom woman, glowing with health and happiness. Oh the redness of her plump cheeks and the brightness of her sparkling eyes! She did not need to respond, in her hearty, merry tones, to inquiries after her health, "I am well, I thank you!" Her rosy cheeks, and rounded form, and clear, strong tones testified to her well-being.

As a lass, my son John's wife was a pale and fragile creature, like a lily or a snow-flake, John said. She had mild, languid eyes and a thin, baby voice that seemed faintly to specify after her health: "I am miserable to-day;" and the next day would say, "I am not so well as I was yesterday."

As a married woman, my wife's nerves are a help to her and me; but I am of opinion that the nerves of my son John's wife are more of a hindrance than a help. There is the same difference in the heads and hearts and bones and backs of the two women. My wife's head, like a contrivee, considers, and designs. The head of my son's wife aches, throbs, and is always ready to split. My wife's heart is a good, steady, human heart, full of pure blood and the seat of wo manly affections. The heart of my son's wife is the seat of disease, and the blood lacks iron. My wife's bones are equal to the full duties incumbent on sound bones, but the bones of my son's wife are deficient in lime, soda, or magnesia, and are full of aches and pains. My wife's back is strong to bear the burdens of the day, but the back of my son's wife is always broken and troubled with lumbago.

My wife takes for her model the virtuous woman in Proverbs: "She riseth while it is yet night and giveth meat to her household and bread to her maidens."

My son John's wife arises toward noon, and has very indistinct notions what kind of meats her household is fed with, or what kind of bread her maidens are eating.

My wife has quick, elastic steps, and rapid-moving hands that are always busy. Like the king's virtuous woman, "she girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms."

My son John's wife moves slowly and gracefully, and her hands are generally folded in elegant repose. The girding of her loins is not remarked, I am sure, but some arrangement of whalebone.

My wife's industry is well directed in a variety of useful employments. "She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff."

My son John's wife has a taste for fancy-work. She layeth her hands to the crochet-needle, and her hands hold the tatting-shuttle.

My wife is always well dressed, and her garments are mainly of domestic manufacture. She has a prototype in the habit of the virtuous woman who "maketh herself coverings of tapestry."

My son John's wife is gorgeously attired in society; but my son John groans over the bills from importers, dress-makers, and milliners.

My wife is charming at the breakfast-table. Smooth hair, a tidy dress, a white collar, and a smiling face, make up her charms.

My son John's wife, if she appear at the breakfast-table, is not charming. Her hair is in crimping-pins and curling-rags; her slippers are down at the heel; her dress is shabby, and she wears no collar. Venus herself would be ugly in such attire.

My wife "openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness."

My son John's wife openeth her mouth with complaints, and fault-finding, and fretful murmurs and idle gossip, and unreasonable demands, and her tongue is in the law habit of scolding.

My wife "looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness."

My son John's wife trusts the ways of her household to servants, and she eats the bread of her cook, when she has one, and the nearest baker's when she has not.

My wife is a good mother to her children. From infancy to maturity she has watched, instructed, and cared tenderly for them. Her attention to their physical wants has been uniform and discreet, and her devotion to their higher interests has been vigilant and unflagging.

My son John's wife leaves her children to the care of neenahs. They annoy and distress her. Their nose-maidens are to her children what is well-dressed, and their dirty little hands soil her garments when she is. As for their manners it is the business of their teachers to look after them, and what are churches and Sabbath-schools good for if they do not take charge of their morals?

My wife's kingdom is her home. Here she lavishes her best powers and richest gifts, reigning a very queen.

My son John's wife is only a queen outside her home. The shabby woman, dull and indifferent to those whose happiness or misery depends on her moods, developes into the gracious and sweet on the presence of strangers to whom she is under no obligations, and to whom her smiles or frowns are of little significance.

My wife's husband is known in the gates when he sitteth among the elders of the land." Bless you! He would never have sat there but for her. How do you think he is known? Why, by the whiteness of his linen, and the completeness of his buttons, and the fit of his collar, and the tie of his cravat, and the sleekness of his hat, and the remnants of the smile that settled on his face when, after a good breakfast, the little woman looked him over and dismissed him with a kiss. He is known, too, by the content that fills his heart and shines out on his face with the thought that all day long a wise woman is watching over his interests and looking after his dinner, and will be ready, at the proper time, for the day's work is over, with smiles and kind words. Some of the elders know him, and envy him, and wish they stood in his boots.

My son John is not known in the gates, for he does not sit among the elders of the land. John's linen is apt to be soiled and frayed at the edges, his buttons are often lacking, his collar does not fit, his cravat is tied carelessly, his hat is rough, and his broadcloth dusty, while his face has the anxious look that settles there when, after a breakfast of cold veal and a cup of muddy coffee, he leaves his wife in bed, the baby crying, the little boy riding the silk umbrella, the little girl sailing boats in the tub, the chambermaid engaging warning up stairs that she is going to leave, and the cook down stairs giving away sugar and tea to her sister's children. John's face scarcely brightens all day long. It is not likely to, with the thought that the income of his business will not balance his family expenses, and the prospect of going home to a sulky wife, children ill-bred and neglected, servants wasteful and rebellious, a dinner ill-cooked and worse cooked, and a pile of bills from milliners, dressmakers, "butchers, bakers, and candlestickmakers." I don't know what John's face will greatly fear that club-houses and wine-saloons will.

My wife's children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her. My son John says the Lord gave him no fancy of a mother, but he shall never cease to be thankful for the Lord's gift. For myself, I find no words of praise so fitting my wife as the kingly praise: "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all."

The children of my son John's wife will never arise up and call her blessed; and her husband says bitterly the Lord gave him the choice of a wife, and he shall never cease to condemn his judgment.

My life is full of content; the lines have fallen to me in pleasant places. Men say I am lucky. Every thing turns to blessing in my hand. Providence has smiled upon me, and the Lord has dealt bountifully with me.

My son John's life is full of bitterness. He complains grievously that every thing goes wrong with him, fate is against him, Providence frowns upon him, and the Lord deals hardly with him.

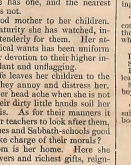
I pause and ponder. Sitting in my cheerful home to-night, the words of the wise man recur to my mind: "Every wise woman buildeth her house, but the foolish plucketh it down with her hands." Looking just across the fire, where sits my holy-faced, sweet-voiced wife, I see the wise woman who has builded her house, and I cease to blame the Lord for my son John's ill-fortune, seeing in his wife the foolish woman who plucketh down her house with her own hands.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A NAPPY THOUGHT.—Why is freedom of the press asleep in France?—Because it's under the influence of its consul.

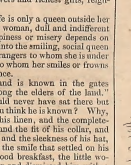
A Bostonian the other day astonished the librarian of a circulating library by saying, "I'll take the life of General Grant."

A MINER'S LAMENTATION.—"Veln! veln! give ore."

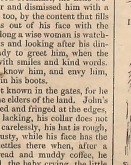


CROWING HENS.

"Why shouldn't we crow?" said the speckled Hen.
"Why not?" said the white Hen.
"Why not?" said all the Hens, as the question went round.
"We are as clever, as strong, as handsome, and as good every way as that domineering old Cock; in my opinion we are superior!" said the speckled Hen.
"And in mine," said the white Hen.
"And in mine," said all the Hens, much impressed and excited by this new view of things.
So they practiced, and stretched out their necks, and stuck their heads on one side, and in imitation of the old Cock, and a very considerable noise they made.
"Hey-day!" said Dame Drover, stopping as he ran through the yard to listen to the babbling of his dear creatures, what are you at? Give up this nonsense. While you keep to cackling you are tightly respectable, but when you take to crowing you can't think what ridiculous figure you cut—keep to cackling, dears, keep to cackling!"



"Here, you young rascal, walk up and give an account of yourself. Where have you been?" "After the girls, father." "I wish you ever knew me to do so when I was a boy!" "No, sir; but mother did."



PAPA. "Well, Sissy, how do you like your school?"
SISSY. "Oh, pa, so nice!"
PAPA. "That's right. Now tell me all you have learned to-day?"
SISSY. "I have learned the names of all the little boys."

"Astonishing cure for consumption," as the old lady said when she sprinkled snuff on the victuals of her boarders.

I purchase a Spotted Dog from a canine professor.

Before I reach home it begins to rain. The spots on my Dog change their shape.

The rain changes my Spotted Dog into a striped one.

By the time we reach home my Dog is of a clouded-gray hue.

The application of soap and hot water produces a White Dog.

Guided by the ever-efficient police, I find my canine professor in the act of spouting another White Dog for the market.

At a tavern, one night,
Messrs. More, Strange, and Wright
Met to drink and good thoughts to exchange.
Says More, "Of us three,
The whole town will agree
There is only one knave, and that's Strange,"
"Yes," says Strange (rather sore),
"I'm sure there's one More,
A most terrible knave and a bite,
Who cheated his mother,
his sister and brother."
"Oh yes," replied More, "that is Wright!"

Diggory says he always respects old age except when some one cheats him with a pair of tough chickens.

MODERN EARTH.—All of us, as we know, have this common mother. As, however, there is such a great diversity among mankind, we may fairly conclude that each was originally made from a peculiar kind of the same materials. Hence, to all probability, the first Scotchman was constructed from a "sandy soil," and the first German student from "pipe-clay." All sycophants, of course, must have had a pretty origin; and without doubt, all bankers and fair sex must to the beginning have sprang from "richest ground!" N.B.—As a matter of course the first Chinaman came from "tea-field."

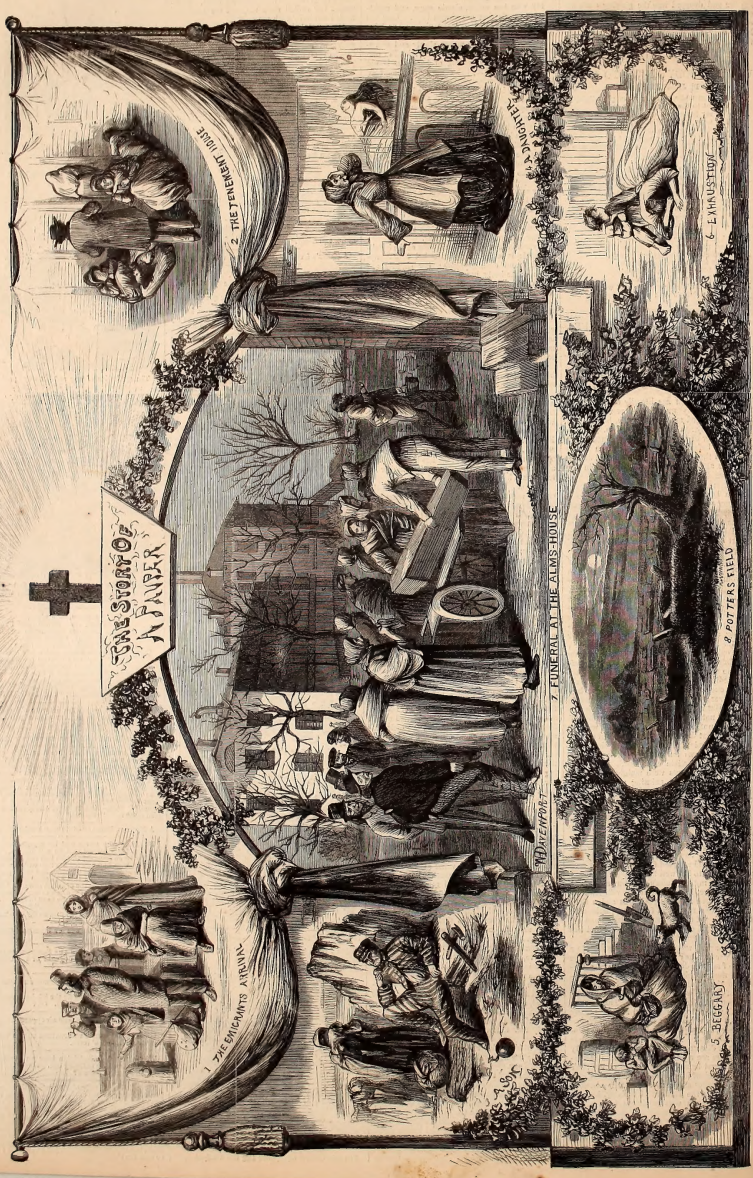
A MUSICAL BURGLAR.—One who breaks into a tune.

DR. Abernethy rarely met his match, but on one occasion fairly owned that he was beaten. He was sent for by an inn-keeper, who had had a quarrel with his wife, who had marred his face with her nails, so that the poor man was bleeding and much disfigured. Abernethy considered this an opportunity not to be lost for admonishing the offender, and said, "Madam, are you not ashamed of yourself to treat your husband thus—the husband, who is the head of all—your head, Madam, in fact?" "Well, Doctor," was the reply, "you saved the virago," and may I not scratch my own head?"

THE MOST INTELLIGENT OF SCIENCES—Gas-troscopy.

MORE WONDERFUL THAN THE RIB-WORK THAT SCOLDED ROMULUS—The new dog-mas of the Church of Rome.

AN ALARMING FEATURE—A cannon's mouth.



What Christian knights do the life-boat men resemble?—Crusaders (crew) aiders). Oh!

NEW NAME FOR A FOG—The air apparent.

MOST INCONVENIENT TO STRANGERS THAN A FALSETTO VOICE—A false set o' teeth.

Why can not Philadelphia have an earthquake? Every where else it is happening one. Where are our enterprising earth-Quakers?

Three little girls were playing among the sage brush in a back-yard. Two of them were "making believe keep house" a few yards distant from each other—neighbors as it were. One of them said to the third little girl, "There, now, Nelly, you go to Sarah's house, and stop a little while and talk, and then you come back and tell me what she says about me; and then I'll talk about her; then you go and tell her what I say, and then we'll get mad and won't speak to each other, just like our mothers do, you know. Oh! that'll be such fun!"

THE STORY OF A PAUPER
1 THE EMIGRANTS ARRIVAL
2 THE TENEMENT-HOUSE
3 A MORNING'S WORK
4 AT THE WORKHOUSE DOOR
5 BEGGARS
6 IN THE WORKHOUSE
7 FUNERAL AT THE ALMSHOUSE
8 POTTERS FIELD

MOUNT VESUVIUS IN A STATE OF ERUPTION, DECEMBER 20, 1867.—[SEE PAGE 94.]

SCENE ON A SOUTHERN PLANTATION.—SKETCHED BY A. W. THOMPSON.—[SEE PAGE 94.]

THE STORY OF A PAUPER.

IT is well known from long experience, as shown by the reports of the Commissioners of Emigration, of the Poor, and of our Prisons, that the stings of poverty are most keenly felt, and the allurements of crime most speedily submitted to by the many thousands of poor and ignorant emigrants who flock to this country annually; and our artist, on page 92, to illustrate his theme of a Pauper's Story, has chosen to depict the career of a poor emigrant woman who has come to this country in search of her children. He has chosen the dark side of the picture, and one that fortunately is less frequently displayed than the brighter and happier scenes which attend success. The emigrant is depicted landed on our shores, but there is no one to welcome her. She is next seen in that most dismal of all abodes, the tenement-house, from whose horrors she goes in search of her children. A son is found in the Penitentiary; a daughter's body is discovered in the Morgue. Poverty at length drives her to beggary, and pinches to exhaustion and the alms-house; and a brief existence in the latter place ends in a long rest in the Potter's Field.

THE ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS.

THE first recorded eruption of Vesuvius occurred in August, A.D. 79, when Herculaneum and Pompeii were buried beneath its ashes. The materials ejected from the mountain consisted of red ashes alone, the quantities of which far exceeded its own bulk; and in the occasional eruptions which succeeded, these were the only volcanic products until the year 1066, when the first flow of lava occurred. The total number of its great eruptions down to the present time has been about sixty, and some among them have been remarkable for the vast movement taking place in a short time. Between the years 1631 and 1631 no eruption occurred, except a slight one in 1500. The eruption of Vesuvius in 1631 was accompanied with great currents of lava, which flowed over most of the villages at its base, and at the same time torrents of boiling water were sent forth. The eruption of 1779 is described by SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON as among the grandest and most terrible of these phenomena. White sulphurous smoke, like heaps of cotton, rose up in piles four times as high as the mountain, and spread about it to a proportional distance. All these clouds scoriæ, scoriæ, and ashes were projected to the height of at least 2000 feet. On subsequent days similar columns of fire shot forth to three times the height of the mountain. Masses of rock of great size were projected out of the crater, one of which measured 12 feet in circumference and 17 feet in height. In June, 1794, occurred a terrible eruption, which destroyed the town of Torre del Greco. Its stream of lava was estimated by BRESLAK as containing more than 46,000,000 cubic feet. A vent opened near the bottom of the mountain 2375 feet in length and 257 feet in breadth, which became filled with lava, and on the bursting of this presented a dyke in every respect similar to the ancient basaltic dykes. The eruption of 1822 broke up the whole top of the mountain, and formed an elliptical chasm about three miles in circumference, and supposed to be 2000 feet deep. In May, 1855, the floods of lava destroyed the village of Cercola: and about nine cones were produced, from all of which floods of lava poured forth. An eruption occurred in June, 1858, another in August, 1859, and one of great violence in December, 1861.

The present eruption began on December 14, 1867, and the flow of lava has been very great and continuous ever since, though no villages have been destroyed.

A SOUTHERN PLANTATION SCENE.

EVERY reader acquainted with Southern plantation life will recognize the faithfulness of the sketch on page 85. The negroes are good lovers of music—most of them are natural musicians; and there is no charm so unresisting to them as the sound of a fiddle or "de old banjo."

MESSRS. G. W. REED & BRO. announce in this column that they will give a Gold Fountain Pen and a Year's Subscription to this Paper for Two Dollars. The offer is a good one, and they refer to HARPER & BROS. as to their reliability and the quality of their Pens. Find the advertisement below this, and read it.

PITTY-PUFF DAYS without FOOD.—Many of our readers have doubtless noticed an item concerning the refusal of a citizen of Dayton, Ohio, to take food. The Dayton Journal of Wednesday of this week says:

"Yesterday was the fifty-fourth day since Mr. Brawley, of this city, tasted food. This is the statement of Mr. Brawley and his family, who are worthy people. —Journal.

If Mr. Brawley has not taken food for fifty-four days, he must have been taking some pretty nourishing drink! We presume he has been taking "Grant's Fresh Meat Cure."—Constitutionalist.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

READ THIS. HARPER'S BAZAR, WEEKLY, or MAGAZINE FOR ONE YEAR, and a SUPERB ISAAC REED & SON GOLD PEN and HOLDER, FOR $8 00. The Price of this PEN AND CASE is $6 50, and each Pen is WARRANTED. Send for a Circular.

By special arrangement with Harper & Brothers, we are able to make the above liberal offer.

G. W. REED & BRO.,
205 Broadway, New York.

LIFE IN CHICAGO.
NELLIE ELLSWORTH;
OR,
THE LOYER FIEND.
A TALE OF LIFE IN CHICAGO.
BY EDWARD MINTURN.

In producing this startling and thrilling composition, by an author who seems alike at home on land and sea, and who portrays with equal skill the realities of life enjoyed by but few romancists, the publishers of have again struck a vein of the popular tide of sentiment which for months past has been steadily carrying them fortune and fame before it.

The New York Weekly

NELLIE ELLSWORTH;
OR,
THE LOVER FIEND,

in originality of plot and characters, as well as in startling effects and points, is the work of any of the author's previous efforts. Exhibiting the power of weak innocence struggling with and to conquer the vices in high and low life, showing the blackness of human depravity in contrast with angelic, yet mortal good, it teaches throughout a lesson which the most fastidious can but proclaim for good, pure, and enobling.

In the opening scene the villain of the life-drama exposes a part of his plot to a wretch weaker than himself, but for several chapters the mystery, which is only unveiled at the close, is merely hinted at, leaving the reader in a condition of breathless wonderment and uncertainty.

Malpleasant Germaine receives the brother of the heroine into exile and want, having no nobler aim in so doing than to ruin and possess his bride. To this end he aids in their migration from New York to Chicago, furnishing funds and presenting disinterested friendship. To carry out his plans he employs mercenary wretches to aid in their execution, and finally the artist, brother of Nellie, thrown into prison for passing counterfeit money, which his confederates have placed in his hands to assist him without his knowledge.

PIERCE ELLSWORTH,

But this villainy finds a powerful opponent in an eccentric but gifted young man, a kind of Jack-of-all-trades, where specialty is concerned, in behalf of a thousand strings.

A broken-down lawyer, whose necessities have made him a tool in the hands of Germaine, is the principal factor in aiding the charge of forgery on Pierce Ellsworth; and while doing so the lawyer discovers a mysterious connection between him and Nellie that the Ellsworths are heirs to an immense property: and thereupon having also discovered the secret, endeavors to possess himself of the estate.

It is impossible to allow the reader to further anticipate the events of this thrilling story; to be properly appreciated the story must be read in its close from the author's hand. The chapters are full of exciting incidents, and worthy the wonder of the eccentric Sonduang, a takes a foremost part. The close is dramatic in the extreme, and the fate of other works by the same versatile sanctuary the principal characters come out in strong light and brightness.

RAILROAD ENGINEER,

Mr. Minturn has in this work gone beyond his previous efforts, and gives token of holding a lofty literary position hereafter.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

now rapidly advancing to the circulation of

200,000 COPIES, will feel the demand for this story more palpably than in the yet fat fee call for other works by the same sacy, vigorous, and versatile writer. The literary sensation of the day is EDWARD MINTURN'S LAST AND BEST STORY,

NELLIE ELLSWORTH;
OR,
THE LOVER FIEND,

which will be commenced in No. 14 of the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
READY THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6.

☞ Every News Agent sells the New York WEEKLY.

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE No. 47 & 49 CLIFF & 42 & 44 FULTON St., New York, are now supplying families throughout the country with TEA, warranted in all cases purely pure as imported, at cargo prices, thus saving to them five or six profits and middlemen's bills, ranging from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound. Clubs can be formed in any city or town, by any person desiring to obtain, and to such as will take the trouble we will furnish them Teas and Coffees for their own use free of charge. On receipt of five per cent. on each order they send us. On application, we send, by mail, circulars containing a price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms to those in the trade.

We forward all goods, collect on delivery, by the express companies and agents of the Cash on Delivery Express Company, which will enable us to provide the Express charges equally among themselves.

Oolong (black), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00.
Mixed Green and Black, 60, 70, 80, $1 00.
Young Hyson (green), 60, 70, 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20.
Imperial (green), 80, 90, $1 00, $1 10.
English Breakfast (black), 80, 90, 00, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20.
Japan, 60, $1 00, $1 20.
Gunpowder, $1 20, $1 50.

We import a very superior quality of Kisangi Oolong and Moyune Young Hyson Teas, put up in original Chinese packages, which we sell at $1 50 per Oolong and $1 00 the Young Hyson, per package.

Ground Coffees, 20c., 25c., 30c. per pound. Best Old Government Java, ground, 40c.

All goods put up by us for our trade mark, and no others are genuine. Address all orders to

GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of
P. O. Box 374. 47 & 49 CLIFF, 42 & 44 FULTON St., New York.

HARD & BROTHERS,
GOLD PENS,
PEN AND PENCIL CASES, SILVER, RUBBER, and GOLD-PLATED TELESCOPIC PEN-CASES. TOOTH-PICKS, &c., &c.
JAMES HARD, Agent,
No. 32 Maiden Lane, New York.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS
Are pronounced by distinguished Painters, Poets, and Critics the best that are now made. We challenge the most critical examination of our Chromos in Oil —such as Tait's Groups, Bricher's Landscapes, Lessing's Rhine Scenes, Gorreggio's Magdalene, the Flower Bouquet, or the Kit's Play-Ground.

Our CHROMOS after WATER-COLORS are equally artistic. They are

WOOD MOUNT'S BIRDS. By Ellen Robbins. $1 50
BIRD'S NEST & LOUNGER. $1 50
(Companion Pictures.)
THE BABY. (After Bouguereau.) $3 00
THE SISTERS. $3 00
(Companion Pictures.)
THE BELFRIED. By Thos. Cruikshank. $3 00
THE LUNET. $3 00
(Companion Pictures.)

Of the last pictures George L. Brown, the celebrated American painter (unrivaled as a colorist and painter of atmospheric effects) says:

"I admire them much. I saw some splendid specimens in Europe, which were wonderful, but never dreamed that even their use was executed in the fine form. What particularly excites my admiration is the tender and delicate half tints, the high finish, and the rich and harmonious tone. I think they must do much to educate the public in the way of color. How the expense of these color lithographs we have been so shocked in seeing so long a time, I cannot imagine."—GEORGE L. BROWN.

Our Chromos are sent free to any address on receipt of price. Our Journal of Popular Art, explaining how Chromos are made, mailed free. Send for a copy.

L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

All the Family Sewing.

BARTLETT'S REVERSIBLE SEWING MACHINES are the cheapest and best machines. The style sold at $25 00 will do all the family sewing.

Illustrated Circulars sent free at the Bartlett Machine and Needle Depot, 569 Broadway.

HARPER'S WEEKLY FOR 1867,

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

HAVE NOW READY:

VOL. XI. OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Price, Bound in Cloth, $7 00; in Half Morocco, $10 50.

The Annual Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY, in neat cloth binding, will be sent by express, free of expense, for $7 00 each. Complete Sets, comprising Eight Volumes, sent on receipt of cash at the rate of $5 25 per vol., freight at expense of purchaser.

Our Historical Societies and Public Libraries should secure a complete set of the volumes of the WEEKLY for every year will add to their value as an illustrated record of the times.—North American Review, Boston, MASS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY may be narrowly declared the best illustrated newspaper in America, whether in or outside of Periodicals.—The Evening Telegraph, New York.

As a record of events and opinions, and a picture of the time, HARPER'S WEEKLY has a permanent value, while its variety of literature and essay make it one of the most readable and entertaining publications.—Boston Transcript, Boston, MASS.

Unlike most illustrated journals, HARPER'S WEEKLY has dignified itself as a work of literary ability of a high order, as well as artistic merit. Its political discussions are usually candid and conciliatory, and have done their share to educate the American people to a right understanding of their duties and dangers. It has earned for itself a right to the title, "A Journal of Civilization."—Round Table, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and money. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 16 cents.

DAVID WATSON, Agent, Adams Presses, 79 Courtlandt Street, New York.

CHASE'S IMPROVED DOLLAR MICROSCOPE. Address as all trader and professors. Agents wanted. Sample sent by mail on receipt of $1, with directions. Address C. N. CHASE, 41 Washington St., Boston, or FOWLER & WELLS, New York City.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every Kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

A NEW ORDER OF THINGS.

UNDER the present vicious system of trade, consumers of goods have to pay some two dollars for what they cost, owing to the number of hands through which they pass. We have, therefore, established a plan whereby consumers in the country can receive their goods, almost direct from first hands, and at a small advance only. Send for our Price List. A splendid chance is offered to Agents, who may be made, by addressing at once, GEO. THOMPSON & CO., 59 Hanover Street Boston, Mass.

Musical Instruction without Teacher.

WINNER'S METHODS for the Piano, Melodeon, Flute, Mcloelon, Cabinet Organ, Guitar, Accordeon, Bell, Violin, Violoncello, Clarionet, Cornet, English Breakfast (black), 80, 90, 00, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20. English Breakfast (black), 80, 90, 00, $1 00, $1 10, $1 20. Japan, 60, $1 00, $1 20. Gunpowder, $1 20, $1 50. We import a very superior quality of Kisangi Oolong and Moyune Young Hyson Teas, put up in original Chinese packages, which we sell at $1 50 per Oolong and $1 00 the Young Hyson, per package. Ground Coffees, 20c., 25c., 30c. per pound. Best Old Government Java, ground, 40c. All goods put up by us for our trade mark, and no others are genuine. Address all orders to GREAT UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE of P. O. Box 374. 47 & 49 CLIFF, 42 & 44 FULTON St., New York.

"Economy is Wealth."—Franklin.

WHY will people pay $50 or $100 for a Sewing Machine when one may be had for a mere trifle for all PRACTICAL purposes? Notwithstanding reports to the contrary, the subscribers beg to inform their numerous friends that the "FRANKLIN" and "MEDALLION" Machines can be had in any quantity. This Machine is a double thread, complete with Tucker, constructed upon entirely new principles, and DOES NOT infringe upon any other in the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of patrons will testify. AGENTS WANTED. Sample Machines sent to Agents on trial, and GIVEN AWAY to families who will purchase after a fair trial.

J. C. OTTIS & CO., Boston, Mass.

A Manual of Instruction in the art of

WOOD ENGRAVING

With a description of the necessary tools and apparatus, and directions for their use. With Illustrations. Sent free by mail, on receipt of 50 cents, by the publisher, JOSEPH WATSON, 80 Nassau Street, New York.

HOLIDAY JOURNAL—FREE.

16 LARGE PAGES of Parlor Plays, Magic Sports, 16 Games, Experiments, Problems, Puzzles, SENT FREE. Address ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

GREATEST WONDER and Miracle of the age. 12 cents a Package; $1 per dozen packages. Address WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., New York.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid, for 25 cts.; 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cts.; 10 Photographs Beauties for 25 cts.; 20 Actors for 25 cts. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

MARGARET'S ENGAGEMENT. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PLAITING FOR HIGH STAKES. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

GUILD COURT. A London Story. By GEORGE MACDONALD. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE BROTHERS' BET; or, Within Six Weeks. By EMILIE FLYGARE CARLEN. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

THE HUGHESDON FAMILY. By SARAH TYTLER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the Author of "Paul Ferroll." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CARLYON'S YEAR. By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

STONE EDGE. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

Sent by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine,

FEBRUARY, 1868.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by DINAH MULOCK CRAIK, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1865 was commenced the issue of "The Mountains," a Novel, by MISS WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "A Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Card and Crest," a Novel, by JAMES DE MILLE.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, with Volume commencing with the Number for June, 1865, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the WEEKLY or BAZAR will be furnished for Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, free of expense, by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is free to all MAGAZINE subscribers. The postage upon the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly in advance, at the office where received. Postage to the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 20 cents additional for each publication, to pre-pay the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be served from the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. Be particular to give the State. Both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $70—each Insertion; or, for a space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each Insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each Insertion.

546 Broadway.

"In the hours of our Happiness and Prosperity let us remember the Unfortunate and Disabled Soldiers who saved us a Country and a Nationality."—LINCOLN.

GRAND POPULAR MOVEMENT

TO ERECT THE

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM

FOR INVALID SOLDIERS,

UNDER A SPECIAL CHARTER FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, PASSED MARCH 6, 1867.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

The object of this Association is to provide, by public exertion, a NATIONAL HOME for our disabled Soldiers, to erect as a memorial for those who, in their patriotic devotion, saved their Country at the expense of working for their own maintenance. Fears for their Future Life have unnerved many, and, like the Napoleon; Thousand her Greenwich and Chelsea Hospitals, the former being one of the finest architectural structures ever devoted to charity. Russia, Prussia, and in fact, every European country has made magnificent provision for their unfortunate Soldiers. Monarchies provide for the alleviation of the suffering caused by war, but free, prosperous, Republican America has no place for her crippled and sick Soldiers but the county poor-house, or the cheerless alms of her crowded cities. These noble patriots left happy homes to save our common country in the hour of her deepest distress. We pledged to them our lasting gratitude, and now those who are unexpectedly called to us in their utter need to redeem those pledges. They have performed their part—shall we enjoy the result of their sacrifice? We must and do recreant to our manhood. Let us each devote but a single dollar to this purpose, and the Gettysburg Asylum will afford the Soldiers a Home, and our Country will be honored by the noble Institution.

THE LAND HAS BEEN PURCHASED

By this Association, and Ten Thousand Dollars have already been paid toward the preservation of the Battle-Ground; about thirty acres (adjoining the site of General Meade's Headquarters) have been set apart for the uses of the Asylum.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 15, 1868.

Whereas, the Supervisors of the Gettysburg Asylum for Invalid Soldiers have made due application to John H. Della, Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Collection District of the State of Pennsylvania, for permission to hold a Gift Festival, and presented to him satisfactory evidence that the proceeds of said Gift Festival will be devoted to charitable uses;

Permission is hereby granted to the said Supervisors to hold such Gift Festival, exempt from all charges whether Special tax or other duty in respect to said Gift Festival.

E. A. ROLLINS Commissioner.

LEXINGTON AVENUE, NEW YORK, October 26th, 1867.

Having labored for three years to erect a Home for our Crippled Veterans, and having passed a bill for that purpose in the New York Legislature (which they reconsidered and passed at the request of their constituents), under which bill no action has been had, from that time to this—and knowing the great and crying necessity of the case, I am capable of saving our disabled Soldiers from the horrors or beg, I hereby most cheerfully tender your enterprise, and it shall have all the aid of my tongue, pen, and influence.

CHAS. G. HALPINE.

Fully sympathizing with your great object, I tender you, gratuitously, the services of my Full Orchestra on the occasion of your Festival at Irving Hall.

THEODOR THOMAS.

From the Postmaster General of the United States.

I recommend to all Postmasters that they shall aid this truly benevolent and patriotic enterprise.

A. W. RANDALL.

Having perfect confidence in the integrity of your enterprise, and heartily indorsing your noble object, it affords me pleasure to tender you gratuitously the use of my show-window for the display of your diamonds.

W. H. SCHIEFFELIN, 39 Broadway.

We hereby certify that we have examined the Diamond Goods, Pearls, Emeralds, Rubies, and other precious Stones, as described in the list, and find them all genuine.

HENRY CLEWS, Diamond Importers, 30 Maiden Lane, New York.
J. HERMANN, Diamond Setter, 394 Broome Street, New York.

In order to promote public confidence in the management and disbursement of this great object, the Association has decided to place the $300,000 Worth of Diamonds on public exhibition in the show-window of the large Fur and Gift Establishment of John N. Genin, No. 513 Broadway (under the St. Nicholas Hotel), N. Y. The world-renowned Vault Heraldries has also been purchased. The Farm of 600 Acres presented to Sullivan County, N. Y., and is one of the finest Stock Farms in the State; has a splendid Mansion, and is complete in every particular.

There will be 1,700,000 tickets issued at one dollar each, similar to the holders to both of the

GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVALS!

One at IRVING HALL, New York, Saturday evening, February 8, 1868, and one at HORTICULTURAL HALL, Philadelphia, Saturday evening, February 22, 1868, on which latter occasion a Committee of Gentlemen will be selected by the Philadelphia Committee in making the distribution, to commence on Monday, February 24th, at 10 o'clock, A.M., at Horticultural Hall.

$641,950 in Valuable Presents

will be distributed among the Ticket-Holders, in accordance with the Charter and the following

SCHEDULE OF AWARDS.

1. 1 Grand Cash Award	$100,000	54. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	$1,500
2. 1 Splendid Mansion	60,000	55. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
3. 1 Yacht, the famous "Henrietta"	50,000	56. 1 Diamond Bracelet	1,500
4. 1 Diamond Necklace, 85 Diamonds	25,000	57. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
5. 1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings (all large diamonds)	25,000	58. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	1,500
6. 1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings (all large diamonds)	25,000	59. 1 Cameo Hair Shawl	1,500
7. 1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings	15,000	60. 1 Choice Emerald Stud	1,500
8. 1 Diamond Necklace, 39 Brilliants, Star Setting	8,000	61. 1 Single Stone Pin	1,500
9. 1 Diamond Necklace, 39 Brilliants	8,000	62. 1 Single Stone Pin	1,500
10. 1 Diamond Cross, set in Silver (large diamonds)	7,000	63. 1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	1,500
11. 1 Diamond Studs, 15 Brilliants	6,000	64. 1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-Rings	1,500
12. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	6,000	65. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	800
13. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	6,000	66. 1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring	800
14. 1 Diamond and Turf Cameo Bracelet, Brooch, and Ear-rings	6,000	67. 1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet, Ear-Rings, and Brooch	800
15. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	4,000	68. 1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-Rings	800
16. 1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	69. 1 Camel's Hair Shawl	800
17. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000	70. 1 Diamond and Ruby Three Stone Ring	800
18. 1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	71. 1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring	800
19. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch and Ear-rings	4,000	72. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	800
20. 1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	73. 1 Pair Diamond Cluster Studs	800
21. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch and Ear-rings	4,000	74. 1 Diamond and Ruby Horse Chain	800
22. 1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	75. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring, Star setting	600
23. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch and Ear-rings	4,000	76. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	600
24. 1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	77. 1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	600
25. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000	78. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	500
26. 1 Diamond Single Stone Scarf Pin	4,000	79. 1 Pair Diamond and Ruby Ear-Rings	500
27. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000	80. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	400
28. 1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet	4,000	81. 1 Diamond and Emerald Stem Pin	400
29. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	3,800	82. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	400
30. 1 Diamond Emerald Cluster Brooch	3,800	83. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	350
31. 1 Pearl Necklace	3,500	84. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	300
32. 1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-rings	3,500	85. 1 Diamond and Opal Ring	300
33. 1 Diamond Cross	3,000	86. 1 Diamond and Ruby Cluster Ring	250
34. 1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	3,000	87. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	250
35. 1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	3,000	88. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	250
36. 1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-rings	3,000	89. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	250
37. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	3,000	90. 1 Diamond Ring	250
38. 1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	3,000	91. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	250
39. 1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Studs	3,000	92. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	200
40. 1 Diamond Brooch (in Silver)	3,000	93. 1 Gent's Diamond and Amethyst Ring	150
41. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000	94. 1 Diamond Ring	100
42. 1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	3,000	95. 1 Cameo & Pearl Brooch and Ear-Rings	100
43. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	2,500	96. 1 Cameo Brooch	100
44. 1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	2,500	97. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	100
45. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	2,500	98. 1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	100
46. 1 Diamond and Emerald Brooch	2,500	99. 1 Ladies' Gold Watch	75
47. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	2,500	100. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	50
48. 1 Pearl Breast-Pin, Ear-Rings, and Head Ornament	2,500	101. 1 Pair Garnet Sleeve Buttons	50
49. 1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,500	102. 1 Pair Diamond Scarf Pins	50
50. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	2,500	103. 1 Emerald Scarf Pin	50
51. 1 Diamond Cluster Ring	2,500	104. 1 Diamond Ring	50
52. 1 Diamond and Emerald Ornament	2,500	105–1164. 1060 Copies of the splendidly illustrated Presentation Work entitled the "Tribute-Book," at $30 each	31,800
53. 1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,500	1165–2765. 1600 Photographic Albums, at $8	8,000
54. 1 Single Stone Diamond Ring	1,500	2766–4316. 1551 Cash Presents, $1 each	1,551
55. 1 Diamond Cross	1,500	Making in the Aggregate 118,164 Presents, valued at	641,950
56. 1 Pair Diamond Cluster Ear-Rings	1,500

HOW TO OBTAIN TICKETS.

Orders may be sent to us in registered letters or post-office orders, in sums from $1 to $25 at our risk. Larger amounts should be sent in Drafts or by Express at the following Club Rates:

5 Tickets to one address	$ 4 50	40 Tickets to one address	$35 00
10 "	9 00	50 "	45 50
20 "	17 00	100 "	85 00

Address all orders and communications to

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM ASSOCIATION,
546 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, or
PHILADELPHIA OFFICE, 1116 CHESTNUT STREET.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., Removed from 42 to 37 and 39 Nassau St., Opposite the P. O.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIOIDE WATCH FACTORY.

ORIOIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the finest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a full set of Jewels, and time. For accuracy, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times the price. Each one small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance and wear to the finest, and good for time, as a gold one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, as well made in those of gold, from $5 to $8. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be collected by the express agent delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges both ways.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N.Y. Opposite P.O. (up stairs.)

TESTIMONIALS.

From the Philadelphia Press.

THE OROIDE WATCH.—By reference to the advertisement of Messrs. Collins & Co., it will be seen that the firm claims to give a really good watch, with good worthy, also one of sterling value, for fifteen dollars, to be as exactly used these watches and found them good and cheap—two having been purchased at retail price by gentlemen of this office—and are satisfied that they are fully what Messrs. Collins & Co. represent them to be. Their lovely small proportion of gold, and we know of no other article so cheap which could be made so much to the very small proportion of gold which is given in most of the so-called gold watches of the present day renders them practically of a much greater value than oroide.

C. E. Collins & Co., Nassau Street, New York:

GENTS,—I have just seen one of your gold fifteen dollar ($15) watches, and must have one immediately. You will please ship me by express your earliest convenient time. Enclosed find one hundred and fifty dollars ($150). I get as good a watch for this one I have just seen I can make a good trade for you in this part of the country.

Yours respectfully, J. S. COLGOON, Kilmarnic and Gulf Railway, Georgia.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, January 19, 1868.

GENTS,—I have carried one of your oroide watches some time. It keeps good time, and keeps its color good. I am well pleased with it. Miss is a large size, at $15. Please send me one of the ladies' size.

A. B. BRUSH, 256 So. Desplains, Chicago, Illinois.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: FORT SCHUYLER, NEW MEXICO, December 28, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—I have received your chain per express, for which I am much obliged to you. It is a very neat chain, and I am much pleased with it. Miss is a large size, at $15 each. And therefore I enclose you $30, by express, to Fort Union, New Mexico, where I will receive it from the express agent. Please send me and pay all expenses. I have no doubt but I will be able to send you several more orders when the watches are seen here.

Yours respectfully, J. R. BOLTON, Quartermaster Sergeant, Co. "F," 37th U. S. Infantry.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS, December 21, 1867.

SIRS,—Please send me one more of your oroide watches. I received the watch you sent, and it is much obliged for such a good timepiece. Very respectfully, PATRICK D. CORNIGAN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., New York: FARMINGTON, IOWA, December 29, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—I am much pleased with the watches, and conclude I need to keep them both. There is another order on the way for you, sent on my account. Hoping the above may be satisfactory, and expecting to send three soon, I remain, Yours truly,

Messrs. Collins & Co.: PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, January 19, 1868.

GENTLEMEN,—We are very much pleased with the watches, and have no hesitancy in recommending them generally. Highly approve of your advertisement in our paper will do you much good, &c., &c. M. WEAL, Notary Office.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: BLACKSHEAR, GEORGIA, December 27, 1867.

GENTLEMEN,—You will please send me one of your oroide hunting watches by express to Blackshear, Ga.—No. 9, A. S. size. Enclosed find $15. I saw the watch you sent to Mr. Campbell, which I am very well satisfied. I think you will be patronized if you hold out and prove to be genuine. I would be pleased to be your agent if I would be any help to you. There will be quite a number here that will send for watches if I am.

Respectfully yours, E. F. SWEAT.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: FORT UNION, NEW MEXICO, December 28, 1867.

SIRS,—It affords me pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 2d inst., and I will give notice that if you forgot to send me the $5 chain. You will have more orders from me before long. Yours respectfully,

JAMES DILLON, "A" Co., 9d Cavalry, Fort Union, New Mexico Office.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: TOPEKA, KANSAS, January 4, 1868.

SIRS,—The watch came safely to hand to-day. I think it will prove all I expected. Please send me one ladies' size, similar to the one I have. Yours, &c., 1st Merchants' Union Express, Topeka, Shawnee Co., Kansas. O. W. WINES.
GEORGE W. WINES.

A SUPERB LIKENESS of MR. CHARLES DICKENS adorns the cover of Mr. J. R. THOMAS'S new song,

"GOD BLESS US EVERY ONE."

Words by Geo. Cooper. Price 50c. Copies mailed. Wm. A. Pond & Co., 547 Broadway.

Up-Town Store, 840 Broadway.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make all kinds of Patent Medicines, Perfumery, Toilet Articles, Cosmetics, Candies, Wines, Cordials, Soaps, Dyes, and hundreds of other articles in daily demand. Ready made, and sold at large profits. Sent postpaid for 25 cents, by O. A. ROORBACH, No. 122 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $8, $15, $30, $60, $120, $225, $350, $500. Price $10, $20, $30, $70. Send for circular to LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 39 Water St., Boston.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents by W. HEPBURNE, 102 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

PHOTOGRAPHS—All kinds. Samples, 25c. Address A. SEYMOUR & CO., Box 27, STATION A, NEW YORK.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, and they are selling at the following low prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ℔.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ℔.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, best $1 50 ℔.
IMPERIAL (green), 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔.
GUNPOWDER, $1, $1 10, $1 25 ℔.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize by using our Ground Coffee and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 60c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within ten days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices as if residing in the immediate vicinity of our warehouses, and thoroughly assured that they are not paying any unnecessary middlemen's profits.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the newspapers or in our circulars. Send in your orders, kinds, and amounts wanted on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, and there need be no confusion in their distribution—each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equally among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

ARISTOCRATIC DISTINCTION.

INQUIRING COLORED INDIVIDUAL. "Sam, what do you s'poses dey does wid dem ashes?"
EXPERIENCED DITTO. "Why, dey takes and dey sifts 'em out, and dey picks 'em over, and dey sells 'em to de lower classes."

BEGGAR WHO HAS EXPECTED COPPERS.—"Do you mean to say as you've brought a poor Covey down the Airey Steps a purpose to give him a Cold Sandwich without Mustard?"

Our Entire Stock

IS NOW OFFERED AT

REDUCED PRICES,

In view of our REMOVAL up town in the Spring.

WHITE CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 143 pieces, $30.

PLATED WARE FROM ROGERS, SMITH & CO.

GOLD-EDGE TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $30.

DECORATED TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $11.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 479 Broadway.
4 doors below Broome Street.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Square, & Upright Piano-Fortes,

were awarded at the Paris Expedition the First Grand Prize, the Legion of Honor and a Grand Gold Medal, making 61 first premiums during the past 44 years.

WAREROOMS, No. 652 BROADWAY.

TURNER'S TIC DOULOUREUX OR Universal Neuralgia PILLS.

A SAFE CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.

Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00; three packages, $2.50; four packages, $3.00. Postage, 24 cents.

TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

PATENT OFFICES.

Inventors who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Three Twenty Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A Pamphlet containing full instructions to inventors, is sent free.

☞ A handsome Bound Volume, containing 150 Mechanical Engravings, and the United States Census by Counties, with Hints and Receipts for Mechanics, mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address

MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. Babbitt's Lion Coffee." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "Aromatically" under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is sufficient to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a One Dollar Gold Piece. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.

B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum Goods, 97 John St., near Nassau, and 692 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 3546.

Parlor Fireworks.

New, Brilliant, and Harmless. Splendid Evening Amusement. Boxes assorted. From the reliable XLCR Firework Manufactory. $3 and $5 per Box.
W. H. SCOFIELD, 9 Dey St., New York.

Your Savings will make you Rich.

What is the use of paying Ten to Twenty Cents per pound for poor Soap, when you can have the best of White Hard Soap, and only cost you Two Cents a pound? Make your own Soap with GEO. F. GANTZ & CO'S PURE WHITE ROCK POTASH. One Pound makes Fifteen Pounds of Soap. It is for sale by all 68 1 Cup of Coffee.
Office, 62 Pine Street, New York.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.

New Designs, $1 50 postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD,
ARCHITECT, 191 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

GOLD PENS.

Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Remitting at 30 cents each by mail. Manufactory 18 Maiden Lane. E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

J. C. HULL'S SON, New York.

BAY RUM SOAP

Over 100 Styles Toilet Soaps. NONE BETTER IMPORTED.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

Fifty per cent. or more saved on Dry Goods of every description. Every package $1. Send for descriptive circular. SYMONDS & CO., 129 Chambers St., N. Y.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York,

Importer and Manufacturer of

Fashionable Furnishing Goods, Hosiery, Gloves, and Under Wear, For Ladies.

☞ Orders by mail will receive prompt attention.

A Horse Doctor Free.

SICK AND INJURED ANIMALS CURED GRATIS.

WILKES' SPIRIT OF THE TIMES, the great Family, Sporting, and Literary Weekly Paper of the United States, employs a distinguished Veterinarian Professor, who gives advice and prescriptions, through its columns, free, to all inquiries concerning Sick or Injured Horses or Cattle sent to the paper by mail. The cures of hundreds of valuable animals attest the importance of this department of the SPIRIT. Replies are made promptly to all inquiries, whether from subscribers or not. No horse-owner or Veterinary student should be without the SPIRIT. Single copies 10 cts. for sale at the news-stands. Subscriptions $5 a year. Address, Enclose "WILKES' SPIRIT," New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Ready:

I.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL:

Our Life in the Highlands.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

II.

THE THIRD VOLUME OF MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

III.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Portraits. New Edition. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

IV

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

V.

DUFF'S BOOK-KEEPING, by Single and Double Entry. Practically Illustrating Merchants', Manufacturers', Private Bankers', Railroad, and National Bank Accounts, including all the late Improvements in the Science. With a Complete Index. By P. DUFF, formerly Merchant, Founder and Proprietor of Duff's Mercantile College, Pittsburgh, Pa. 20th Edition, Enlarged and Revised. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

VI.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By LUCY RANDALL COMFORT. With Engravings. Square 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

VII.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 31 to February 21, 1867, Inclusive. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

VIII.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Puncies, Addresses, and Dilemmas, Indexed with a Full Treatise on Epistolary Correspondence and a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $2 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

IX.

MACÉ'S FAIRY BOOK. Home Fairy Tales (Contes du Petit-Château). By JEAN MACÉ, Author of "The Servants of the Stomach," &c. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH, Translator of "Martin's History of France," "Duruy's History of Rome," &c. With Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

"Upham's Fresh Meat Cure for Consumption and Bronchial Affections, as prescribed and recommended by Physicians all over the country, and used in my own practice with other remedies combined. A trial will convince the most skeptical. $1 a bottle; six for $5. Sent by Express. Circulars free. Sold by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth St., Philada., and all Druggists.

PRINCE & COS. AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.

Forty thousand are now in use

BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

Agents Wanted.

FOUNTAIN PEN. Non-corrosive; Durable; Warranted. Writes three pages with one dipping. Sells rapidly at a dollar. Sample Box, $1 Retail. Twenty to 25 Boxes for $2. Address MORSE FOUNTAIN PEN CO., 64 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,

And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 581.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE GREAT FIRE IN CHICAGO.

THE most destructive fire which has ever visited Chicago occurred in that city on the night of January 28. The loss to property is at least four times greater than that of the great fire of 1839, which broke out on Lake Street, just west of the river, and burned over four blocks. It also greatly exceeds in destructiveness the terrible Lake Street fire of 1857, though happily unattended by the sickening loss of human life which rendered that conflagration memorable. Of this last most disastrous conflagration we give a sketch from the pencil of Mr. W. B. BAIRD.

The origin of the fire is not positively ascertained. A few minutes before seven o'clock in the evening three men were seen to emerge from the stairway leading to the floors above the bookstore of S. C. GRIGGS & Co., and a few seconds afterward the building was discovered, from the volumes of smoke issuing from the windows and doors, to be on fire. It is evident that they have a model fire-department in Chicago, for it appears that the steam fire-engines were on the spot before the slightest ray of flame had burst from the building. But the fire within had obtained such headway that it was impossible to subdue the flames before they had destroyed the building and extended to others adjoining.

Every person who has visited Chicago has seen and admired "Burch's Building" on the corner of Lake Street and Wabash Avenue, giving, as it did, evidence not only of the architectural taste but the prosperity of the city, which only forty years ago was a wilderness well-nigh impracticable. "Burch's Building" was a five-story iron-front business block, and its beauty and strength rendered it an ornament to the city. The fire of January 28 reduced it to a mass of ruins. Within an hour after it had begun a fierce gale of wind from the west had driven the fire entirely through the building to Wabash Avenue, and within another hour the Wabash Avenue front was also destroyed.

While the fire was at its height in the Burch Building a flake of fire descended into an area of No. 20, on the north side of Lake Street, between Wabash and Michigan avenues, and coming in contact with a stock of dry-goods, another conflagration was almost instantly in full blast. The fire speedily communicated with the highly combustible contents of BURNHAMS & VAN SCHAACK'S wholesale drug-store, adjoining on the east, and, notwithstanding the desperate efforts of the firemen, the flames reached across the alley, and within an hour another five-story marble-front block, extending east to Michigan Avenue, was in ruins, as was also an adjacent building to the north, on Michigan Avenue.

But for the fact that a recent snow-storm had rendered the roofs of buildings fire-proof, the conflagration would have been much more disastrous. Such continuous showers of sparks and myriads of flaming torches were never before seen driving through the air. The adjoining streets were aglow with living coals of fire that rained down to the terror of over-coats and furs, while out over the lake, as far as the eye could reach, could be traced the flight of the fiery shower.

THE GREAT FIRE IN CHICAGO, JANUARY 28, 1868.—[SKETCHED BY W. B. BAIRD.]

The total loss by this fire will reach $2,000,000.

TO A YOUNG WIDOW.

THERE is a young widow, bewitching and fair,
Who lives in a mansion that looks on the Square.
I guess by her shadow wherever I dare—
The policemen already suspiciously stare
With a sound that says plainly, "You'd better take care!"—
While glancing to see if my charmer is there.
But whether she wishes my feelings to spare,
Or has gone to the country to visit her mare,
Or has taken a journey to see something rare,
Or has gone down to Richmond—Oh Southern beware
Of our soft, winning eyes and her rich, glossy hair!
And her figure so graceful, like lilies that bear
The dew gems of morning. And then to conquer
The tones of her voice to the birds of the air,
Were to flout heaven. Well, I forgot before,
All the rest of her sex for her sake I forswear,
Though it lead to misfortune and end in despair.
Like the moth who is blinded at night by the glare
Of the candle till lost in the dazzling flare—
Yet whatever may be, that thing will I dare,
To be near that young widow who lives by the Square.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1868.

NATIVE AND NATURALIZED CITIZENS.

THE most prominent topic of public interest since the introduction of the new Reconstruction law is the bill for the protection of naturalized citizens reported by Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It was the subject of a very pointed speech from Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in which he declared that he wished the United States to lay down the rule that naturalization is equivalent to birth in the country. But, as he plainly shows, if this is the object of the Committee it is not reached by the bill, for the first section, after announcing that all naturalized citizens shall be equally protected with natives during their sojourn in foreign states, proceeds to authorize the President to use all the power of the Government to secure the recognition by other countries of the principles of public law in the matter of naturalization which have been always maintained by the United States. The word "maintained," however, was wisely stricken out in the House by the Chairman and "asserted" substituted.

The truth is, that we have "maintained" no principle whatever upon the subject. The Judiciary has been always inclined to follow the rule of the English Common Law. If a naturalized citizen returns to his native country, the United States have not protected him against claims due as a foreign subject before his naturalization here. We have before quoted Mr. WHEATON'S reply when Minister in Berlin to a Prussian naturalized in the United States and who went to Prussia upon business, to protect him from the Prussian claim of military service. Mr. WHEATON told him that he had said in the United States or had gone to any country but Prussia he would have been protected; but when he returned to Prussia "your name, domicile and national character revert." This was in 1840; but as late as 1853 Mr. EVERETT, Secretary of State, took the same ground in a letter to Mr. BANCROFT, Minister to Prussia. Mr. WEBSTER held the same view. Mr. CASS, Secretary of State in 1859, confined the foreign jurisdiction over the naturalized citizen to the case of actual residence or escape from the country after having been regularly drafted into the army by the Government. There is no principle involved in the conduct of our Government except that a foreign Government may have valid claims upon a naturalized citizen.

The second section of the new bill provides that if any naturalized citizen shall be arrested in a foreign state without charge of crime, and his release unreasonably delayed, the President may arrest and detain any subject of that state who may be found among us. The absurdity of this provision will doubtless occasion its modification. But why report absurd provisions at all?

The London Times, in discussing the subject, is very far from agreeing with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. "The only doubt," it says, is not whether the natural-born subject, although naturalized elsewhere, may be treated as a subject upon his return to the native soil, but whether, having changed his country and renounced his allegiance, he ought not "to be placed on the same footing with foreigners as regards his proceedings upon a foreign soil." This is evidently illogical, for if there can be no alienation of allegiance by expatriation, the subject conspiring in America is exactly as guilty as if in England, and should be seized whenever he comes within reach of the group of the English authority. If he be still a subject, he is wholly a subject. If he be wholly a subject, he is every where in the world entitled to the protection and supervision of his Government, and every where his offences against it are of the same relative character. The Times sees this, and owns that if all persons born in the United Kingdom own a life-long allegiance to Her Majesty, they have an equal title to her protection, and that, consequently, she is bound to watch over the interests of Irishmen domiciled in the United States. It confesses that this is not supposable. But how does it avoid the other conclusion, that if Her Majesty is not bound to protect him they are no longer her subjects? This is the inevitable results of its theories, and it hobbles out of the dilemma by declaring that England has no desire or occasion to punish American Fenians, and no power of punishing them until they arrive within the kingdom.

The New York World has a highcockolorum dispatch from Washington that Great Britain must accept Mr. JOHNSON'S "ultimatum," or war will be declared by the United States. There will be no war between the United States and England until the best and wisest men in both countries have exhausted every honorable and practicable method of settling all differences between them. Our situation admonishes us to avoid a foreign war, and to insist that the solution of England imperatively forbids her to think of it. The duty of every faithful citizen and journal in this country is to moderate not to exasperate any hostility of feeling that may exist. The tone of the letters of "Historicus" upon this subject to the London Times, for instance, is much milder and more humane than that of most of the orators and journals who discuss it upon our side. Indeed there is not such consistency in our maintenance of our assertion upon this subject hitherto that we can now take a supercilious tone. If Great Britain has never logically maintained her position of perpetual allegiance, neither have we insisted upon or supported principle of the absolute right of expatriation, and there is hardly a supposable calamity to civilization greater than that of a war between the United States and England to settle this or any other difference.

CITIES IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

AFTER a long and most earnest debate the Constitutional Convention of New York has disposed of the question of City Government—and substantially as we had wished. The State will retain its right, by its immediate authority, to keep the peace of the great city. The extraordinary proposition of the Majority Report, that the Mayor should be elected for three years, with the right of appointing and removing the heads of all departments, and that the Legislature should be forbidden to create new districts, for purposes of taxation, without consent, the article as adopted provides for the election of a Mayor, who is to see that the duties of the various city officers are faithfully performed, and who shall have access to their books and papers. He shall have power to remove such city officers for violation or neglect of duty, whether elected or appointed, "but only with reasonable notice, a copy of charges, and an opportunity to be heard in defense." The rest of the article, which is very short, is mainly the provision of the present Constitution.

The debate was as interesting as it was animated, and the question became somewhat a party division, although a very few sincere Republicans felt it to be their duty to go with the Democrats. The Majority Report, which was a scheme virtually to separate the city of New York from the State, was supported by the chairman of the committee, Mr. IRA HARRIS, Mr. ALFORD, Mr. ERASTUS BROOKS, Mr. A. LAWRENCE, Mr. SCHUMACHER, Mr. DALY, Mr. VAN PELT, Mr. BOOT, Mr. BOSWORTH, Mr. GENESSOR, and Mr. GROSS. It was opposed by Mr. MARTIN J. TOWNSEND, Mr. J. M. FRANCIS, Mr. MILLER, Mr. HAND, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. ADRIANCE, Mr. STRATTON, Mr. OPDYKE, Mr. HITCHINS, and Mr. CURTIS. The general argument of those who supported the Report was that the city of New York has the inherent right to local self-government with every other similar division of the State; that although the city is taxed for police and other purposes for the purposes of the money; that the State care is expensive and intolerable, and will throw out of power in the State the party under whose auspices the present system of State care was introduced.

The argument of the opponents of the Report was, that a city is but a State organization for a specific purpose; that the power delegated to the city by the State must be regulated by reason and experience; that the exceptional character of the city of New York requires the system of police, for instance, which will best subserve the common welfare of the State; that the Mayor was appointed by the State until about 1830; that after twenty-five or thirty years' experience the city, without regard to party, asked for a change, and that in obedience to that request and from a profound conviction of the necessity of the change police was established by the State. The whole subject, it was argued, was one of expediency, and nothing could be more inexpedient than for the State to tie its hands. The expenses of the present system of State care, it was contended, are not extravagant, and the figures and statistics were produced in proof. Every Fire Insurance Company here four asks for the retention of the present fire system; every Life Insurance Company for that of the Health Board. As for party ascendancy, it must take its chance. No man who is sincerely a Republican, it was said, would be willing to buy the victory of his party at the price of giving the protection of the property and of the most defenseless inhabitants of the city into the hands of a police appointed by a Mayor elected by the grog-shops.

There was one remarkable argument urged by the Chairman of the Committee in support of his article. It was, that if the citizens of New York will exercise the trouble to be active in city government, they must suffer the consequences. With the facts before him, can any man seriously suppose that a majority of the municipal voters would elect officers who would fairly discharge the first duty of good government, that of equal personal protection? Does the Chairman suppose that under his system there are not districts in the city in which no vote could be polled distasteful to the majority of voters there? His system, as Mr. HENRY C. MURPHY of Brooklyn said in his Minority Report, would make the Mayor an autocrat who would name his successor.

With this article and that on State Prisons the most important questions before the Convention are disposed of. When the question upon striking out the section of the Report which forbade the Legislature to interfere in the city by any commission whatever was about to be decided, Mr. DALY repeated what Mr. VERPLANCK and Mr. GROSS had already declared, that unless it were passed the Constitution would receive the solid opposition of the Democratic vote of New York and Brooklyn. But the Convention struck out the section, and that its duty was to consider the general welfare of the State, and the section was stricken out.

The whole subject now rests with the people of the State at the next election. If they choose to repeal the laws which establish the present Police, Fire, Health, and Central Park Boards, they will do so. The Convention declined to repeal those laws in the new Constitution; and it also declined to insert in that instrument a complete system of city government. Its action is the best that could be, or to be so just and wise that we are very sure it will be approved by intelligent citizens every where in the State.

THE VOLUME OF THE CIRCULATION.

THE question is under discussion in Congress, and in all financial circles what will be the effect on the price of commodities of increasing or diminishing the quantity of paper-money? Will prices rise or fall in the same proportion? A contemporary assails the theory that they thus rise or fall, on the ground that the price of gold, which between 1862 and 1867 fluctuated violently, did not at any time correspond with the quantity of paper-money in existence. Gold was 250 on the 30th June, 1864, and was only 144 on the 1st October, 1865, although at the latter period the volume of paper was much larger. It will at once be discovered, from these dates, that between the two periods the surrender of Lee's army occurred. When gold was at 250 the country was depressed by the condition of belligerent affairs, and when it was at 144 the war had been ended and confidence in its early restoration had been secured. It may safely be assumed that the price of gold, which reached 285, measured by greenbacks, was due more to other causes than to the quantity of the latter.

JOHN ADAMS furnished to the COMTE DE VERGENNES, in 1780, some of the prices then charged for articles in Massachusetts in the Continental money of that day. "Salt, which costs very little in Europe, and used to be sold for a shilling a bushel, is $40 a bushel, and in some of the other States three times. Linens, which cost two livres a yard in France, $40 a yard." In the same year $500 and $1000 were offered for one dollar in specie. The Confederate currency sank to nothing after the surrender of General LEE.

In order to ascertain clearly the effect on the price of commodities of the abundance or scarcity of paper-money, the question should be considered in relation to money not issued in paper. In that case a long experience may be appealed to, and much light may also be derived from the abundance or scarcity which from time to time have occurred with the precious metals. Europe was stirred into great activity in mining for the precious metal during a portion of the Middle Ages, but for many years before the discovery of America the quantity mined did not keep pace with the increase of other productions. In the century after the discovery of America the quantity of gold and silver poured into Europe nearly, if not quite, quadrupled what was in circulation. This period was succeeded by one of inactivity until the discovery of gold and silver in California and Australia, which stimulated the mines to activity in the production of those metals.

The uniform testimony of historians is, that the prices of commodities declined for some years prior to the discovery of America, and that on the contrary, in the century following that event, they had quadrupled, keeping pace with the production of gold and silver. The isolation of Europe at that time from the populations and trade of the Eastern World, with its exclusive reliance on the metallic currency, its tolerably steady progress in industry, afforded an excellent opportunity for ascertaining with much precision the effect on prices of an increase of the precious metals. All other things being equal, like results would now be produced from the same policy, but the exception to any general rule on this subject, which in our day must be taken into view, are very numerous, and especially so far as the rule concerns paper-money in the United States.

Money travels faster than ever before, and we have been told that a nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling. That less money is required to do the same work that formerly is due to the creation of railroads, to the telegraph, to the substitution of one issuer of undoubted credit for many not so, to the concentration of money in banks, to the use of checks and drafts instead of bank bills, and to clearing-houses. The substitution of machinery for manual labor in nearly all the departments of our industry increases the mass of products, and so lowers the price that it becomes difficult to say how much of that price is due to facilities of production, and how much to the quantity of money in use. It was supposed by many up to the very time of gathering our late abundant crop that production of agriculture would be cheap; but it is found that, although we usually carried over from fifty to sixty million dollars' worth of grain, the quantity held in the South Union will be to the new harvest as that exceed ten millions of dollars in value, and that the consumption of the new crop was commenced immediately and on a large scale, and particularly in the South, which was suffering from famine. Until we carry over the usual surplus, and have in addition a good crop, the country will buy sparingly, and the question in doubt to many, how much of the depreciation in goods is due to that abstinence, and how much to the condition of the currency.

Thus much, the paper currency was referred to an unusual height by the extreme necessities of the war—gold having been expelled as the basis of the circulating medium—and people are at a loss to know what policy will be pursued at Washington—whether to expand with the probability of repudiation; to contract, with the fear of loss to debtors, if violent, or to stand still in masterly inactivity, with the danger to those in power which arises from having no fixed policy. Balances are consequently hoarded by timid capitalists, and others fail, notwithstanding the great abundance of money. The universal fear of contraction indulged in by the debtor class is proof of the general opinion that diminishing the quantity of money affects injuriously their means of payment.

The experience of the world since the establishment of the Bank of England in 1694, is more confusing on the question discussed, inasmuch as by the introduction of paper-money the convenience of having a direct exchange of equivalents—for such was the case when gold and silver were paid for other productions of labor—became, in fact, an exchange of what was valuable in labor for a promise to pay equivalent. The question always arises, what value is there in the promise? How and when will it be fulfilled? BACON, in his valuable work on the precious metals, referring to the first multiplication of these promises in the shape of paper, issued under the authority of all commercial powers, had predicted the effect—that before the discovery of gold and silver in California and Australia—of stopping or greatly reducing production in the chief mines of the world, there was the gap we have described which existed between the increasing promises to pay gold and silver and the diminishing means of redemption. The certainty of being able, sooner or later, results always from that condition of affairs, and of itself causes an addition to the price of commodities, which is further augmented by increasing quantity of such paper.

But making allowance for the effect of these and other like exceptions, and the rule must undoubtedly be that prices fall or rise in the proportion in which money is diminished or increased.

"NEW DOMINION" BITTERS.

THE present prospects for a firm establishment of the Canadian Confederation upon a permanent basis are not very encouraging. The tone of the speeches and newspaper comments on both sides of the Atlantic show that its ultimate failure is regarded as quite within the limits of possibility. Even those who were the most earnest and sanguine promoters of the Union are now disheartened and perplexed by the difficulties that attend the experimental working of their ponderous machine. The policy thus far pursued by the Government has not tended to harmonize the conflicting elements. The Orange and rural burgess of Confederation are unequally distribut-

cal. Local interests clash more vehemently than before, and the ascendency of political partisanship has become more embittered.

Under these prognostics of the coming disorder the territorial expansion of the two realms has not been rapid. The only progress thus far made is the securing a vote of Vancouver's Island favorable to joining the Confederation (which goes as far toward a consolidation of British America as the annexation of the rock of Gibraltar might do). As regards those provinces which have thus far stood aloof from the "new nationality" the most powerful arguments have failed to induce them to enter the union; while as respects the victimized provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the sublime logic can not convince them that their condition has been improved by the closer connection with Canada. Seven months of patient waiting have been barren of those extraordinary advantages which were promised to these unwilling partners in the magnificent scheme.

Taken as a unit the Confederation has lost ground. Its business has suffered, its revenues have diminished, and its expenses have increased. Labor is a drug, wages are reduced, poverty pinches, and emigration is depopulating large districts. Respecting Canada herself (that is, the present Provinces of Ontario and Quebec) she has derived from the Union the unquestionable advantage of the assistance of the Lower Provinces in paying her enormous debts. Her manufactures enjoy an enormous full competition with those of the Lower Provinces, and she not only compels her neighbors to purchase her manufactures, but her ships also. She grabs all their surplus revenue through the central office at the seat of government, and reaps the benefit of the disbursement of the public moneys for salaries and the expenses of the general government at Ottawa. Politically, Canada has gained nothing, for the strife between parties representing the double nationality of its people still continues; only the questions in dispute have taken new shape—and perhaps the more objectionable one of annexation to the United States.

But the Union which Canada threatens to break up the imperfectly-formed union his eyes at in the Lower Provinces. One of these (New Brunswick) entered into the alliance against her firm convictions, and after consideration of a negative vote. Nova Scotia was dragged in by force. The compulsory change in the circumstances of these two provinces is well calculated to excite discontent, disaffection, and threatened secession. For many years they had enjoyed a remarkable degree of prosperity and exemption from the financial necessity of other peoples—secure in their chartered rights, enjoying an elective franchise and a responsible government as beneficent as those of the adjoining republics. Free from debt and taxation, with their own Custom-houses and their low tariffs, applying themselves with thrift and enterprise to the development of their extensive resources, and the establishment of internal steam communication, they had gradually acquired a wealth and condition of ease that made them envied. Since 1859 their internal improvements equaled in cost and usefulness those of the entire previous half century. Railroads and steamers connected all the provinces, and extended to the United States, so as to facilitate commercial intercourse in every possible way. Consequently, Yankee capital poured in abundantly, and was so largely invested in mining and manufactures that it threatened soon to control those important interests. Americans were foremost in almost every enterprise. The prospect was brilliant.

The repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty inflicted serious injury, and crushed many speculative ventures in the bud. What injury that measure failed to inflict Confederation has accomplished. The coal product of Nova Scotia has fallen off two-thirds since 1866; the gold mining interest is almost at a dead stand; shipbuilding is very dull, and general industry is paralyzed; workmen are demanding higher wages; starving fishermen are appealing to the Government for relief; money is tighter than it ever was before; real estate is inactive, and commerce languishes. Only a few weeks ago, four lines of steamers running from Halifax to Glasgow gave very opportunely suspended for lack of support. Besides, an obnoxious postal bill is soon to go into effect, and a 15 per cent. tariff on the necessaries of life. Sugar is to be severely taxed; there is to be a tax on newspapers, a 15 per cent. duty on printing paper, and a 15 per cent. duty on types! Is it strange that the Bluenoses kick under such unfamiliar burdens? or will it be queer if they should incline to weigh their loyalty on the scale of high tariffs?

Bad as the prospect was in the commencement, the provincials were disposed to give Confederation a fair trial, but now that all their predictions of evil are more than realized, it is no wonder that they become restive and threatening, or that they are emigrating to the United States to an extent so alarming as to command the attention of Parliament. The fact is, the feelings of our neighbors are now worked up to that pitch of excitement that, were it not for the existence of our enormous taxes and oppressive tariffs, they would seriously and enthusiastically entertain the project of annexation—the mere whisper of which would have been criminal twelve months ago. It is obvious that, if we have any coveteous leaning toward the rich territory of our neighbors, a long stride might be made toward its acquisition by reducing our burdens, as our wisest financiers propose. If St. Thomas with its alien population, cast but 22 votes against annexation to the United States, how unanimous would be the choice of our neighbors, whose sons come to us, unbidden, at the rate of several thousand every year. The integrity of the "New Dominion" just now rests upon a doubtful foundation.

THE EXPENSE OF THE CITY SCHOOLS.

THE Citizens' Association, through its President, Mr. PETER COOPER, has published a letter to Mr. RICE, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, calling his attention to the amount of money spent for schools in the city of New York, and to the number of scholars actually attending. Mr. COOPER truly says that, as the public schools "must be maintained at all hazards and at any cost," the public money must be carefully watched. The law allots $10 for each pupil who actually attends and is taught for a certain time each year. In 1862 the average attendance was 74,000, and the expense was $1,413,068. In 1867 the average attendance was 96,000, and the expense was $2,393,333—an increase of nearly a million of dollars. The letter asks the Superintendent to recommend that the Governor appoint Commissioners to examine the subject, and report upon the measures necessary to perfect the system of common schools in the city of New York.

This will probably be cited as another attempt to emasculate the law. But last year, when there was a proposition before the Legislature to appoint a School Commission, it was rejected after a full consideration of the subject, from which it appeared that the schools were admirable and their general management excellent. The Rev. JAMES FRASER, the English Commissioner to examine our public school system, praises the schools as far as they can be collected; and with the present school-tax of a mill and a quarter, they feel that the school expense is about as high as public opinion will probably warrant. It is not a new or fresh subject of inquiry why nearly three millions of dollars do not furnish as many school-houses and as much instruction as are given to a little number of actual pupils. If the investigation should show that the money is not wasted, then it would furnish the most powerful argument for raising more money to apply the necessary accommodation. Mr. COOPER says, in his letter:

"The large outlay for public instruction in this city is not justified by the number of pupils taught nor by the instruction afforded to the children." If this is a mistake, nobody is so much interested as the members of the Board of Education to correct it. But, speaking from the character of the President of the Board, Mr. LABREMORE, we feel very sure they would not shrink from any investigation proposed in a friendly spirit.

SECURITY OF CARS.

ERIE, PENNSYLVANIA, JAN. 24, 1868.

Editor Harper's Weekly:

In yours of the last issue there is a letter from an Engineer relating to the heating of railway cars, etc. I wish to make a few statements, showing that his ideas will not work. He proposes to build car seats with a bulk-head—that is, to make them somewhat like a bath-tub. It would not work that way. Suppose a train was running east, and the seats all built as he says, how will the same car answer to return west? Room must be allowed for a man to sit comfortably. Then, again, the cleaning of each space would be very difficult. In the present way a hose is taken in and every space washed over. I have been on trains when they have smashed up, and can say that seats built as he proposes would kill and wound more of the passengers than those used at present. The concussion of a collision or a run-off is sufficient to start all the seats, no matter how securely they are fastened. The present seat has an iron frame secured to the floor of the car by screws. They pull out readily, whereas the wooden bulk-heads would make a mass of splinters which would enter the person in all directions. A stove in a car, as he would do well if applied under the centre of the car with heating apparatus, etc. A stove can not be secured any better than the seats. They will break away with the concussion. I have seen it on several occasions. Was in a passenger car when all the seats were torn away. No one was badly hurt; the car ahead had wooden seats (second-class), and several were killed. One child had a splinter driven in its head back of the ear. Aside from forces in favor these wrought-iron, as it will not burn out so quickly or warp so easily. An apparatus of the bases seems to be necessary, as well, with hot-irons in each seat, would do safely, as the hard coal rarely sets fire. Yours, etc.

A CIVIL ENGINEER.

A PUBLIC EXPOSURE.

Editor Harper's Weekly:

You are so evidently the friend of the traveler, Sir, that I beg leave to use your columns to expose one man whom I think should be noticed. I wish to expose him to the admiration and esteem of the public in general, especially all who journey by rail, and whose avocations compel them to ride upon it. Mr. GEORGE A. MERRELL, Superintendent of the Rutland, Burlington, and Vermont Valley Railroad, has caused the subjoined notice, and it is posted in the cars of his road:

NOTICE.

Baggagemen on the trains, freight as well as passenger, are expected and required by the Company not only to do their work well but PLEASANTLY, and to this end they are forbidden to use profane language by ACTS. Any departure from civility of conduct, and any disposition to SWEAR, will subject the Hand, will render them unfit for its service, and they will be dismissed accordingly.

Travelers may be unreasonable, but that will be considered no excuse for any employé to be so in return.

This is printed in large type, so that he who rides may read. What is the result? Civility and polite attention to every want. If you ask one of the conductors a question he does not throw the answer at you over his shoulder as he passes by, but replies concisely and intelligibly. The brakemen are also civil, and I will warrant there are not many trunks thrown end over end on the road, in view of the notice alluded to.

What innovations! What alarming precedents! The next train that sweeps from the north will allow half an hour for dinner, and gentlemen may cry peas, peas! with the certainty of getting and eating them.

Yours truly,

A RAILER.

POPULAR CRIES AND THEIR EFFECT.

MR. BENJAMIN DISRAELI, than whom there is not a shrewder man in Europe, invented an admirable cry in his novel "Coningsby." It was "Our young Queen and our old institutions." What innovations! What alarming precedents! Victoria could no more help being young in 1838 than her uncle William just dead, had been able to help being old. And for their "old institutions" they might have been the stake, or the rack, or the whipping-post; but the cry sounded well, and saved people the trouble of thinking, which is all that is wanted in a cry. Had Mr. Disraeli "stumped" the country of Bucks with that cry he might have carried it by a majority of High Wycombe. Instead of being branded by Daniel O'Connell (than whom no politician ever better understood the value of a watch-word) as a "literal descendant of the impenitent thief." But Mr. Disraeli was not a Radical in those days, and more to the point (or cry) "Rally round and join the Union" (a most popular cry in its time) than "Our young Queen and our old institutions" is the cry which suppressed, at the downfall of Napoleon the Great was wholly due to the defeat at Waterloo. That the rout at Monte St. Jean had something to do with the collapse is certain; but unprejudiced persons will tell you that his unpopularity in the provinces in 1815-16 was mainly caused by the consistent cry, Plus de Droits Réunis. The Droits Réunis were a kind of consolidated assessed taxes, which the peasantry imagined to be very onerous. The Bourbons changed the name of the impost to something else, and made it ten times more onerous; but the Cry had been deprived of its resonance, and that was something. By 1830 the people had learned a new Cry, and cried Charles X. to Holyrood with it.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SO numerous have vulgar, sensational newspapers and periodicals become in New York city that the Legislature of the State has been considering a bill to suppress the influence of degrading trash.

Gilbert H. Bates, an ex-sergeant of a Wisconsin regiment in the late war, has organized a band of KU-KLUX to carry the Stars and Stripes through the South, overland from Wisconsin to Mississippi. If he succeeds, the feat is to be quoted by the Democratic party as a proof that the Union is loved by a grateful disposition of the late rebels.

Philosophers are not now interested in the confession of a murderer, named Joseph Schaefer, who says he has killed three men and plotted to kill a fourth for no other purpose than a desire to kill. The savage is not unnatural to the humanity of the criminal.

The proverbial weakness of Mississippi River steamboats was elegantly illustrated on January 29 by an accident to the steamer Emerald. While rounding a sharp curve in the channel known as Tunica Bend, the steamer careened, and her cabin slipped off into the river, unfortunately drowning four ladies.

General Meade, commanding in Georgia and Alabama, has given notice that the constitutions and ordinances of those States will be binding on courts and officers when legalized by him, thus ignoring the people entirely.

The South Carolina Convention has proposed to divide the State lands into small farms to be sold to actual settlers.

Georgia is about to ask Congress for a loan of $5,000,000 in the name of bankrupt planters. Impudence is more modest, and talks of one or two millions only.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE British army under Napier had penetrated to the centre of Abyssinia, and had not met the enemy up to January 20.

The eruption of Vesuvius is not the only volcanic action dreaded at Naples. The old Bourbon party of Italy threatens a revolutionary outbreak there.

Despatches from Hayti, who has been in this country lately, looking at the strength of the land and studying the temper of the people, strongly urges England to settle the Alabama claims at her own cost. Mr. Minor thinks that, with a new member of Parliament, eyes must be opened at once. All this petty bickering with our mother country is ridiculous. The elements ought to be settled now, as future generations may not be as favorably inclined.

Italy is engaging in a singular naval expedition. A fleet is to sail shortly for the Panama River, for what purpose is unknown and hard to conceive. It is hoped that it is to make peace between Brazil and Paraguay.

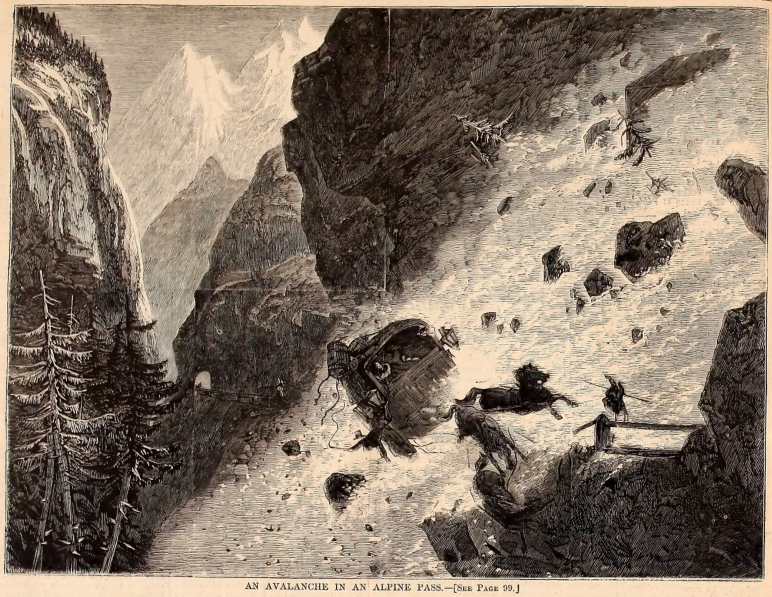
Peru has been much revolutionized, and Pezo, who made himself Dictator nearly two years ago, has had to take refuge on the American ship. Success in every campaign and in every battle of his enemy has been the reverse of victory to the army in the South American republics. Prado fell in a battle with Pezo in January, and Pezo, who has been besieging for some time, and the people and army now rising, will wage war on the enemy, and proclaimed Casseco President. Prado has escaped to Chili.

Despatches have been received in St. Thomas, and the King has already entered the fifth fort (it, or, diplomatically speaking, signed the treaty which transfers it, if we want to take it).

Prince Oscar Bernadotte, eldest son of Prince Eugene, is to wed, to-day, as Major-General in the army, is engaged to Princess Margherita, of Genoa, a granddaughter of Victor Emanuel, etc., etc.

Bismarck has been pensioning the petty kings and Dukes of Hanover, Nassau, and the Hesses, whose states whom he upset a year and a half ago. The German Parliament was much opposed to this generosity in this way, but Bismarck threatened to dissolve it unless it voted the pensions, and it was very hastily granted.

Orders and Honors, Empire of Japan, were thrown open to foreign commerce on January 1. This civilization continues to press forward.



THE AVALANCHE.

WE publish on page 100 an illustration representing the awful peril that attends traveling in the neighborhood of the Great and Little Alpine passes after the snow has accumulated on the heights.

There are three kinds of avalanches. The first is the dirt, or Staublauinen, composed of the loose snow which has accumulated in the upper regions and is put in motion by a strong wind, and increases in volume as it descends. The damage done by these falls is not very great, since the snow is loose and may be removed from the places where it accumulates, but the compression of the air sometimes kills men and cattle, and has been known to overturn houses by its force. The rolling avalanche is more terrible, for it comes in a few mass, carrying all before it, silently, swiftly, and surely. It was one of these which, in 1749, involved the whole village of Roerau, in the Grisons, covered it in, and never let it from its site, without a sound loud enough to awaken the inhabitants, some of whom wondered what delayed them in the morning till the hour dread of whom were dug out. Sixty still lived, saved by the air that was in the interstices. In 1806, in Val Canaria, a house was moved from the side of the valley to the other by a rolling avalanche, and a pine-tree was placed on the roof of the passage by its uprise. The sliding avalanches are awful enough; but they are formed on lower slopes by the gradual thawing of the foundations and the slipping en masse of the upper accumulation of frozen snow. They slide swiftly downward, carrying every thing before them, however heavy, they come to a steep place, topple over, begin to roll, and become a great ball —a rolling avalanche, in fact—which usually may meet with a hard rock or some impregnable obstacle, and be dashed to pieces, so as to resemble a cliff. Thus the traveler is never quite certain in what form the avalanche may come upon him, or whether a whisper, a footfall, the report of a distant gun may not make such a concussion of the light atmosphere as to bring the enemy upon him unawares.

DISTRESS AMONG THE POOR.

IT is hardly necessary, we presume, to say to any of our readers that the increasing distress among the poor of great cities has been, and is still, unusually great this present winter. We are glad to know, however, that the efforts which have been made to relieve the poor have been in due proportion to the increased destitution. An appropriation by the State Legislature of $500,000 has been proposed for the relief of the poor of New York and Brooklyn. Several benefit-concerts for the relief of the poor have been opened in this city, one of which, located at No. 1 Bond Street, we have spoken on page 100. The number of applicants daily at this house alone amounts to about 1000 persons. Every day before the opening hour—9 o'clock A.M.—a line of several hundred men, women, and children are to be found waiting for assistance. Among these are bookbinders, carpenters, tailors, dressmakers, and other tradesmen, all out of employment and all suffering. So many persons, and especially mechanics, have been applied in the above that the parents may go to work and save sufficient to support themselves. The plan of relief is, when fuel is required, to send a quarter of a ton at the outset, and two more up to March 1, to such applicants as have filled up an application, which is furnished in blank, and have sworn to the truth of the statement made therein, and after its truth has been verified by a visit to their houses. Those who need money, if worthy, receive a dollar, and are desired to call again in two weeks. This, of course, is only a temporary relief.

AN AVALANCHE IN AN ALPINE PASS.—[SEE PAGE 99.]

RELIEVING THE POOR AT No. 1 BOND STREET, NEW YORK.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 99.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.
RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER XI.—(Continued.)

AFTER the library had been swept and cleaned in the morning, neither first nor second housemaid had any business in that room at any later period of the day. I stopped Rosanna Spearman, and charged her with a breach of domestic discipline on the spot.

"What might you want in the library at this time of day?" I inquired.

"Mr. Franklin Blake dropped one of his rings up stairs," says Rosanna; "and I have been into the library to give it to him." The girl's face was all in a flush as she made me that answer; and she walked away with a toss of her head and a look of self-importance which I was quite at a loss to account for. The proceedings in the house had declined me upset all the women-servants more or less; but none of them had gone clean out of their natural characters, as Rosanna, to all appearance, had now gone out of hers.

I found Mr. Franklin writing at the library-table. He asked for a conveyance to the railway station the moment I entered the room. The first sound of his voice informed me that we now had the resolute side of him uppermost once more. The man made of cotton had disappeared; and the man made of iron sat before me again.

"Going to London, Sir?" I asked.

"Going to telegraph to London," says Mr. Franklin. "I am convinced my aunt that we must have a cleverer head than Superintendent Seegrave's to help us; and I have got her permission to dispatch a telegram to my father. He knows the Chief Commissioner of Police, and the Commissioner can lay his hand on the right man to solve the mystery of the Diamond. Talking of mysteries, by-the-by," says Mr. Franklin, dropping his voice, "I have another word to say to you before you go to the stables. Don't breathe a word of it to any body as yet; but either Rosanna Spearman's head is not screwed right, or I am afraid she knows more about the Moonstone than she ought to know."

I can hardly tell whether I was more startled or distressed at hearing him say that. If I had been younger, I might have confessed as much to Mr. Franklin. But when you are old, you acquire one excellent habit. In cases where you don't see your way clearly, you hold your tongue.

"She came in here with a ring I dropped in my bedroom," Mr. Franklin went on. "When I had thanked her, of course I expected her to go. Instead of that she stood opposite to me at the table, looking at me in the oddest manner —half frightened, and half fascinated, as it might make it out. 'This is a strange thing about the Diamond, Sir,' she said, in a curiously sudden, headlong way. I said, Yes it was, and wondered what was coming next. Upon my honor, Betteredge, I think she must be wrong in the head!" She said, "They will never find the Diamond, Sir, will they? No! nor the person who took it—I'll answer for that." She actually nodded and smiled at me! I declare I could ask her what she meant we heard your step outside. I suppose she was afraid of your catching her here. At my ease, she changed color and left the room. What on earth does it mean?"

I could not bring myself to tell him the girl's story even then. It would have been almost as good as telling him that she was the thief. Besides, even if I had made a clean breast of it, and even supposing she was the thief, the reason why she should let out her secret to Mr. Franklin, of all the people in the world, would have been still as far to seek as ever.

"I can't bear the idea of getting the poor girl into a scrape, merely because she has a flighty way with her, and talks very strangely," Mr. Franklin went on. "And yet, if she had said to the Superintendent what she said to me, fool as he is, I'm afraid—" He stopped there, and left the rest unspoken.

"The best way, Sir," I said, "will be for me to say two words privately to my mistress about it at the first opportunity. My lady has a very friendly interest in Rosanna; and the girl may only have been formed out foolish, after all. When there's a mess of any kind in a house, Sir, the women-servants like to look at the gloomy side—it gives the poor wretches a kind of importance in their own eyes. If there's any body ill, trust the women for prophesying that the person will die. If it's a jewel lost, trust them for prophesying that it will never be found again."

This view (which I am bound to say I thought a probable view myself on reflection) seemed to relieve Mr. Franklin mightily: he folded up his telegram and dismissed the subject. On my way to the stables to order the pony-chaise I looked in at the servants' hall where they were at dinner. Rosanna Spearman was not among them. On inquiry I found that she had been suddenly taken ill, and had gone up stairs to her own room to lie down.

"Curious! She looked well enough when I saw her last," I remarked.

Penelope followed me out. "Don't talk in that way before the rest of them, father," she said. "You only make them harder on Rosanna than ever. The poor thing is breaking her heart about Mr. Franklin Blake."

Here was another view of the girl's conduct. If it was possible for Penelope to be right the explanation of Rosanna's strange language and behavior might have been all in this—that she didn't care what she said so long as she could surprise Mr. Franklin into speaking to her. Granting that to be the right reading of the riddle, it accounted, perhaps, for her flighty self-conceited manner when she passed me in the hall. Though he had only said three words still she had carried her point, and Mr. Franklin had spoken to her.

I saw the poor thing harnessed myself. In the fernal net-work of mysteries and uncertainties that now surrounded us, I declare it was a relief to observe how well the buckles and straps understood each other! When you had seen the pony hocked into the shafts of the chaise you had seen something there was no doubt about. And that, let me tell you, was becoming a treat of the rarest kind in our household.

Going round with the chaise to the front door I found not only Mr. Franklin, but Mr. Godfrey and Superintendent Seegrave also, waiting for me on the steps.

Mr. Superintendent's reflections (after failing to find the Diamond in the servants' rooms or boxes) had led him, it appeared, to an entirely new conclusion. Still sticking to his first text; namely, that somebody in the house had stolen the jewel, our experienced officer was now of opinion that the thief (he was wise enough not to name poor Penelope, whatever he might privately think of her!) had been acting in concert with the Indians; and he accordingly proposed shifting his inquiries to the jugglers in the prison at Frizinghall. Hearing of this new move Mr. Franklin had volunteered to take the Superintendent back to the town, from which he could telegraph to London as easily as from our station. Mr. Godfrey, still devoutly believing in Mr. Seegrave, and greatly interested in witnessing the examination of the Indians, had begged leave to accompany the officer to Frizinghall. One of the two Indians remained, was to be left at the house in case any thing happened. The other was to go back with the Superintendent to the town. So the four places in the pony-chaise were just filled.

Before he took the reins to drive off Mr. Franklin walked me away a few steps out of hearing of the others.

"I will wait to telegraph to London," he said, "till I see what comes of our examination of the Indians. My own conviction is, that this muddle-headed local police-officer is as much in the dark as ever, and is simply trying to gain time. The idea of any of the servants being in league with the Indians is a preposterous absurdity, in my opinion. Keep about the house, Betteredge, till I come back, and try what you can make of Rosanna Spearman. I don't ask you to do any thing degrading to your own self-respect, or any thing cruel toward the girl. I only ask you to exercise your observation more carefully than usual. We will make as light of it as we can before my aunt; but this is a more important matter than you may suppose."

"It's a matter of twenty thousand pounds, Sir," I said, thinking of the value of the Diamond.

"It's a matter of quieting Rachel's mind," answered Mr. Franklin, gravely. "I am very uneasy about her."

He left me suddenly, as if he desired to cut short any further talk between us. I thought I understood why. Further talk might have let me into the secret of what Miss Rachel had said to him on the terrace.

So they drove away to Frizinghall. I was ready enough, in the girl's own interest, to have a little talk with Rosanna in private. But the needful opportunity failed to present itself. She only came down stairs again at tea-time. When she did appear she was flighty and excited, had what they call a hysterical attack, took a dose of sal volatile by my lady's order, and was sent back to her bed.

The day wore on to its end drearily and miserably enough, I can tell you. Miss Rachel still kept her room, declaring that she was too ill to come down to dinner that day. My lady was in such low spirits about her daughter that I could not bring myself to make her additionally anxious by reporting what Rosanna Spearman had said to Mr. Franklin. Penelope persisted in believing that she was to be forthwith tried, sentenced, and transported for theft. The other women took to their Bibles and hymn-books, and looked as sour as vergjces over their reading—a result, which I have observed, in my sphere of life, to follow generally on the performance of acts of piety at unaccustomed periods of the day. As for me, I hadn't even heart enough to open my Robinson Crusoe. I went out into the yard, and being hard up for a little cheerful society, set my chair by the kennels and talked to the dogs.

Half an hour before dinner-time the two gentlemen came back from Frizinghall, having arranged with Superintendent Seegrave that he was to return to us the next day. They had called on Mr. Murthwaite, the Indian traveler, at his present residence, near the town. At Mr. Franklin's request he had kindly given them the benefit of his knowledge of the language, in dealing with those two, out of the three Indians, who knew nothing of English. The examination, conducted carefully, and at great length, had ended in nothing; not the shadow of a reason being discovered for suspecting the jugglers of having tampered with any of our servants. On reaching that conclusion Mr. Franklin had sent his telegraphic message to London, and there the matter now rested till to-morrow came.

So much for the history of the day that followed the birthday. Not a glimmer of light had broken in on us so far. A day or two after, however, the darkness lifted a little. How, and with what result, you shall presently see.

CHAPTER XII.

THE Thursday night passed, and nothing happened. With the Friday morning came two pieces of news.

Item the first: The baker's man declared he had met Rosanna Spearman, on the previous afternoon, with a thick veil on, walking toward Frizinghall by the foot-path way over the moor. It seemed strange that any body should be mistaken about Rosanna, whose shoulder marked her out pretty plainly, poor thing—but mistaken the man must have been; for Rosanna, as you know, had been all the Thursday afternoon ill up stairs in her room.

Item the second came through the postman. Worthy Mr. Candy had sent me one more of his many unlucky things, when he drove off in the rain on the birthday night, and told me that a doctor's skin was water-proof. In spite of his skin the wet had got through him. He had caught a chill that night and was now down with a fever. The last accounts, brought by the postman, represented him to be light-headed—talking nonsense as giddy, poor man, in his delirium as he often talked it in his sober senses. We were all sorry for the little doctor; but Mr. Franklin appeared to regret his illness chiefly on Miss Rachel's account. From what he said to my lady while I was in the room at breakfast-time he appeared to think that Miss Rachel—if the doctor died—would be the Monkhouse who set most at rest—might stand in urgent need of the best medical advice at our disposal.

Breakfast had not been over long when a telegram from Mr. Blake, the elder, arrived in answer to his son. It informed us that he had laid hands (by help of his friend the Commissioner) on the right man to help us. The name of him was Sergeant Cuff, and the arrival of him from London was expected by the morning train.

At reading the name of the new police-officer Mr. Franklin gave a start. It seems that he had heard some curious anecdotes about Sergeant Cuff from his father's lawyer during his stay in London. "I begin to see we are coming to the end of our anxieties already," he said. "If half the stories I have heard are true, when it comes to unraveling a mystery there isn't the equal in England of Sergeant Cuff!"

We all got excited and impatient as the time drew near for the appearance of this renowned and capable character. Superintendent Seegrave returning to us at his appointed time, and hearing that the Sergeant was expected, instantly shut himself up in a room, with pen, ink, and paper, to make notes of the Report which would be extensively copied from him. I should have liked to have gone to the station myself to fetch the Sergeant. But my lady's carriage and horses were not to be thought of, even for the celebrated Cuff; and the pony-chaise was required later for Mr. Godfrey. He deeply regretted being obliged to leave his matter at such an anxious time; and he kindly put off the hour of his departure till an hour after the last train, for the purpose of hearing what the famous London police-officer thought of the case. But on Friday night he must be in town, having a Ladies' Chorus at his theatre, waiting to consult him on Saturday morning.

When the time came for the Sergeant's arrival I sent down to the gate to look out for him.

A fly from the railway drove up as I reached the lodge; and out got a grizzled, elderly man, so miserably lean that he looked as if he had not got an ounce of flesh on his bones in any part of him. He was dressed all in decent black, with a white cravat round his neck. His face was as sharp as a hatchet, and the skin of it was as yellow and dry and withered as an autumn leaf. His eyes, of a steely light gray, had a very disconcerting trick, when they encountered your eyes, of looking as if they expected something more from you than you were aware of yourself. His walk was soft; his voice was melancholy; his long lanky fingers were hooked like claws. He might have been a parson, or an undertaker, or any thing else you like, except what he really was. A more complete opposite to Superintendent Seegrave than Sergeant Cuff, and a less comforting officer to look at for a family in distress, I defy you to discover, search where you may.

"SERGEANT CUFF'S IMMOVABLE EYES NEVER STIRRED FROM OFF HER FACE."

"Is this Lady Verinder's?" he asked.

"Yes, Sir."

"I am Sergeant Cuff."

"This way, Sir, if you please."

On our road to the house I mentioned my name and position in the family to satisfy him that he might speak to me about the business on which my lady was to employ him. Not a word did he say about the business, however, for all that. He admired the grounds, and remarked that he liked the sea-air very brisk and refreshing. I privately wondered, on my side, how the celebrated Cuff had got his reputation. We reached the house in the temper of two strange dogs, coupled up together for the first time in their lives by the same chain.

Asking for my lady, and hearing that she was in one of the conservatories, we went round to the gardens at the back and sent a servant to seek her. While we were waiting Sergeant Cuff looked through the evergreen arch on our left, spied out our rosery, and walked straight in, with the first appearance of any thing like interest that he had shown yet. The gardens' astonishment, and to my disgust, this celebrated policeman proved to be quite a mine of learning on the trumpery subject of rose-gardens.

"Ah, you've got the right expression here to the south and south west," says the Sergeant, with a wag of his grizzled head, and a stroke of pleasure in his melodious voice. "This is the place for a rosary—nothing like a circle set in a square. Yes, yes; with walks between all the beds. But they ought all to be gravel-walks like these. Grass, Mr. Gardener—grass walks between your roses; gravel's too hard for them. That's a sweet pretty bed of white roses and bluish stones. You're always mix well together, don't they? Here's the white musk-rose, Mr. Betteredge—our old English rose before the tea head sprang up the best and the newest of them. Pretty dear!" says the Sergeant, fondling the Musk-Rose with his hasky fingers, and speaking to it as if he was speaking to a child.

This was a nice sort of man to recover Miss Rachel's Diamond, and to find out the thief who stole it!

"You seem to be fond of roses, Sergeant!" I remarked.

"I haven't much time to be fond of any thing," says Sergeant Cuff. "But, when I have a moment's fondness to bestow, most things, Mr. Betteredge, the roses get it. I begun my life among them in my father's nursery garden, and I shall end my life among them if I can. One of these days (please God) I shall retire from catching thieves, and try my hand at growing roses. How will he guess walks, Mr. Betteredge, between my beds,' says the Sergeant, on whose mind the gravel-paths of a rosary seemed to dwell unpleasantly.

"It seems an odd taste, Sir," I ventured to say, "for a man in your line of life."

"If you will look about you (which most people won't do)," says Sergeant Cuff, "you will see that the interests of a man's tastes in most things, as opposite as possible to the nature of a man's business. Show me any two things more opposite one from the other than a rose and a thief, and I'll correct my tastes accordingly—if it isn't too late at my time of life. You find the dandelik-rose a goodish stock for most of the tender sorts, don't you, Mr. Gardener? Ah! I thought so. Here's a lady coming. Is it Lady Verinder?"

He had seen her before either I or the gardener had seen her—though we knew which way he took, and he didn't. I began to think him rather a quicker man than he appeared to be at first sight.

The Sergeant's appearance, or the Sergeant's perfume—one or both—seemed to cause my lady some little embarrassment. She was, for the first time in all my experience of her, at a loss what to say at an interview with a stranger. Sergeant Cuff put her at her ease directly. He asked if my other person had been employed about the robbery before we sent for him; and hearing that another person had been called in, and was now in the house, begged leave to speak to him before any thing else was done.

My lady led the way back. Before he followed her, the Sergeant directed his mind on the subject of the gravel-walks by a parting word to the gardener. "Get but ladybrick to try grass,' he said, with a sour look at the paths. "No gravel! no gravel!"

Why Superintendent Seegrave should have appeared to be several sizes smaller than Mr. Cuff, in consequence of Sergeant Cuff, I can't undertake to explain. I can only state the fact. They retired together; and remained a weary hour and a half shut up from all mortal intrusion. When they came out the Superintendent was excited and Mr. Sergeant was yawning.

"The Sergeant wishes to see Miss Verinder's sitting-room, Mr. Betteredge," addressing me with great pomp and eagerness. "The Sergeant may have some questions to ask. Attend the Sergeant, if you please!"

While I was being ordered about in this way, I looked at the great Cuff. The great Cuff, on his side, looked at Superintendent Seegrave in a that quietly expecting way which I have already noticed. I can't affirm that he was on the watch for his brother-officer's speedy appearance in the character of an Ass—I can only say that I strongly suspected it.

I led the way up stairs. The Sergeant went softly all over the Indian cabinet and all round the "boudoir;" asking questions (occasionally only of Mr. Superintendent, and continually of me), the drift of which I believe to have been equally unintelligible to both of us. In due time his course brought him to the door, and put him face to face with the decorative painting that you know of. He called one lean inquiring finger on the small smear, just under the lock, which Superintendent Seegrave had already noticed, when he removed the women-servants for all crowding together into the room.

"That's a pity," says Sergeant Cuff. "How did it happen?"

He put the question to me. I answered that the women-servants had crowded into the room on the previous morning, and that some of their petticoats had done the mischief. Superintendent Seegrave ordered them out, Sir," I added, "before they did any more harm."

"Right!" says Mr. Superintendent, in his military way. "I ordered them out. The petticoats did it, Sergeant—the petticoats did it."

"Did you measure which petticoat did it?" asked Sergeant Cuff, still addressing himself, not to his brother-officer, but to me.

"No, Sir."

He turned to Superintendent Seegrave upon that, and said, "You noticed, I suppose?"

Mr. Superintendent looked a little taken aback; but he made the best of it. "I can't charge my memory, Sergeant," he said, "a mere trifle—a mere petticoat."

Sergeant Cuff looked at Mr. Seegrave as he had looked at the gravel-walks in the rosery, and gave us, in his melancholy way, the first taste of his quality which we had yet.

"I made a private inquiry last week, Mr. Superintendent," he said. "At one end of the inquiry there was a murder, and at the other end there was a petticoat. The murder was in the dead body could account for. In all my experience along the dirtiest ways of this dirty little world I have never met with any thing that was a trifle yet. Before we go a step further in this business we must see the petticoat that made the smear, and we must know for certain when that paint was wet."

Mr. Superintendent—taking his set-down ruthlessly—looked at me. I looked at the women. Sergeant Cuff, after considering a minute, sighed, and shook his head.

"No," he said, "we'll take the matter of the paint first. It's a question of Yes or No with the paint—which is short. It's a question of petticoats with the women—which is long. What o'clock was it when the servants were in this room yesterday morning? Eleven o'clock—eh? Is there any thing in the house to tell us for certain that paint was wet or dry, at eleven yesterday morning?"

"Her ladyship's nephew, Mr. Franklin Blake, knows," I said.

"Is the gentleman in the house?"

Mr. Franklin was in the house, at hand as could be—waiting for his first chance of being introduced to the great Cuff. In half a minute he was in the room, and was giving his evidence as follows:

"That door, Sergeant," he said, "has been painted by Mr. Yandell, the drawing-master, with my help, and in a vehicle of my own composition. The vehicle dries whatever colors may be used with it in twelve hours.

"Do you remember when the smeared bit was done, Sir?" asked the Sergeant.

"Perfectly," answered Mr. Franklin. "That was the last morsel of the door to be finished. We wanted to get it done on Wednesday last, and I myself undertook it by three in the afternoon, or soon after.

"To-day is Friday," said Sergeant Cuff, addressing himself to Superintendent Seegrave. "Let us reckon back, Sir. At three on the Wednesday afternoon, that bit of the painting was completed. The vehicle dried it in twelve hours—that is to say, dried it by three o'clock on Thursday morning. At eleven on Thursday morning you found the smear. Nothing to be done between, and eight remains. That paint had been eight days dry, Mr. Superintendent, when you supposed that the servants' petticoats smeared it."

First knock-down blow for Mr. Seegrave. If he had not suspected poor Penelope, I should have pitied him.

Having settled the question of the paint, Sergeant Cuff, from the moment, gave his brother-officer up as a bad job—and addressed himself to me. Franklin, as the more promising assistant of the two.

"It's quite on the cards, Sir," he said, "that we have got the clue to our business, here."

As the words passed his lips the bedroom door opened and Miss Rachel came out among us suddenly.

She softened herself to the Sergeant, without appearing to notice (or to heed) that he was a stranger to herself.

"Did you say," she asked, pointing to Mr. Franklin, "that he had put the clew into your hands?"

"This is Miss Verinder," I whispered, behind the Sergeant.)

"That gentleman, miss," says the Sergeant—with his steely-grey eyes carefully studying my young lady's face—"has possibly put the clew into our hands."

She turned for one moment, and tried to look at Mr. Franklin. I say tried, for she suddenly looked away again before she could get at him. There seemed to be some strange disturbance in her mind. She colored up, and then she turned pale again. With the paleness there came a new look into her face, a look which it startled me to see.

"Having answered your question, miss," says the Sergeant, "I beg leave to make an inquiry in my turn. There is a smear on the painting of your door here. Do you happen to know when it was done? or who did it?"

Instead of making any reply, Miss Rachel went on with her questions as if he had not spoken, or as if she had not heard him.

"Are you another police-officer?" she asked.

"I am Sergeant Cuff, miss, of the Detective Police."

"Do you think a young lady's advice worth having?"

"I shall be glad to hear it, miss."

"Do your duty by yourself—and don't allow Mr. Franklin Blake to help you!"

She said those words so spitefully, so savagely, with such an extraordinary outbreak of ill-will toward Mr. Franklin, in her voice and her look, that —though I had known her from a baby, though I loved and honored her next to my lady herself —I was ashamed of Miss Rachel for the first time in my life.

Sergeant Cuff's immovable eyes never stirred from off her face. "Thank you, miss," he said. "Do you happen to know any thing about the smear? Might you have done it by accident yourself?"

"I know nothing about the smear."

With that answer she turned away, and shut herself up again in her bedroom. This time, I heard her—as Penelope had heard her before—burst out crying as soon as she was alone again.

I couldn't bring myself to look at the Sergeant —I looked at Mr. Franklin, who stood nearest to me. He proved to be even more sorely distressed at what had passed than I was.

"I told you I was uneasy about her," he said. "And now you see why."

Miss Verinder appears to be a little out of temper about the loss of her Diamond," remarked the Sergeant. "It's a valuable jewel. Natural enough! natural enough!"

Here was the excuse that I had made for her (when she had behaved before Superintendent Seegrave, on the previous day) being made for her over again, by a man who couldn't have had my interest in doing it. "For he was a perfect stranger! A kind of cold shudder ran through me, which I couldn't account for at the time. I know now that the shudder got my first impression, at that moment, of a new light (and a horrible light) having suddenly fallen on the case, in the mind of Sergeant Cuff—surely and entirely in consequence of what he had seen in Miss Rachel, and heard from Miss Rachel, at that first interview between them.

A young lady's tongue is a privileged member, Sir," says the Sergeant to Mr. Franklin. "Let us forget what has passed, and go straight on with this business. Thanks to you, we know the paint was dry. The next thing to discover is when the paint was last seen without that smear. You have got a head on your shoulders—and somebody has used it, I reckon."

Mr. Franklin composed himself, and came back with an effort from Miss Rachel to the matter in hand.

"I think I do understand," he said. "The more we narrow the question of time the more we also narrow the field of inquiry."

"That's it, Sir," said the Sergeant. "Did you notice your work here on the Wednesday afternoon, after you had done it?"

Mr. Franklin shook his head and answered, "I can't say I did."

"Did you?" inquired Sergeant Cuff, turning to me.

"I can't say I did either, Sir."

"Who was the last person in the room, the last thing on Wednesday night?"

"Miss Rachel, I suppose, Sir."

Mr. Franklin looked in there, "Or possibly your daughter, Betteredge," He turned to Sergeant Cuff, and explained that my daughter was Miss Verinder's maid.

"Mr. Betteredge, ask your daughter to step up. Stop!" says the Sergeant, taking me away in the twinkling of an eye—shut. "Your Superintendent here," he went on, in a whisper, "has made a pretty full report to me of the manner in which he has conducted the case. Among other things he has, by his own confession, set the servants' backs up. It's very important to smooth them down again, Mr. Betteredge, and tell the rest of them, these two things with my compliments: First, that I have no evidence before me, yet, that any one has been in your absence; I only know that the Diamond has been lost. Second, that my business here with the servants is simply to ask them to lay their heads together and help me to find it."

My experience of the women-servants, when Superintendent Seegrave had his embargo on their rooms, came in handy here.

"May I make so bold, Sergeant, as to tell the women what you have asked. I says they free (with your compliments) to fidget up and down stairs, and whisk in and out of their bedrooms, if the fancy takes 'em to the scullion."

"Go and do it at once, Mr. Betteredge."

I did it in less than five minutes. There was only one difficulty when I came to the bedrooms. It took a pretty stiff exertion of my authority, as chief, to prevent the whole of the female household from following me and Penelope up stairs, in the character of volunteer assistants in a burning fever of anxiety to help Sergeant Cuff.

The Sergeant seemed to approve of Penelope. He seemed to like the less dreary; and he looked much as he had looked when he noticed the white musk-rose in the flower-garden. Here was my daughter, evidence, as drawn off from her by the Sergeant. "A pretty girl, I think, very prettily—but, there! she is my child all over: nothing of her father in her; Lord bless you, nothing of her mother in her!

Penelope examined: Took a lively interest in the painting on the door, having helped to mix the colors. Noticed the bit of work under the lock, because it was the last bit done. Had seen it, some hours afterward, without a smear. Had left it, as late as twelve at night, without a smear. Had, at that hour, walked her young lady good-night in the bedroom; had heard the clock strike in the "boudoir;" had her hand at the time on the handle of the painted door; knew the paint was wet (having helped to mix the colors, as aforesaid); took particular pains not to touch it; could swear that she held up the skirts of her dress, and that there was no smear on the pains then; could not swear that her dress mightn't have touched it accidentally in going out; remembered the dress she had on, because it was new, a present from Miss Rachel; her father remembered, and would speak to it, too; could, and would, and did fetch it; dress recognized by her father as the dress she wore that night; skirts examined, a long job from the size of them; not the ghost of a paint-stain discovered very where. End of Penelope's evidence—and very pretty and convincing, too. Signed, Gabriel Betteredge.

The Sergeant's next proceeding was to question me about any large dogs in the house who might have got into the room, and done the mischief with a whisk of their tails. Hearing that the nearest approach, the next sent for a magnifying-glass, and tried how the smear looked, seen that way. No skin-mark (as of a human hand) printed off on the paint. All the signs visible—signs which told that the paint had been touched by some loose article of somebody's dress touching it in passing by. That somebody (putting together Penelope's evidence and Mr. Franklin's evidence) must have been in the room, and done the mischief, between midnight and three o'clock on the Thursday morning.

Having brought his investigation to this point, Sergeant Cuff discovered that such a trifle as Superintendent Seegrave was still left in the room, upon which he summed up the proceedings for his brother-officer's benefit, as follows:

"This trifle of yours, Mr. Superintendent," says the Sergeant, pointing to the place on the door, "has proved to be a little important after you noticed it last. At the present stage of the inquiry there are, as I take it, three discoveries to make, before we part from this room. First (first) whether there is any article of dress in this house with the smear of the paint on it. Find out (second) who that dress belongs to. Find out (third) how the person can account for having been in this room, and smeared the paint, between midnight and three o'clock yesterday. If the person can't satisfy you, you have't far to look for the hand that has got the Diamond. I'll undertake myself, if you like, to find out when you no longer from your regular business in town. You have got one of your men here. I see. Let him remain here, and keep his eye on it. I want him—and allow me to wish you good-morning."

Superintendent Seegrave's respect for the Sergeant was great; but his respect for himself was greater still. He had been by the celebrated Cuff, to be his humble assistant, to the best of his ability, on the leading case.

"I have abstained from expressing any opinion, so far," says Mr. Superintendent, with his military voice still in good working order. "I have now only one remark to offer, on leaving this case in your hands. Here's a trifle, Sergeant, as making a mountain out of a molehill. Good-morning."

"There's no such a thing as making nothing out of a mole-hill, in consequence of your head being too high to see it." Having returned his brother-officer's compliment in that manner, Sergeant Cuff wheeled about, and walked away to the window by himself.

Mr. Franklin and I waited to see what was coming next. The Sergeant stood at the window, with his hands in his pockets, looking out, and whistling in the tone of the Last Rose of Summer softly to himself. Later in the proceedings, I discovered that he only forgot his manners so far as to whistle when he was alone. As for his work, seeing its way inch by inch to its own private ends, on which occasions the Last Rose of Summer evidently helped and encouraged him, I suppose it fitted in somehow with his character. It reminded him, you see, of his favorite roses, and, as he studied it, it was the most melancholy tune going.

Turning from the window, after a minute or two, the Sergeant looked slowly round the room, and stopped there, deep in thought, with his eyes on Miss Rachel's bedroom door. After a little he roused himself, nodded his head, as much as to say, "That will do!" and, addressing me, asked for ten minutes' conversation with my mistress, at her ladyship's earliest convenience.

Leaving the room with this message, I heard Mr. Franklin ask the Sergeant a question, and stopped to hear the answer also at the threshold of the door.

"Can you guess yet," inquired Mr. Franklin "who has stolen the Diamond?"

"Nobody has stolen the Diamond," answered Sergeant Cuff.

We both started at that extraordinary view of the case, and both earnestly begged him to tell us what he meant.

"Wait a little," said the Sergeant. "The pieces of the puzzle are not all put together yet."

THE RED SLEIGH.

We were all glad enough to gather around the glowing grate and listen to Aunt Sallie's story, for the storm was far too furious for any fun in a sleigh-ride that day.

She was a splendid-looking old lady, and must have been very handsome when young.

She sat looking into the fire for a moment, with her spectacled eyes, but she was really looking into the past.

"Things were somewhat different when I was young," said she; "but we loved sleighing as well as you do, and I will tell you the story of a ride we had over so many years ago:

"I was independent enough to help take care of myself, and I was teaching school in S—— that winter. It's a city now, but it was only a large village then.

"I boarded with the Olivers, and Hattie Oliver and I were great friends, and, of all the born coquettes I ever saw, she was one of the prettiest and most inveterate.

"She had plenty of admirers, of course, and seemed fairly to delight in teasing them. There were two in particular, and I always wondered how John Forbes and Charlie Simmons could be such confidential intimates under the circumstances.

"John was the richest, and he was a tall, black-haired, handsome fellow, but not very popular. He was kind enough, and full of life and spirits; but there used to say that 'He seemed all the while to be standing up behind himself and studying you, and she hated that.' For my own part, I liked John Forbes amazingly, though he was always shy and quiet in my company. Perhaps because I teased him so unmercifully about Hattie.

"Charlie Simmons was also an excellent fellow, but he hadn't a very glib tongue, and Hattie led him a most uncomfortable sort of a dance.

"Beaux of my own, did you say? Of course I had. Don't interrupt me.

"Now, the joy and pride of John Forbes's heart were his black team and his red sleigh, and they were really the best turn-out in the village in those days. Every day or so that sleigh would pull up in front of our house; but I was too close-lipped at the school to be in Hattie's way much.

"John and Charlie made an appointment for one Saturday, however, when we were both at liberty, for a grand trip out on the old south road. The sleighing was splendid, only, if any thing, there was too much snow.

"When they came for us John had his own team, and Charlie had procured a very good one somehow. Hattie, as a matter of course, took her seat in the red sleigh, and I told Charlie how much I prized him for having to be contented with only me; but he laughed mercrily, and seemed so cheerful about it that I didn't feel at all awkward.

"Off we started, all smothered up in furs and curled down in the deep, comfortable 'cutters' as warm as toast. The horses were a perfect jingle of bells, and so full of life that I almost felt nervous about them.

"Hattie was in a gale of spirits that morning, and her merry peals of laughter came back to us with the music of the bells, while from something in John's manner I had a sort of instinct that he had not invited her out that sleighing for nothing; and I was right about it, as I will tell you.

"They had driven three or four miles, and were a good distance ahead of our slower team, but John seemed to be getting more and more silent all the while, and Hattie rallied him about it.

"'I may well be a little sober, Hattie,' said he, 'for I think that to-day may have an influence for good or evil on my whole life.'

"'Why, Mr. Forbes,' said Hattie, 'are you afraid that your horses will run away and smash up your wonderful red sleigh?'

"'No, they know too much for that; but I am going to ask a question that is of great importance,' said he.

"'Why don't you ask it of Sallie, then? She is the schoolmistress, and knows every thing,' said Hattie.

"'Oh, I guess you know quite enough to tell me what I want to learn; and you must answer me truly and frankly, for my happiness for life depends on the result.'

"It must be a wonderful question,' said Hattie. "What can it be?'

"'Will you tell me if I ask you?'

"Hattie was beginning to feel a little 'flustered,' as she told me afterward; but her inborn love of mischief and coquetry came upon her too strongly to be resisted.

"They were just then passing a small house by the side of the road that had once been a kind of tavern. The family had moved out of it a few days before, and Hattie knew it, though John did not.

"'Mr. Forbes,' said Hattie, 'won't you be kind enough to stop and get me a glass of water? I can hold the horses.'

"John looked more than a little vexed; but he handed her the reins and jumped out. She gathered them firmly in her plump little hands; and, just as he was about to knock at the door of the empty house, she called out to him:

"'Mr. Forbes, I must take a little time to consider your question before I answer it. I will drive on a mile or so. When I come back perhaps I will tell you.'

"And, with a gay little laugh, Hattie drove recklessly away, leaving poor John looking very much like a fool as he leaned against the door-post.

"'The saucy minx!' said he. 'It's too bad! I wonder if she can manage those horses—they may break her neck before she gets back.'

"But the others will be here in a minute, and won't they laugh!'

"A new idea got into his head just then, for he was a hard man to catch, and when we came up he was quite ready for us.

"'Hullo, John!' exclaimed Charlie. 'Where's your team? Haven't had a quarrel, have you?'

"'Oh no, not exactly; only Hattie wants a change of drivers. She will be back after you in a minute, and I am to drive Miss Morris. Hattie has got something of great importance to say to you,' said John.

"'Oh! I see,' said Charlie. 'You asked—'

"But John put his finger on his lip, and Charlie stopped short. It was all a mystery to me; but Charlie got out and John got in, and away we whirled, leaving our friend kicking his heels to keep them warm, and looking anxiously for the return of the red sleigh.

"'And so,' said I, 'Hattie Oliver gave you the mitten, did she?'

"I was looking him straight in the face, and he colored as red as his own sleigh at first, as if with vexation; but then he put on a sort of roguish expression, and said:

"She tried a rather chilly sort of a joke on me, that's all, and I've turned it over to Charlie. Maybe it won't be at my expense now, after all.'

"I thought I saw through it, and we both laughed heartily, but John soon became quite sober and serious again. I thought, though, that I had never seen him look so well as he did just then.

"'Miss Morris,' said he, pretty quickly, as we spun along over the smooth snow, 'I have got a very important question to ask you.'

"It is the same Charlie Simmons was speaking about, and have you asked it of Hattie?' said I, mischievously.

"'Ah, this is no time, and yet it isn't, and she ran away from me before I could ask her. It affects my happiness very deeply, and I must have an answer to-day.'

"Somehow I did not want him to say another word just then, and he became silent, as if hesitating what to say. We had been driving fast, and had got some distance from where we had left Hattie, and just then we heard the swift jingle of bells coming up the road. It was Hattie in the red sleigh. She had managed to turn the horses around, but, as soon as they were headed for home, they started off at a tremendous pace, and she had not half strength enough to rein them in, though they were not exactly running away. We turned aside to let her pass, and she shot a quick glance of surprise and vexation at John as she whirled by us. John was a little scared about her, but he almost laughed as he saw that look.

"She will upset us, I am afraid,' said he. 'We must turn and follow her. Her joke on me is not so very good a one after all.'

"He was really uneasy, and put the borrowed team to its best speed, but they were no match for his own blacks. Hattie did her best, but all in vain, until she came near where Charlie was standing. He had been getting impatient, but he saw at once what was the trouble, and ran out toward the horses, through the snow-bank a little farther on, and he pointed to it and shouted to her to turn her horses into it.

"She understood his gesture better than his words, and in a moment more the black team, after a little plunging that only sent them in more deeply, stood snorting and trembling and almost covered up in the snow. Hattie was very nearly buried; but she was a brave girl, and she clung to the reins until Charlie came up, and we were there, too, very quickly.

"The two gentlemen went to work, unhitched the sleigh and the horses, and got them out, and then the horses were got out without much trouble and hitched in again.

"John was afraid to let any one else drive his horses after such an occurrence, and he and I transferred ourselves to the red sleigh, while Charlie and Hattie got into the others.

"She was as mute as a mouse, and I almost pitied her; but I had no need to do so. John was not silent long, but returned to his interrupted question. He was beginning in the same style as before, when I interrupted him again with:

"'Really, Mr. Forbes, you had better get your answer from Hattie. I assure you that it is out of my power to give you any information.'

"But that can not be,' said he.

"Well, then, I insist upon it that you get your answer directly from her. She is the only one who will tell you any thing,' said I.

"He looked exceedingly annoyed, and for a moment he was quite sorrow to his bones.

"It must be all true, then!' he muttered to himself, and then he was silent for some time.

"What he said, or what I said to him then, I will tell you by-and-by; but it would spoil the story to tell you now.

"Meantime Hattie and Hattie were following us as best they could, and it wasn't long before he found his tongue to say:

"Well, Miss Oliver, John tells me that you have something of importance to ask of me.'

"'I? That's only one of his jokes. He just did it to get out of the scrape I put him in.'

"Charlie looked a trifle crest-fallen for a moment; but his mind had been made up that day, and he said:

"'Well, if you have nothing of importance to say to me, I have something of importance to say to you. First, though, did not John himself ask you a question to-day? He told me he was going to do it?'

"Hattie looked at him in utter astonishment, but she knew how intimate the two men were, and she quickly said:

"'Yes, or he tried to.'

"And what did you tell him?'

"I gave him no answer as yet; and if I had, I do not see that you have a right to know what my answer was.'

"And her eyes flashed a little, for it was an awkward question to answer.

"Perhaps I have no right; but he is my best friend, and it is of the most vital importance to him. And now I must ask my own question.'

"He tried several times to do so, while Hattie sat there, coiling and uncoiling her under the buffalo-robes, but at last it jumped from his lips all at once.

"'Will you be my wife?'

"It was too bad, Hattie thought, knowing, as he did, all about John Forbes, for him to persecute her just then, and she told him so.

"'But,' said he, 'I don't see what John has got to do with it. My question is my own, not his.'

"'But how can I answer you until I have answered him? You must give me time to consider, and now you must drive me directly home.'

"Hattie had made a bad mess of it that morning, and she was now fairly beginning to cry. Charlie Simmons was at his wit's end, but he bit his lips and drove for home as rapidly as his horses could travel.

"We got home before them, of course, and a splendid ride we had of it. I have never seen any thing since that took my fancy half so much as that red sleigh when I turned and looked at it from the door as I went in.

"John came in with me to warm himself, and when Hattie and Charlie entered the parlor we were chatting away coolly enough before the blazing, old-fashioned fire-place.

"Hattie blushed crimson, and Charlie seemed wonderfully uneasy. I thought I could detect a vexed and mischievous expression on John's face, but he said, in his off-hand way:

"'Ah, Miss Hattie Oliver, I'm afraid of you this time. I got an answer to my question in spite of you.'

"I looked daggers at him, and tried to stop him, but he went on.

"She tells me that the story of the engagement ring was one of Widow Stone's own invention. Only there's no need of any more such invention hereafter.'

Hattie looked worse than ever, and looked from one of us to the other in a puzzled sort of way, and I could not help laughing.

"'What can it all mean?' said she.

"'I mean, that if you had let me finish my question this morning you wouldn't have been near what I was going to say. It's all right now.'

"'Is it, old fellow?' said Charlie. 'Then I wish you joy, from the bottom of my heart! Only I don't feel quite lucky.'

"Hattie gave him one look, and ran out of the room; but he followed her, and when they came back it was clear that he had made her give him an answer. I suppose it was about such a one as I had given John during my ride in the red sleigh.

That was the end of Aunt Sallie's story; but it puzzled us a little, and one of the girls spoke up:

"'Why, Aunt Sally, were you engaged to Mr. Forbes?'

"'Yes,' said Aunt Sally, "that is the old judge's wife nowadays; and there were so many other Browns in town that he mostly went by it until he became Judge, and that was years after we were married. Sometimes I wish I was a young again, and was back with John in the red sleigh, for life isn't all as merry and comfortable as a sleigh-ride.'

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

HOUSEHOLD RECIPES.—To beat carpets. Use matting; for coolness it beats carpets.—To make a winter garden. Fill a room with smoke and scatter.—To prevent the creaking of a door. Nail it up.—To obtain sleep. Have nothing but "nodding" squinting ances.—To keep up your spirits. Place the decanters on the root of the house.

TYPICAL TREES.

For gouty people—the ache corn.
For unfaithful married folks—the chestnut.
For school-boys—the birch.
For Irishmen—the cabbage.
For conjurers—the palm.
For lawyers—See the bill.
For young ladies—the man go.
For farmers—the plant'in.
For fashionable women—a set of fire.
For thimble-rig opera—
For actors—the pop'lar.
For physicians—yes a more.
For your wife—her will o.
For lovers—the sigh more.
For the discussions—the pine.
For engaged people—the pair.
For sewing-machine people—the hemlock.
For boarding-house keepers—an.
Always on hand—the pawpaw.
Who this is written for—yew.

A young couple went to a clergyman noted for his pious graces in manner. By an innocent mistake he began to read from his Prayer-book as follows: "Man that is born of woman is full of trouble, and hath but a short time to live." The astonished bridegroom suddenly exclaimed, "Sir, you mistake, we came to be married." "Well," replied the clergyman, "I did not know your errand now; but believe me, my friend, you had better be buried."

Boiling water is more estimable than cold, because that's kelly-fied by evaporation.

Why is law a cheap article?—Because it is always afforded at cost.

Why is your last birthday like sour milk?—Because it's something that has occurred (a curd). Ah!

A District School not far away.
Mid Berkshire hills, one winter day,
Was teeming with its wonted noise
Of threesome mingled girls and boys—
Some few upon their task intent,
But more on furtive mischief bent.
The while the master's downward look
Was fastened on a copy book—
When suddenly, behind his back,
Rose sharp and clear a rousing smack!
As 'twere a lever battery of blues
Let off in one tremendous skies.
"What's that?" the startled master cries.
"That, thir," a little imp replies.
"Wish William Tell'th dead, if you pleathe—
I thaw him kith Thuthannah Peathe."
With frown to make a statue chill
The master thundered—"Hither, Will?"
Like wreath o'erblown in his track,
With stolen chattels on his back,
Will hung his head in fear and shame,
And to the awful presence came—
A great, green, bashful simpleton,
The butt of all good-natured fun.
With smile empurpled, and birch upraised,
The thrasher faltered—"I'm amazed
That you, my biggest pupil, should
Be guilty of an act so rude!
Before the whole set school to boot—
What evil genius put you to't?"
"Twas she, herself, Sir," sobbed the lad.
"I didn't mean to be so bad:
And when Susannah shook her curls,
And whispered I was 'fraid of girls,
And dursn't kiss a baby's doll,
I couldn't stand it, Sir, at all.
But up I walked, kissed her on the spot!
I know—boo-hoo—I ought to not,
But, somehow, from her lovely—boo-hoo—
I thought she kind o' wished me to!"

STREET-CAR HINTS.

Gentlemen should stand as thickly as possible on the rear platform, even if there is plenty of room inside. It makes it so pleasant to ladies getting on board.

Don't put out your cigar, but get on the front platform with it, and smoke furiously, particularly if the doors are open and a strong draft blowing through. Don't neglect to spit as often as possible on the matting. It looks industrious.

Look diligently out of the window when a woman enters with a baby in her arms.

Talk politics in a loud voice; the ladies like it so much.

Don't be backward in filling platforms and passageways with baskets, bundles, and boxes. That is what the platforms and passage-ways are made for.

Blow up the conductor if he don't hold on for you late at night, or if he does hold on for any body else.

In stepping off when the car is in motion, always do it with your face toward the rear of the car. It is such capital exercise for the legs.

Ladies desiring to take a street-car should wait for one that is more crowded.

The rule is that a car shall only stop on the further side of a crossing. Always expect it to stop on the wrong side, and find fault with the conductor because he don't break orders.

If a conductor observes your signal, and stops his car for you, don't hurry any, even if you are in a rare or more away. The other passengers will feel so pleasant toward you.

A lady said to a gentleman, who was suffering influenza: "My dear Sir, what do you take for your cold?" "Five packets handkerchief a day, Madam."

When was Noah in America?—When he was on the Ark-and-saw.

BROADWAY, FEBRUARY, 1868.—[DRAWN BY W. S. L. JEWETT.]

BUFFALO ATTACKED BY WOLVES.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 106.]

BUFFALO ATTACKED BY WOLVES.

THE buffalo bull is Monarch of his Herd only during his youth; buffalo, like human, nature is ungrateful, and beasts and men renounce servants and leaders alike in their old age. With the buffalo the cry is, "The king is old, long live the young king!" When a buffalo king begins to show signs of decay he is not only deposed as leader, but exiled or driven from the herd as a useless member of buffalo society and left to take care of himself, which, owing to the weakness which caused his repulsion, he is not always able to do. During the summer months these aged exiles roam, sometimes singly, sometimes in bands of four or five, over the choicest pastures of prairie land, where they are an easy prey to wolves and Indians. The first, having plenty to eat in summer and being in that season rather the hunted than the hunter, do not care to struggle with the buffaloes; and the Indian has too much aversion to hard work to think of eating an old bull when young ones are to be had in such plenty.

But when the deep snows of winter come, and wood and water are scarce, the old-bull famishing then comes the "tug of war." Hunger gives the wolves courage, and they attack the old bull which can fall behind the herd in the battle. Several packs join forces, and a buffalo chase takes place the like of which summer hunters never see. Our spirited illustration on page 105 will, however, give them an idea of its exciting but unexciting alike to wolves, buffalo, and the fortunate hunter who witnesses it from a safe and respectable distance.

MY NEIGHBOR NELLY.

By MISS THACKERAY.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART I.

THEY were both my neighbors, of course; but I do not understand what kind of hearts people have who can apportion their love equally, according to the principles of justice. I saw as much of one sister as the other. And Martha was an excellent girl, quite honest and friendly and good, but as for Ellen, there never could be any question about her. One did not even think of discriminating which were her special good qualities. She was Ellen, and that was enough: so they, which I prefer for my part. We all lived at Dingfield Green in the old days. It is a model of a village, with its one little lane, its one kind of place, it is true, to which the name is generally applied, but a village one, as there are cottages enough in it. The green is small, and the pond is exactly in the middle of it. The green was the central point, a great triangular breadth of verdure, with, on one side, a small common than a village green, with the prettiest houses round—houses inclosed in their own grounds—houses at the very least surrounded by pretty gardens, peeping out from among the trees. None of us were very rich; nor was there any thing that could be called a "thing" in the style of dwellings. But I believe there was as much good blood and good connection among us as are usually to be found in a much larger community. The great house opposite, which was separated from the Green by a fosse, and opened off on only a pretty sweep of lawn, belonged almost like a park, belonged to Sir Thomas Denzil, whose pedigree, as every body knows, is longer than the Queen's. Next to him was Mrs. Stokes's pretty cottage—one of the Stokes who have given their name to places all over the country, but who are in no way General Stokes, a C.B., and I don't know what besides; and her daughter married Lord Leamington. Next to them the Rectory considers to give a directory of the place—probably our neighbors, generally, may appear in their proper persons before my story is done.

The sisters lived next to me: my house being, as their father said, athwart their bows. The Admiral was a retired naval officer, not a ship, or shop, as the gentlemen call it, in ordinary conversation; but he did say that my cottage lay athwart his bows; and the gale admitted that it would have been unpleasant had it been any body but me: I was then a rather young widow, and had no children, old nor vast much of a house. My cottage was very pretty, I will admit that there was not so pretty a room in all the Green as my drawing-room; but it was small. My house stood with its gable-end to the Green, and fronted the lodge which was the boundary of Admiral Fellowes's grounds. His big gate and my small one were close together, and I had a private door into his park. I should have commanded a full view of the lawn before his house and the door; and nobody could have gone out or come in without my inspection. They were so friendly that it was once proposed to cut it down, and give me and my flowers more air: but we both reflected that we were under circumstances might change with both of us; that might die, and some one else come to the cottage whose inspection might not be desirable: or the Admiral might die, and his girls be married, and strangers come. In short, the end of it was that the hedge remained; but instead of being a thick holly wall, like the rest of my inclosure, it was a picturesque hedge of hawthorn, which was very sweet in spring and a perfect mass of convolvulus in autumn; and it had gaps in it and openings. Nelly herself made a round cutting just opposite my window, and twined the honey-suckle into a frame for it. I could see them through it as I sat at work, and could see them at their croquet, and mounting their horses at the door, and going out for their walks, and doing their capricious gardening. It was Nelly only who ever attempted to work in the garden on the other side: afraid of her hands and her complexion, and a hundred things. Nelly was not afraid of any thing—not of any thing. Nicholson, the gardener, who filled me with awe and trembling. Perhaps you may say that there was not much fear of her complexion. She was brown, certainly, but with the prettiest brown—clear, with crimson flushes that went and came, and changed her aspect every moment. Her eyes are the softest dark ones eyes I ever saw; they did not penetrate or flash or sparkle, but glowed on you with a warm, lambent light. In winter, with her cap and furs, she was the prettiest little figure; and the cold suited her, and made her glow and bound about like a creature of fire. As for Martha, she was a great deal larger and whiter than her sister. I suppose, on the whole, she was the prettier of the two though she did not please me. They were their father's only children, and he was very fond of them. Their mother had been dead so long that they had no recollection of her; and the girls were not without those defects which girls brought up in a man are apt to have. They were rather disposed to think that any thing could be had for a little coaxing. Perhaps they had more confidence in their own blandishments than is common with girls, and were more ready to use them, knowing how powerless papa was against such assaults. They were differently, but to the same reason. The Admiral was too fond of them to part with them; and he was one of the men who have neither time nor inclination to study, or have a lady, not even a middle-aged governess, in his house. He had expensive masters for his girls, and made them ride with himself, with those excellent gentlemen, and grew up with the very smallest amount of education compatible with civilization. Martha, I was told, was clever, like Nelly, who was very bright, and asked about every thing, and jumped at an instant understanding of most of the things I told her. But I do not answer in Martha's case, who was not bright, and was the sort of girl who wanted to be taught music, for instance, and who had to practise six hours a day. Without being taught, and without practising, she good girl (for Nelly), as she explained, had no ear for music, although it her duty to play to amuse her friends; and the result was a trial to the temper of Dingfield Green. We had concerts, and private theatricals, and Martha heard them continually, but never was enlightened as to the nature of her own performance—a matter which, I am sure, was common every time her sister approached the piano. But Nelly was my favorite, as every body knew, and, as a natural consequence, I did her sister less than justice.

We led a very pleasant, delightful life in those days. Some of us were richer, and some poorer; but we all visited each other. The bigger houses asked the smaller ones to dinner, and did not dislike to put up for a return visit to us. Sometimes, in the afternoon, if we crossed the Green (and could hear any thing for the banging of the drawing-room windows), we would be sure to hear, in one quarter or another, the click of the croquet balls, and find all the young people of the place there, divided over their game, not without groups of the elder ones sitting round on the edge of the well-mown lawns. What could be more jolly? Of course many romance did, and there was a difficulty which party to class me with; but by degrees I found my position as the neighbor who was the general guardians of the society; and by degrees my young neighbors came to be appropriated to me in the same manner. Their mothers used to come together, and we went to parties together; and, of course, a little gossip got up about the Admiral girls—gossip which was not displeasing to Martha, for I detest second marriages, and, indeed, have had quite enough of it for my part. But Nelly took a delight in every body's affairs, which would be too light a word. She had never known a wound intimately before—never one older than herself, to whom she could look as about half a companion. And she liked it, and so did I.

There was one absurd peculiarity about the two girls which I shall always think to be the foundation of all the mischief. They never called each other, nor were called, by their names. They were "it's sisters" to each other; and I suppose it was a fancy of their father's—he called them "the sisters" always. They called each other Sister when they spoke to or of each other, and always me at first, and I made an attempt to change the custom. But Martha disliked her name. She had been called after her godmother, and she thought it was a shame. "Martha and Ellen" she said, indignantly. "What could papa be thinking of? It sounds like two maid-servants in the alms-house. And other girls have such pretty names. I'm call me Martha!" Miss Mulgrave, I will never speak to you again." From you can thought of it, it was a hard case. I felt for her, for my own name is Mary, and I remember what trouble it was to me when I was a girl; and the general use and wont of course overcame me at last. They were always Martha and Nelly when on the Green. I believe some of us did not even know their proper names. I said mischief might come of it, and they would be sorry for it when came a time when Nelly, at least, laughed at me no more.

It was in the early summer that young Llewellyn came to stay with the Denzils at their great house opposite. He was a distant cousin of theirs, which was a servant that his family was all that could be desired. And he had a nice little property in Wales, which had come to him unexpectedly on the death of an elder brother. And, to crown all, he was a sailor, having gone into the navy when he was a second son. Of course, being a naval man, it was but natural that he should be brought to the Admiral first of all. And he very soon got to be very intimate with the house; and, indeed, he was always in the house in the Green. I believe it is natural to sailors to have that hearty, cordial way. He came to see me, though I had no particular attraction for him, as cheerfully as if I had been a girl, or alas! had girls of my own. Perhaps it was the opening in the hedge that pleased him. He would sit and look, but he did not speak to me of the sisters—more's the pity. He was shy of that subject. I could see he was in real earnest, as the children say, by his shyness about the girls. He would say something about them, and then relapse into silence on the subject, and come back again half an hour after to the identical point he had started from. But I suppose it never occurred to him that I had any skill to fathom that. He went with them on all their picnics, and was at all their parties, and he rode with them, riding very well for a sailor. The rides are beautiful round Dingfield. There is a royal park close at hand, where you can gallop on turf spread in grassy glades and alleys without number. I have even been tempted to put myself on my old pony and wander about within them on the royal paths under the trees; though, as for their canterings and gallopings, and the way in which Nelly's horse kicked up his head when it got excited, they were always alarming to me. But it was a pleasant life. There is something in that moment of existence when the lover who are to go together through life see each other first, and are mysteriously attracted toward each other, and forever closer and closer, and all their dreams, and mate themselves under some secret compulsion which they do not understand—I say there is something in that moment which throws a charm over life to all their surroundings. Though it be all over for us; though, perhaps, we may have been in love with other natures thoroughly disenchanted, or may even have grown bitter in our sense of the difference between reality and romance, still the first time of an incipient wooing gives a zest to our pleasure. There is something in the air, some magical influence, some glamour, radiating from the eyes and the heroine. What every thing is settled, and the wedding looms in sight, fairy-land melts away, and the lovers are no more enchanted than any other pair. It is, perhaps, the uncertainty, the chance of disaster; the sense that one may take flight or offense, or that some thing unforeseen, or a hundred things happen to dissipate the rising tenderness. There is the excitement of a drama about it—a drama which the lovers are themselves ignorant of, an existence, and utterly regardless of all the unities. I thought I could see the little scene, the way my pet and favorite gradually grouping itself with young Llewellyn. They were always in the garden, whatever the arrangements of the party might be. They might drive to the Dingle, which was our favorite spot, in different carriages, which would not prevent their finding themselves; but other people began to smile, and Lady Denzil, I could see, was watching Nelly. She had always been very fond of her young cousin since he came to the estate. Nelly, too, once had very different views. I knew what her friend was. One of the men in the blond young giant, six feet at least, with blue eyes, and curling golden hair. He was to farm his own land, and his ambition was to be of no profession; and he was to be pure Saxon, to counterbalance a little defect in Nelly's race; or rather, as she supposed, to counterbalance the unlucky fact the fact that her mother was of Spanish blood. Such was her ideal, as she had often confided to me. It was there in the dark, slim gipsyish and capricious vision melted out of her mind. Llewellyn was not very tall; he was almost as dark as Nelly. He was Welsh, and he was a Welshman. What did it matter? One can change one's ideal so easily when one is under twenty. Perhaps in his imagination he had loved a mild, white maiden too.

Lady Denzil, however, watched, having, as I have said, a keen eye for characters in her mind for Llewellyn, though she had no daughter of her own; and I am sure it was her influence which hurried him away by the day without taking leave of any of us. She kept back the telegram which summoned him to join his ship until there was time for him to catch the train, and so he had to rush away, taking off his hat to us, and almost getting out of the window of the carriage in his eagerness, while Nelly stood by at the Admiral's door, as he dashed past to the station.

"Good-by, for the moment!" he shouted; "I hope I am coming back." And I could see, by the color in Nelly's cheek, that their eyes had met and understood each other. Her sister looked at them, and grew graciously, and chattered about a hundred things.

"I wonder why he is going in such a hurry?" I wonder why he is not coming round coming back?" said Martha. "I am sure I am very sorry he is going. I am very nice, and always ready for any thing. What a bore it is!" I remember that when papa was like that—always rushing away. Don't you, Nelly? but you were too young."

"I remember hearing mamma talk of it," said Nellie, with a sigh.

She was serieuse, clouded over, every thing that it was natural to be under the circumstances. She would not trust herself to say he was nice. She was a little reserved, and keep up the conversation for her. For my own part, I confess I was vexed that he had gone so soon—that he was gone without an explanation. These things are far better to be settled out of hand. One goes away; but nobody can make sure how one may come back—or what one may find when one comes back. I was sorry, for I knew a hundred things might happen to detain, or keep him silent; and Nelly's heart was caught, I could see. She had been quite unsuspecting, unfearing; and it was gone ere she understood what she was doing. She looked a little for her pet, and not with any fear of the result, but only with a certain throbbing of experience and anxiety that springs therefrom. Experience does not produce hope in the things of this world. It lays one's heart open to suspicions and fears which never trouble the innocent. It was not because of any thing I had seen in Llewellyn; but because I had seen a great deal of the world, and things in general. This was why I kissed her with a little extra meaning, and told her to lie down on the sofa when she got home.

"You are not been looking your best for some days," I said. "You are not a giantess, my dear, to visit as you pretend to do. You must take care of yourself." And Nelly, though she made no reply, kissed me in her clinging way in return.

Some weeks passed after that without any particular incident. Things went on in their usual way, and though we were all very fond Llewellyn was gone, we made no particular moan over him after the first. It was very rarely that a day passed on which I did not see the sisters; but the weather was beginning to get cold, and one Friday there was a fog which prevented me from going out. Ours is a low country, with a great many trees, and the river is not far off; and when they is a fog, it is very dreary and overwhelming. It closes in over the Green, so that you can not see an inch before you; and the damp creeps into your very bones, though it was only the end of October, and the trees hung invisible over our heads in heavy masses, now and then dropping a faded leaf out of the fog in a ghostly, sweet way. And I did not see the sisters. I had a new book, for which I was very thankful, and my fire burned brightly, and I did not stir out of my chair all day. I remember it seemed to me a little that the girls did not come in to me in the evening, as they had a way of doing, with their red cloaks round them and the hoods over their heads, like Red Riding Hood. But I took it for granted they had some friends from town, or something particular on hand; though I had not heard any carriage driving up. As for seeing that was impossible. Next morning, by a pleasant change, was bright and sunny. For the first time that season the hedges and gardens, and even the Green itself, was crisp and white with hoar-frost, which, of course, did not last, but gave us warning of winter. When I went out I met Nelly just leaving her own door. She did not see me at first, with her head tucked up, and the little black hat with the red feather, which was always so becoming to her. But when I was on the point of calling out to her, there was something that matter with the child. I don't remember whether I have said that she had large brown eyes, which, when she was thinking as usual, or ill, looked out of proportion to the size of her face. They had this effect upon me that day. She did not see me at first, and I had the only a big pair of wistful, soft eyes looking at one, with shadowy lines round them. I was alarmed, to tell the truth, however I saw her. Either something had happened, or the child was ill.

"Good morning, my dear," I said; "I did not see you at all yesterday, and felt dull in consequence. Were you coming to me now?"

"No," said Nelly again—and even in the sound of her voice there was something changed—"it is so long since I have been in the village. I had thought I would go there this morning, and take poor Mary Jackson some warm clothes she have been knitting for the babies. It is cold to-day."

"I thought you never felt the cold," said I, as one does without thinking. "You are always as merry as a bird in the winter weather when we are all shivering. Do you know you look pale? And the cold."

"No," said Nelly again. "I suppose it is only the first chill"—and she gave me a strange little sick smile, and suddenly looked down and stooped to pick up something. At the moment there was nothing to pick up. Could it be that there were tears in her eyes which she wanted to hide? "But I must go," she said. "I went on, hurriedly. "Oh no, don't think of coming with me; it is too cold, and I shall have to walk fast, I suppose, in such a hurry. Good-by."

I could do nothing but stand and stare after her when she had gone on. What did it mean? Nelly was not given to taking fits of crying, being temper—at least not in this way. She walked away so rapidly that she seemed to vanish out of my sight, and never once looked round, but turned aside for any thing. The surprise was so great that I actually forgot where I was going. It was not long before I remembered that I could know what was the matter. As I was going in Martha met me coming out. She was in her red cloak, like Nelly's, and she had a letter in her hand. When she saw me she laughed and blushed a little. "Will you come with me to post, Mrs. Mulgrave? she said. "Sister would not wait for me; and when one has an important letter to post—Martha went on, holding it up to me and laughing and blushing again.

"What makes it so very important?" said I; and I guess that I tried very hard to make out the address.

"Oh, didn't she tell you?" said Martha. "What a funny girl she is! If it had been me I should have rushed all over the Green, and told every body. It is—can't you guess?"

And she held out to me the letter in her hand. It was addressed to Captain Llewellyn, H.M.S. Swiftfire, Portsmouth. I looked at it, and I looked at her, and wonder took possession of me. The address was in Martha's handwriting. It was she who was going to post it; it was she who, conscious and triumphant, giggling a little and blushing a little, stood waiting for my congratulations. I looked at her aghast, and my tongue failed me. "It was only with a cermeans," I said, gasping. "I can't guess. Is it you who have been writing to Captain Llewellyn, or is it Nelly, or who is it? Can there have been any mistake?"

Martha was offended, as indeed she had reason to be. "There is no mistake," she said, indignantly. "It is a very strange sort of thing to say, when my friend, any acquaintance even, would have congratulated me. And you know us so well! Captain Llewellyn has asked me to marry him—that is all. I thought you might have found out what was coming. But you have no eyes for any body but sister. You never think of me."

"I beg your pardon," said I, faltering; "it was so much taken by surprise. I am sure I wish you all happiness, Martha. Nobody can be more anxious for your welfare than I am—" And here I stopped short in my confusion, choked by the words, and not knowing what to say.

"Yes, I am sure of that," said Martha, affectionately, looking at the girls to give me a kiss. "I said so to sister this morning. I said I am sure Mrs. Mulgrave will be pleased. But are you really so much surprised? Did you never think this was how it was to be?"

"No," I said, trembling in spite of myself; "I never thought of it. I thought, indeed—but that makes no difference now."

"What did you think?" said Martha; and then her private sense of pride and pleasure overmounted every thing else. "Well, you see it is so," she said, with a beaming smile. "He kept his word, you see. I should not have been so thought he was so shy—should you? I dare say he thinks he showed it more than he did; for he says I must have seen how it was from the first day."

And she stood before me so beaming, so dimpling over with smiles and pleasure, that my heart sank within me. Could it be a mistake, or was it I—ah, how little it mattered for me—was it my poor Nelly who had been deceived?

"And did you?" I said, looking into her face, "did you see it from the first day?"

"Well, not quite," Martha, hesitating; and then she resumed with a laugh, "That shows you how shy he must have been. I don't think I ever suspected such a thing as that. But I am sure, I never thought much about him, you know."

A little gleam of comfort came into my heart as she spoke. "Oh, then," I said, relieved, "there is no occasion for congratulations after all."

"Why is there no occasion for congratulations?" said Martha. "Of course there is occasion. I wanted better to run in and tell you last night, but she wouldn't; and I rather wanted you to tell me what I should say, or, rather, how I should act. But I managed a little for that myself. I suppose one always can, if one tries. It comes by nature, people say." And Martha laughed again, and blushed, and cast a proud glance on the letter she held in her hand.

"But if you had thought of him yesterday," said I, "you can't have accepted him today."

"Why not?" said Martha, with a toss of her pretty head—and she was pretty especially in that moment of excitement. I could not refuse to see it. It was a mere piece of pink and white prettiness, but it was all the gratification my mind, with her soft eyes, and her bright varied gleams of feeling and intelligence. But then you can never calculate on what a man may think a proper act to a girl. Men are such fools; I mean where women are concerned."

"Why not?" said Martha, with a laugh. "I don't mean I am frantically in love with him, you know. How could I be, when I never knew he cared for me? But I always said he was very nice: and then it is so suitable. And I don't care for any fellow. It would be very foolish of me to refuse him without any reason. Of course," said Martha, looking down upon her letter, "I shall think of him very differently now."

What could I say? I was at my wit's end. I walked over by her side to the post-office in a maze of confusion and doubt. I dashed in, snatched the letter out of her hand, and turn it into a heavy mail-bag, that would have done little good; and how could I tell if it was a mistake after all? He might have sought Nelly for her sister's sake. He might have been such a fool, such a dolt, as to prefer Martha. All this time he might but have been making his advances to her covertly, and I, in my shield, as it were, of the gay bright creature who was too young and too simple-hearted to understand such devices. Oh, my little mischief! no wonder her eyes were so large and shadowy, her pretty cheeks so colorless! I could have cried with vexation and despair as I stood there ready for any thing in the world on the quiet country road. Though she was so far from being bright, Martha at last was struck by my silence. It took her a considerable time to find it out, for naturally her own thoughts were many, and her mind was fully preoccupied, but she did observe it at last.

"I don't think you seem to like it, Mrs. Mulgrave," she said; "not so much as I thought you would. You are the very first person I thought of, I was coming to tell you when I met you. And I thought you would sympathize with me and be so pleased to hear—"

"My dear," said I, "I am pleased to hear any thing that is for your happiness; but then I am so much surprised. It was not what I looked for. And then, good Heavens, if it should turn out to be some mistake—"

"Mrs. Mulgrave," said Martha, angrily, "I don't know what you can mean. This is the second time you have talked of a mistake. What mistake could there be? I suppose Captain Llewellyn knows what he is doing; unless you want to be unkind and cross. And what have I done that you should be so disagreeable to me?"

"Oh, my dear child!" I cried, in despair, "I don't know what I mean; I thought once—then you, Major Frost, you know—"

"Oh, is it that?" said Martha, restored to perfect good-humor; "poor Major Frost! But of course if he did not choose to come forward in time he could not expect me to wait for him. You may make your mind quite easy if that is all."

"And Martha's letter was a little coronet," "Captain Llewellyn paid Nelly a great deal of attention. He might have thought—"

"Yes," said Martha, "to be sure; and I never once suspected that he meant it for me all the time."

I ask any body who is competent to judge, could I have said any more? I walked to the post-office with her, and I saw the letter put in. And an hour afterward I saw the little coronet rippling past with the bags, and knew it had set out to its destination. He would get it next morning, and the two days would be lost for ever and ever. The wrong two?—or was it only we, Nelly and I, who had made the mistake? Had it been Martha he sought all the time?

SENSATIONAL LITERATURE.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA, of sensational literary fame, has been publishing in the Tribune a highly sensational magazine in defense of "sensationalism in Literature and Art," in which he says in part:

"What is Sensationalism, and who is Sensational? I will strive to tell you. The late Mr. William Shakespeare was an accomplished sensational writer. He wrote the play of 'Macbeth,' which is founded mainly on murder and witchcraft. He wrote 'Richard the Third,' which was many murders, a suicide, a suspicion of madness, and a ghost. He wrote 'Othello,' in which there is jealousy, murder, and suicide. He wrote 'King Lear,' in which there is murder, blindness, and madness. He wrote 'Antony and Cleopatra,' in which there is suicide. He wrote 'Julius Cæsar,' in which there is murder and a ghost. He wrote 'Richard the Third,' in which there are no end of murders and no end of ghosts. He wrote 'Romeo and Juliet,' in which there is poison, murder, and premature interment. He wrote the 'Merchant of Venice,' in which there is robbery and elopement, and an attempt on the part of a Jew bill-discounter to cut open the stomach of a Christian gentleman. The late Mr. de Voltaire highly objected to Shakspeare's sensationalism. He called him an barbare grotesque. He preferred such writers as Racine and Corneille, in which there is murder and a ghost. He wrote 'Richard the Third,' in which there are no end of murders and no end of ghosts. He wrote 'Romeo and Juliet,' in which there is poison, murder, and premature interment. He wrote the 'Merchant of Venice,' in which there is robbery and elopement, and an attempt on the part of a Jew bill-discounter to cut open the stomach of a Christian gentleman. The late Mr. de Voltaire highly objected to Shakspeare's sensationalism. He called him an barbare grotesque. He preferred such writers as Racine and Corneille, who never murdered anybody, and never even let us hear the murdered Agamemnon groaning behind the scenes. He liked Peloponnesian sulfurry, Rhetodician sentiment, and Attic tears. But Johnson, Beaumont, Fletcher, were not sensational writers. Ben's most sensational play, 'The Alchemist,' contains but little murder, and no larder, a swindler, and a woman of the town. Desdemona is sensational; Doll Common is not so. Beaumont and Fletcher's Aspatia was 'the maid' of their age with strength, richness, and raciness; they represented the manners of their time with philosophic calmness. Middleton's plays were plays of Manners, and not of Human Nature. What has become of Ethelrege's 'Love in a Tub,' and Wycherley's 'Gentleman Dancing-master,' and Rowe's 'Biter'? Where are Massinger, Shirley, Vanbrugh, Congreve, and Farquhar? Who reads Cumberland's 'West Indian' or Lillo's 'Fatal Curiosity,' or the 'Custom of the Country,' or the 'Beggar's Bush,' or the 'Humorous Lieutenant,' or the 'Little French Lawyer,' or the 'Scornful Lady?' Who knows much about 'The Fox,' or the 'New Inn,' or the 'Staple of News?' Yet the people who read these books are not by any self-conceited wits and sages as infinitely superior to Shakspeare. Have they kept possession of the stage? Will they maintain possession of the stage again? Away from bookmen's shelves, the whole rout of them are as dead and gone as a thunder-shop-keeper's bill. Let us hear at more length.

"In the creation of dolts, and dullards, and serious backbiters, every thing is 'sensational' that is vivid, and nervous, and forcible, and graphic. Let us hear what the sensational in the wretched dunbs of Benjamin West, or the heartless tea-tray varnishing of Mings; but there is no 'sensational' sentiment in the art of either Hogarth, and Goya. Miguel de Cervantes wrote sensationally, but Gonsalvo was a sensational sculptor. The late Mr. Buckle's style would be considered sensational by disturbed by the old admirers of nonplussly simple and woolly mezzotint as vaccinated by the old Quarterly Reviewers and the Grub Street Journal and the Daily Intelligencer were not sensational papers. The Telegraph, the Standard, the Post are dismally sensational. Mr. Millais is a sensational painter, so is Mr. Holman Hunt. Mr. Woolner is a sensational sculptor; Mr. Buckle's style is sensational; Macaulay is sensational; Dr. Darwin is a sensational philosopher; Mr. Rechter is a sensational actor; Mr. Spurgeon is a sensational preacher; Mr. Ruskin is a sensational theologian; so, from another point of view, is Dr. Newman; so, from another point, is Professor Tyndall. As for Mr. Kingsley, the poet, novelist, parson, and historian, he was always sensational. Belgravia is a sensational magazine, and Miss Braddon is a dreadfully sensational novelist. M. Nélaton is a sensational surgeon; M. Edmond About a sensational writer. Napoleon III. a sensational sovereign; and Graf von Bismarck a sensational statesman. As for Garibaldi, he was never more than a sensational patriot; and it was only General Grant's sensational obduracy that caused the Southern Confederacy to collapse.

"This is the cry, this is the yelp, this is the howl in which the dullards, and the dolts, and the backbiters revel. Suppose that the sensible portion of society consented just for a season to lay down their arms, and allow the non-sensationalists to have their way? No more sensation plays, no more sensation poems—by-the-way, 'Maud' is glaringly sensational, and so is 'Enoch Arden'—no more sensation novels, no more sensation leading-articles, no more sensation pictures, no more sensation sermons, no more sensation speeches. Let us go back to the soothly dull, to the tranquilly inane, to the timorously decorous, to the woodly stupid. Don't let us move, don't let us travel, don't let us hear or say any thing; but let us write sonnets to Chloe, and play madrigals on the guitar, and compose minuets, and pray to Heaven against Sensationalism, the Pope, the Devil, and the Pretender; and then let Dullness reign triumphant, and Universal Darkness cover all."

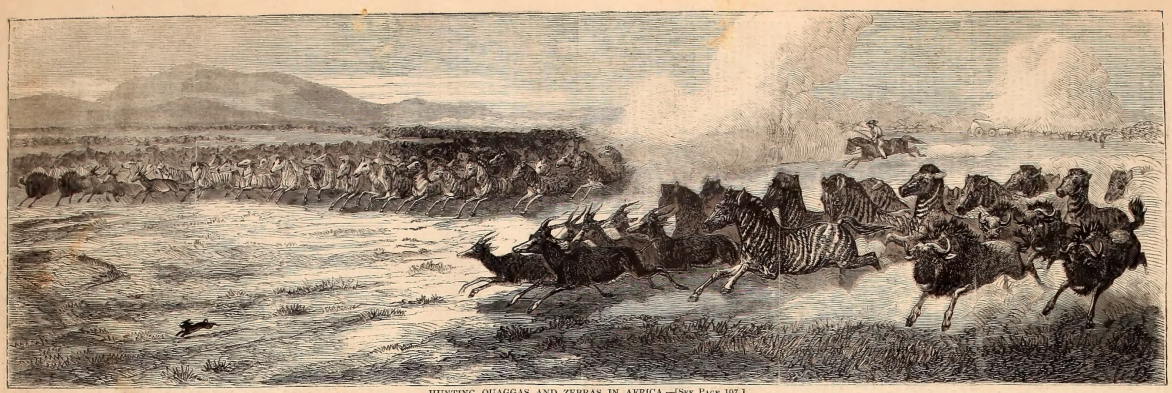
HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FIFTY years ago a single room in a private dwelling was our largest idea, and one man and one boy were considered competent to receive, deliver, distribute, and make up the mails that came into and left this city. To-day, the business of our General Post-office there are fourteen stations, one of which, Station D, is said to receive, assort, and dispatch letters from does the Post-office at Albany; and hundreds are employed in the delivery and the delivery of postal affairs. One or two simple facts—though they are astounding ones—will give some idea of the increase of business in one department of the New York Post-office during the last ten years. In 1859 the average number of letters received daily at the "box department" was fifteen thousand; now the letters received nightly average twenty-five thousand. Also the number of letters received at the "drop" from carriers and stations between the hours of six P.M. and half past twelve A.M. amounted to about twenty thousand. Now the number of letters received between half past six P.M. and half past twelve A.M. is about forty thousand, the increase amounting to about forty-five thousand. During the twelve months ending with November, 1867, nearly nineteen millions of letters were collected from the mail-boxes, while over twelve millions of mail letters and more than five millions of drop letters were delivered by carriers to our citizens. This statement does not include the letters delivered at the general delivery, and eight hundred boxes which are at present rented at the Post-office.

The addition which has this month been made to the number of carriers—the whole body numbering now about three hundred and twenty-five—is frequent, and careful delivery.

It was announced by Postmaster James Lolly, on his recent visit to England, that the whole secret of the rapid and accurate postal arrangements of London was in the simplicity of the system; that, throughout Great Britain and Ireland, three men on the average were employed where five were expected at once in the United States. No less than two thousand and six hundred carriers are employed in London. This is even after making every deduction for difference of population which figures will allow, and after giving American clerks credit for better skill, industry, and rapidity in work which national pride might possibly suggest. Mr. Lolly declared that no such number of clerks were needed to perfect our postal system. If that was very justly observed, it would be a reflection on British postal system is superior to ours—its servants are appointed for life, or during good behavior; and when dismissed by ill-health or age are pensioned. With no respect for service and age is not considered. A man may grow grey-headed and infirm in his health in the post-offices and then be dismissed at an hour's notice to make room for some political favorite, who in his turn must give place to another.

It is related of Sir Frederick Bruce, the late British Minister, that he was struck on one occasion at Washington by the noise and the activity of the whole of the arrangements. He was also much amused when foreigners entered his house in the night, but found the coveted forks, spoons, etc., were placed in safety. "In Canada," he said, "we should be afraid to do so. It does not remove the unpleasant shock resulting from a visit of housebreakers, but it does at least as a handsome set of gold or silverware in his house, or moves the mind. This machine may be set at any degree of temperature, and should a fire occur in its vicinity, and the temperature of the atmosphere rise above the fixed degree, an alarm is instantly given.



A Frenchman has made an ink from hydrochlorate of ammonia, bichromate of potash, and prepared blacksoap, which with any pen ineffaceable characters cannot be traced on glass. This ink will be of service to the tenants and solicitors by labelling bottles and marking gradations on glass.

SALMON-FISHING IN OREGON.

ONE of the chief occupations—or rather sports, since Indians do not admit that they ever work—of the Indians of Oregon, is that of spearing salmon, as represented in our engraving on page 108. When the salmon run down in the rivers, in a recumbent position, watching and waiting to spear the fish when they appear, they look, to a person at a distance, like great logs drifting for their prey, only that in the case of the Indians a long lance, which serves as a harpoon, is held poised in the hand and represents the long necks and beaks of the birds.

HUNTING IN AFRICA.

ONE of our engravings on page 108 is from a sketch by Mr. THOMAS BAINES, formerly a companion of DR. LIVINGSTONE in the explorations of the Zambesi River, and remembered as having some in Africa not unlike some of the buffalo hunting scenes which have been and still are to be witnessed in this country. The sketch was made on the Vaal River, in the month of October. Immense herds of wild animals congregate there in the dry season, when the smaller rivulets and pools are deprived of water. They consist chiefly of the "Keama quagga," or "Burchell's zebra," the "blesse bok," the gnu or "white-beast" (both of the black and the brindled varieties), the "hartebeest," the "pallah" antelopes, and ostriches; while vultures hover above, ready to descend upon the carcass of any that may be killed. The common or half-striped quagga is more often seen in Kaffirland, while the zebra is met with in mountainous districts. In their later journey to the Zambesi, MR. CHAPMAN and MR. BAINES found on the salt plains, in large herds, a quagga which seemed intermediate between Burchell's and the true zebra, having the small equine head, ears, hoofs, and tail of the first, with the complete and beautiful striping of the last.

HUNTING QUAGGAS AND ZEBRAS IN AFRICA.—[SEE PAGE 107.]

INDIANS FISHING FOR SALMON IN OREGON.—[SEE PAGE 107.]

LYING IN WAIT.—(See Poem, Page 110.)

BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ALBANY.—[Phot. by H. I. Fellows, Albany.]

FIRE AT ALBANY, NEW YORK.

We illustrate on this page the conflagration which destroyed the Academy of Music at Albany, on the morning of January 29. The fire commenced near the roof and burned downward, and yet the flames could not be mastered. The whole of the interior was destroyed and reduced to a mass of cinders and ruin. The building was first opened as a theatre in 1824. In 1829 it was sold and converted into St. Paul's Church. Some seven years ago the church people sold it to H. J. Hastings, who, in 1863, transferred it to John M. Trimble, by whom it was converted into a theatre. The Academy was the most beautiful place of amusement in Albany.

FENIAN ATTACK ON THE MARTELLO TOWER, DUNCANNON, IRELAND, JANUARY 17, 1868.—[See Page 110.]

LYING IN WAIT.

PERHAPS it was the sipping cold
That made me feel in mossy frame,
As lately through the woods I strolled
One chilly morn in quest of game.
I scarce had fetched my pointers round,
And passed from out the shrubby-gate,
The bullied bear turned, when astride I found
That three sharp-shooters lay in wait.

A sudden shock—a small surprise!
I started, looked around, and lo!
I saw three pair of laughing eyes;
I felt the power of snow.
I looked again, I looke! once more;
The leader of the snowy raid—
Methought it let her darts before—
Was bonny bright-eyed Adelaide.

In wait she hy! Her gentle look,
More potent than the sun above,
Soon as surprise my senses took,
Had thawed the snow-balls into love!
I thought, ah me! of last night's valse;
I laughed—no more in mossy mate
Turned to my stoic maxims false—
My fate was sealed—she'd laid in wait.

She'll killed a heart—that was her prey;
It yielded to her subtle snare:
The snow had melted all away;
More firm, love's arrow lingered there.
For love is worm and snow is cold,
And in her snow-ball love lay curled;
Love melted quick it's snowy fold—
The hell she gently at me hurled!

THE FENIAN WAR.

ENGLAND continues to be excited, and apparently very much frightened, by the exploits of the Fenians, who appear to be not only innumerable but invincible, and are to some extent supposed in one spot than they break out afresh in another. The last news from Ireland and England is more than usually exciting, embracing, as it does, the arrest and release of GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN, the prosecution of the proprietors of the Dublin Nation for the publication of inflammatory articles, the arrest of MARCUS ADAMS, the Head Centre of the London Brotherhood, and the two attacks on the Limerick Town Hall prisons in Ireland. The first of these, which took place on the night of May 20, we illustrate on page 109.

These Martello towers, of which we have heard a good deal during the Fenian War, are little forts which are supposed to defend the coast of the United Kingdom. Their construction dates back to the wars with France under NAPOLEON, and were intended to prevent descents on the coast. These forts bear the name of the Martello Towers; and are generally armed with a single cannon mounted on a pivot, and placed on the top of the fortification.

The full details of the fight's assault on this Martello tower have not yet been published; but we received here, though drawings of the scene have come to hand. The second attack took place on the night of May 27, and was made by a small body only of Fenians. After receiving the first fire of the garrison the attacking party retired, but did not leave the field. They remained until their numbers were largely increased from crowds who seemed to be near at hand, and again advanced upon the tower, beginning a general discharge of fire-arms, by which one of the garrison was wounded. When the assailants had almost reached the foot of the tower the troops again fired, and two men were seen to fall. The wound then fell back and disappeared in the darkness. The two men who were shot were carried off by their companions, and it is not known whether they were wounded or killed. The affair caused great excitement in Wexford County.

"MAKE A NOTE ON T."

IT is a bad plan, if you have been powerfully impressed by a thought, or scene, or event, and wish to preserve your impressions in their original vividness, not to make a record of them at once. Impressions are highly evanescent things, and, like fancy, while subjected to their powerful influence, that nothing can be easier than to recall them at will; but in after-years, when you try to do so, you find that it requires a greater effort than your memory is capable of. Even in a few days much of the vigor and freshness of the reminiscence has disappears; much of its lustreis rubbed off. Depend upon it, it is the only way if you want to preserve them from corruption and decay; embalm them at once in ink and paper. Gray, the poet, in one of his letters has some admirable observations on the wisdom of a man's immediately embodying in writing the notions and feelings rising in his mind by a place or event, if he would wish to recall them to himself or make them known to any one else at a future period. "I am every year but adding to this," he says, "being in a very insipid situation myself; and desire you would not fail to send me some furniture for my Gothic apartment, which is very cold at present. It will be the easier task, as you have nothing to do but transcribe your little red books, if they are not rubbed out; for I conclude you have not trusted every thing to memory, which is ten times worse than a leaf-pencil. Half a word fixed upon or near the spot is worth a cart-load of recollection. When we trust to the picture which objects draw of themselves on our mind, we deceive ourselves; without acurance and particular observation, it is but ill drawn at first; the outlines are soon blurred; the colors every day grow fainter, and at last, when we would produce it to any body, we are forced to supply its defects with a few strokes of our own imagination."

GEN. VAN WYCK AND THE GETTYSBURG SOLDIERS' HOME.

GENERAL VAN WYCK, who has been laboring zealously in Congress to destroy the enterprise for giving a home to our disabled veterans, in an excellent type of that determination less who may pull down but are unable to suggest the first idea for erecting a better structure. He is displeased with the Gettysburg plan for building the needed asylum, but gives no hint of any better manner in which the desired end can be reached. First they objected that in the project are worthless stones—though the greatest diamond dealers in the country say they reserve the form a diadem, the yacht "Henrietta" not worth an old song, and that the several large purses of greenbacks will prove more "filthy money" to the fortunate captors—glittering enough over night, but turning to dried leaves before the morning. On this point, however, that the charter of incorporation for the enterprise, said to have been granted by the Pennsylvania Legislature last year, is not a binding and valid charter; and, failing to say this, all the rest of his objections are mere leather and prunella. Here we have a charter for raising money to build a Soldiers' Home on the battle-field of Gettysburg; and, to accomplish this, authority is given for the distribution of prizes in a lottery scheme proposed by Generals BEAVEN, SICKEL, and the other directors. It is against the manner, therefore, and not against the matter of the movement, that General VAN WYCK, if at all, should direct his wrath. If he finds any of the prizes worthless, let him urge that they be thrown overboard and others substituted. If the diamonds are only paste, kick them into the gutter, and let "gems of purest ray serene"—poetic phrasing for VAN WYCK's own virtue—take their place. If the money prizes are not enough, let them be doubled or trebled. If the scheme is found to absorb only be rated at so much old junk, let her be scuttled wherever she may now lie, and in the finest steamer that can be leased to occupy her position. All this can be done within the limits of the incorporating charter, and the people will not greatly object to the expenditure that gives assurance our disabled soldiers will be cared for at last. But to attack VAN WYCK assails the charter itself, instead of the scheme now offered under its provisions, he is striking at the only project that has come before the country through which the people may express their gratitude to those who were crippled in defense of the flag.

If the United States were a monarchy or empire the matter of creating a Soldiers' Home would be comparatively simple. One form of an edict directing so much money to be raised by tax for that purpose; but here this cannot be done, owing to State jealousies, State rights, and the inveterate spirit of corrupt jobbing which now infects every public work. Every delegation in Congress, from the appropriation for a measure provided its own State should be assigned as the location for the new asylum; or even if the bill were not required to name any appropriation, the spirit of jobbery would interpose such delays that all the sufferers would be dead before the asylum was ready to receive them. What private enterprise can accomplish in a year public jobbers would take twenty years and twenty times the amount of money for completing; and it is eminently proper that in a work of national gratitude such as this the people should have a voice in selecting where their own hands, every member of the community being able to make a personal assessment of from one dollar upward as each may see fit, according to his or her means and wishes.

Lotteries, in every thing else, are not good per se, nor bad per se, but must be judged in connection with their object. Spain, Austria, and Prussia still raise a large portion of their revenue in this manner, and surely a civilized government on earth but has at one time or other resorted to this means of raising money for its necessities or grander charities—finding it by all odds the least odious manner in which money can be obtained, impost, tax, or even many men his own taxing-master, so that whether a dollar shall be given or ten thousand, can be decided by no other scheme than that of the individual donor. Looking at home also, is there to-day a charity fair, or fair for building a church in which we have not seen the ladies of the parish with the fairest and most pious of the gentler sex acting as ministering angels, the visitors are not requested to buy of the fair ones, or the extravagant "raffles" for the sake of promoting some pious object? "It is the cause, my soul, it is the cause!" Let us not be hypocritical in every thing; and while we earnestly applaud the activity of the postal and police authorities in breaking up the swindling lotteries, and the lottery schemes conducted by sharpers for their personal profit, we can not in any manner divine how a lottery authorized by law, and honestly and fairly conducted under responsible auspices for building a soldiers' home at Gettysburg, can come to be classed under the same denomination.

Turning back to our files we see that on the 20th of September, 1865, an enterprise precisely similar to this Gettysburg project, which lacks only the fourth of its site, was drawn at the Cooper Institute in New York, and the proceeds being devoted to founding a home for soldiers' orphans. The distribution was made under the personal supervision of Major-General VAN VLIET and BARLOW, the latter then Secretary of State; Judge CHARLES P. DALY, Treasurer of the Soldiers' Orphans' Fund; NATHANIEL JARVIS, JR., and others of equally high character, while the business manager of that enterprise was the same who is now manager of the project which General VAN WYCK condemns. From that enterprise ninety-nine thousand and odd hundred dollars were realized and duly paid over into the hands of Judge DALY as treasurer for the soldiers' orphans; so that here, as that scheme was less than one fourth the size of this, we have fair assurance that certainly not less than four or six hundred thousand dollars, besides the land already purchased, will be turned over to the trustees for building the Gettysburg Asylum. Perhaps this sum may be yet larger; but with every attack made upon it in Congress, or by the regular lottery and jobbery interests with whose profits it interferes, the expenses, of course, are increased and the difficulties magnified. The people, however, appear to have taken hold of it with a will; and until General VAN WYCK can offer them some better scheme of raising a Soldiers' Home it would be much wiser and more decent for the gallant General to hold his tongue. But whatever may be the result, we make this difference, for the asylum project is in the hands of men with whom there is no such word as fail, and with the sympathies of the people once enlisted, our disabled veterans may rest secure that the Gettysburg Asylum will be built, and that right quickly.—New York Herald.

REID'S PATENT POTATO BAKER is an excellent contrivance. BELL & CO., Buffalo, N. Y., have it for sale. See advertisement.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HARPER & BROTHERS have now ready:

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Notes in England and Abroad. Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

The charm of this volume is, in one word, its habitable artlessness, and its entire freedom from pretension. Affectation, pomp, and show are marks of the highest breeding, and the highest breeding adds dignity and grace to the most artless. All the Journals all is natural and all is pure.—Pittsburgh Review.

They have the most perfect naturalness of manner combined with exquisite gracefulness might give to another; but there is nothing about the book to have a far higher interest. They serve, as nothing else could, to show the Empress or doing it could serve, to set before her people the real tone of the life that the Queen has chosen for so many years continually leading; its simplicity, its truthfulness, its high family affections, its thorough sympathy with all around the royal persons who form the centre of that strong, calm, even, home life, and its perfect rest from public business, are still engaged in discharging family duties with the same kindness which few households could equal, and perhaps none surpass.—Saturday Review.

Since the Queen's belief in her own lack of literary gifts is strongly confirmed, most persons will be inclined to note the evidence which the "Leaves" afford, that in this, indeed, a very great difference in style between the royal and private writing. What the Queen wrote at twenty-three is prettily girlish—tender, generous, and sympathetic—but commonplace; she wrote at forty-seven. Each style has its own charm of lightness; but in all the Queen's writing there is a reserve which compensates a reader for the absence of severer and more conscious art.—Athenæum.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Theodore Martin. Portrait on Steel. New Edition. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, $2 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

Catarrh and Bronchitis. Never Cured. Known Way. These fatal diseases, the parents of Consumption, are never cured by any other means. Inhalation, combined with their Soothi, Troches, and Inhalations impart only temporary relief, leaving the diseases untouched. They have no remedy for Catarrh and Scrofula combined, and either in their separate forms. Dr. SANFORD'S Inhalations are Nature's Remedials from Plants, which I have used successfully in my practice, and which eradicate these diseases forever. Explanatory circulars one cent. Office, 214 Fulton St. SANFORD R. PRINCE, Flushing, N. Y.

DON'T FORGET TO SEND YOUR VALENTINE EARLY.

CALL ON YOUR OLD FRIEND STRONG, NOW AT NO. 579 BROADWAY.

THE FINEST ASSORTMENT IN THE WORLD.

FIRST PRIZE FUNNY BOOK, cut and racy is the "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER." Full of fun and humor. Agents wanted. Come Quarters. Address, Wm. HUNER, Philadelphia. It is unsurpassed. Nothing like it. Don't be swindled, and have your letters directed to another. Only 50 cents for a whole year. A splendid chance for agents. Specimens sent for 10 cents postpaid. Specimen 10 cents. Subscribe now. Address, STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make all kinds of Fancy Medicines, Perfumery, Toilet Articles, Cosmetics, Candies, Wines, Cordials, Soaps, Dyes, and hundreds of other articles in daily demand. Enclosed, and sold at large profits. Sent postpaid for 50 cents. Address, DEWEY & CO., No. 162 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any one sending 25 cents. Address, W. H. REPBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.

After Oil and Water-Color Paintings.

	PRICE.
Album or Cuba. (Poor Pictures).	$1 00
Autumn Leaves—Maple.	1 00
Autumn Leaves—Oak and Elm.	1 00
Wood Mosses and Ferns.	1 50
Bird's Nest and Lichens.	1 50
Nine American Views.	2 00
Group of Wild Flowers—Tulip.	3 00
Group of Ducklings.	5 00
Group of Cattle.	5 00
Six American Landscapes (per set).	9 00
Spring Flowers—Apple Blossoms.	6 00
Late Autumn in the White Mountains.	6 00

These are companion pieces, by A. F. Bricher.

The Bullfinch (after Cruikshank) } companions.	4 00
The Bunny, or, Going to the Bath.	3 00
The Assumption (after Titian) } companions.	3 00
The Poultry-Yard (after Lemmens).	4 00
The Rival Bucks (after Lemmens).	4 00
Poultry Life—B (comp'n pictures) } pair.	4 50
Bird Duets, by R. Bassett.	3 00
Flower Bouquet.	6 00
Blackberries Vase.	6 00
Corregglo's Magdalene.	10 00

Under the Apple-Trees (Lovely Niles)

Rest on the Roadside (companion) } pair.	8 00
Strawberries (after Gerdner) } companions.	7 50
Strawberries and Basket (The Gardner).	7 50
The Bird's-Nest (Second (after Ruth).	6 00
A Friend in Need.	6 00

* * Send for "PRANG'S CHROMO; A Journal of Popular Art," which contains a full catalogue of PRANG'S publications, with descriptions of the process of making Chromos, and Letters from Distinguished Persons on Popular Art. It will be mailed Free to any address by the Publishers.

L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

CORNS. BRIGGS'S CURATIVE Will Cure Corns, Bunions, Inverted Nails, Frosted Feet, &c., surpasses all other remedies. No more pain from Corns. Gives immediate relief from Bunions; no more limping from Ingrowing Nails. Briggs's Curative does not blister or burn, but soothes, softens, and heals all pedal ailments.

Mon. Sept. 30, 1867.—Dr. BRIGGS: Dear Sir—I will call at 579 Broadway, and see you. Yours truly, J. F. BRIGGS & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

IMPORTANT TO MAINE AND NEW HAMPSHIRE Men. Secure your vote or THOMAS M. MARKE DEMOCRAT, the largest Family Newspaper in the United States, sent Free. Address, advertising and publishing office,

CHAS. A. SHAW, Publisher, Biddeford, Me.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples sent free. Address A. J. FULLER & CO., Brunswick, Me.

All the Family Sewing.

BARTLETT'S REVERSIBLE SEWING MACHINES are the cheapest reliable machines. The style sold at $25 00 will do all kinds of sewing. Send stamp for circulars, or examine the different styles at the Office, Machine and Needle Depot, 569 Broadway, New York.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS. Manufactured by A. Seymour & Co., Box 27, Station A, New York.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the World."

Harper's Magazine.

FEBRUARY, 1868.

In the Number for JANUARY was commenced "THE PRIMROSE PATH," a Novel by MARGARET MITCHELL CRAIG, Author of "JOHN HALIFAX, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and entertaining variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the first of "The Mountains," a Novel, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "ARMADALE" and "MAN AND WIFE."

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Its articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Creese," a Novel, by J. E. MILLS.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albany Argus.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR, will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid, HARPER'S VOLUME, containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight at the Expense of the Purchaser.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY, Twenty Cents a Year, to be paid at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 20 cents additional for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY, or for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States Postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on the wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering Back Numbers of the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the Publication is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by Mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, 40 cents a line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Pages, $2 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

546 Broadway.

"In the hours of our Happiness and Prosperity let us remember the Unfortunate and Disabled Soldiers who saved us a Country and a Nationality."—LINCOLN.

GRAND POPULAR MOVEMENT

TO ERECT THE

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM

FOR INVALID SOLDIERS,

CHARTERED BY THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, MARCH 6, 1867.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

The object of this Association is to provide, by public exertion, a NATIONAL HOME for our disabled Soldiers, to erect an asylum for those who, in their patriotism have served their Country at the expense of their health and happiness; who, in the battle for the Nation's life were maimed, and are now incapable of working for their own maintenance. France has her Hotel Des Invalides, and has not the solace of the great Napoleon; England her Greenwich and Chelsea Asylums, but Germany, alone, can define one of the finest architectural structures ever devoted to charity. Russia, Prussia, and in fact, nearly all European Countries have magnificent retreats for the unfortunate Soldiers. Nonecities provide for the alleviation of the suffering caused by war, but free, prosperous, REPUBLICAN AMERICA has no place for her crippled and sick Soldiers but the country poor-house, or the hospitals of her crowded cities. These noble patriots left happy homes to save our common country in the hour of her deep distress. We pledged to them our living gratitude, and now those who are dependent look to us in their utter need to redeem these pledges. They have performed their part—we enjoy the result of their sacrifices: we must not be recreant to our obligations. Let us each devote but a single dollar to this purpose, and the Gettysburg Asylum will afford the Soldiers a Home, and our Country will be honored by the noble Institution.

THE LAND HAS BEEN PURCHASED

By this Association, and Ten Thousand Dollars have already been paid toward the preservation of the Battle-Ground: about thirty acres (adjoining the site of General Meade's Headquarters) have been set apart for the uses of the Asylum.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

At a meeting of the Incorporators, held in the City of Philadelphia, January 10, 1868, it was Resolved, that the entire net proceeds should be devoted to the erection of the Asylum.

General JAMES A. BEAVER, President.
General HORATIO G. SICKEL, Treasurer.

We hereby certify that we have examined the Diamond Goods, Pearls, Emeralds, Rubies, and other precious Stones, as described in the list, and find them all genuine.

HENRY HUNT, Diamond Importers, 24 Maiden Lane, New York.
J. HERMANS, Diamond Setter, 294 Broome Street, New York.

Having perfect confidence in the integrity of our associates, and heartily endorsing our noble object, it affords me pleasure to tender you gratuitously the use of my show-window for the display of your diamonds.

JOHN D. HOWE, 913 Broadway.

From the Postmaster General of the United States.

I recommend to all Postmasters that they shall aid this truly benevolent and patriotic enterprise.

A. W. RANDALL.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
H. DIEHL, Collector of Internal Revenue, has for the above Association, Diamond Goods, Pearls, Emeralds, Rubies, and other precious Stones, as described in the list, and find them all genuine.

Permission is hereby granted to the said Supervisors to hold such Gift Festival, exempt from all charge, whether from special tax or other duty in respect to said Gift Festival. E. A. ROLLINS Commissioner.

Having during the three years to come to aid our soldiers, and having passed a bill for that purpose in the New York Legislature incorporating some one hundred of our best citizens as directors—but under which bill no action has been had, from that time to the present, through great and crying necessity of the case, the shame of leaving our disabled veteran to starve or beg, I hereby most cordially endorse your enterprise, and shall have all of my friends call at your rooms.

Very truly yours, CHAS. G. HALPINE.

Fully sympathizing with your great object, I tender you, gratuitously, the services of my Full Orchestra on the occasion of your Festival at Irving Hall. THEODORE THOMAS.

In order to promote public confidence in the highest degree, and for the furtherance of this great object, the Association desires to place the $500,000 Worth of Diamonds and Jewelry in the show-window of the large Fur and Hat Establishment of John N. Genin, No. 513 Broadway (under the St. Nicholas Hotel), N. Y. The world-renowned Yacht Henrietta has also been secured.

There will be 1,500,000 tickets issued at one dollar each, admitting the holders to the Fair and both of the

GRAND DRAWING OF VALUABLES:

One at IRVING HALL, New York, Saturday evening, February 8, 1868, and the other at HORTICULTURAL HALL, Philadelphia, Saturday evening, February 22, 1868, on which latter occasion a Committee of Ladies and Citizens will be selected to conduct the drawing in the distinguished position, before the audience at the PRESENTATION FAIR to commence on Monday, February 24th, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at Horticultural Hall.

$641,950 in Valuable Presents

will be distributed among the Ticket-Holders, in accordance with the Charter and the following

SCHEDULE OF AWARDS.

No. 4. 1 Present in United States Greenbacks, $100,000.

1.	1 Present in Greenbacks	50,000
2.	1 Present in Greenbacks	20,000
3.	1 Yacht, the Steamer "Henrietta"	20,000
4.	1 Diamond Necklace, 48 Brilliants	20,000
5.	1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings (all large diamonds)	25,000
6.	1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings (all large diamonds)	12,000
7.	1 Diamond Brooch and Ear-rings	8,000
8.	1 Diamond Necklace, 28 Brilliants, Star Setting	8,000
9.	1 Diamond Necklace, 29 Brilliants	7,000
10.	1 Diamond Cross, set in Silver (large diamonds)	7,000
11.	1 Diamond Solid, 18 Brilliants	6,000
12.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	5,000
13.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	5,000
14.	1 Diamond and Pearl Cameo Bracelet, Brooch, and Ear-rings	5,000
15.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	4,000
16.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000
17.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000
18.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000
19.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch and Ear-rings	4,000
20.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000
21.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000
22.	1 Diamond Single Stone Scarf Pin	4,000
23.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000
24.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	4,000
25.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	3,500
26.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,500
27.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,500
28.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	3,000
29.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000
30.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ear-rings	3,000
31.	1 Diamond Cross	3,000
32.	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	3,000
33.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	3,000
34.	1 Diamond Single Stone Studs	3,000
35.	1 Diamond Brooch (in Silver)	3,000
36.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000
37.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	3,000
38.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000
39.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	3,000
40.	1 Diamond and Emerald Brooch	3,000
41.	1 Diamond and Emerald Brooch	3,000
42.	1 Pearl Breast-Pin, Ear-Rings, and Head Ornament	3,000
43.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,500
44.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	2,500
45.	1 Diamond Cross	2,500
46.	1 Diamond and Emerald Ornament	2,500
47.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	2,000
48.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	2,000
49.	1 Diamond Cluster Stone Pin	2,000
50.	1 Single Stone Diamond Ring	1,500
51.	1 Diamond Cross	1,500
52.	1 Pair Diamond Cluster Ear-Rings	1,500
53.	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	1,500
54.	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	1,500
55.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
56.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
57.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,500
58.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	1,500
59.	1 Camel's Hair Shawl	1,500
60.	1 Cheap Emerald Ring	1,500
61.	1 Single Stone Ring	1,500
62.	1 Single Stone Pin	1,500
63.	1 Cluster Brooch	1,500
64.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	1,500
65.	1 Pair Diamond Single Stone Ear-Rings	1,500
66.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	1,000
67.	1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring	1,000
68.	1 Diamond Cluster Bracelet, Ear-Rings, and Pin	800
69.	1 Camel's Hair Shawl	800
70.	1 Diamond and Ruby Three Stone Ring	800
71.	1 Diamond and Emerald Cluster Ring	800
72.	1 Diamond Cluster Brooch	800
73.	1 Single Stone Diamond Ring	800
74.	1 Gent's Gold Watch and Heavy Chain	800
75.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring, Star-setting	750
76.	1 Diamond Garnet Cluster Ring	600
77.	1 Diamond Single Stone Pin	600
78.	1 Emerald Knot	600
79.	1 Diamond and Ruby Ear-Rings	600
80.	1 Diamond Ring	600
81.	1 Diamond and Emerald Pin	600
82.	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	600
83.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	600
84.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	600
85.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	600
86.	1 Diamond and Opal Ring	600
87.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	600
88.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	600
89.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	600
90.	1 Diamond Single Stone Stud	600
91.	1 Diamond Cluster Stone Pin	600
92.	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	600
93.	1 Gent's Diamond and Amethyst Ring	600
94.	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	600
95.	1 Cameo & Pearl Brooch and Ear-Rings	600
96.	1 Diamond Ring	600
97.	1 Diamond Single Stone Ring	600
98.	1 Diamond Cluster Ring	600
99.	1 Diamond Gold Watch	600
100.	1 Coral Cameo Brooch and Ear-Rings	600
101.	1 Pair Garnet Sleeve Buttons	600
102.	1 Gold and Garnet Scarf Pin	600
103.	1 Diamond Scarf Pin	600
104.	1 Emerald Scarf Pin	600
105–1104.	1000 Gold Watches, splendidly illustrated Presentation Work entitled the "Tribune Book," at $10 each	10,000
1105–5104.	4000 Presents, at $5 each, at $5	20,000
	Also 110,000 Cash Presents, at each	110,000
	Making an Aggregate of 115,104 Presents, valued at	$641,950

HOW TO OBTAIN TICKETS.

Orders may be sent to us in registered letters or post-office orders, in sums from $1 to $25 at our risk. Larger amounts should be sent in Drafts or by Express at the following Club Rates:

5	Tickets to one address	$ 4 00
10	" "	7 00
20	" "	12 00
50	" "	25 00
100	" "	45 00
500	" "	200 00
1000	" "	350 00

Address all orders and communications to

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM ASSOCIATION,
546 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, or
PHILADELPHIA OFFICE, 1108 CHESTNUT STREET.
PROVIDENCE, R. I., CORY BROS., AGENTS.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., Removed from 42 to 37 and 39 Nassau St., Opposite the P. O.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color so long as worn, and so well finished as to pass for gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the finest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results as to wear and time. For appearance and durability, and time they have been equaled by watches costing five times the price. They are also warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for service, to a gold one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, each one made as those of gold, from $2 to $4. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid on delivery of the goods. Customers must pay Express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

THE COMBINED ANNUALS OF PHRENOLOGY AND PHYSIOGNOMY, for 1868–69 and 1869. One volume, 208 pages, 200 illustrations containing: The Races of Man, with portraits: Cassandra and Cure for Nervousness and Suffering: Love, Bashfulness, Diffidence, and Timidity, and of Jealousy: Influence of Marriage on Morals: Effects of Marriage of Cousins: Portraits of Clergymen, Statesmen, Rowers, Indians, Negroes, &c., including Agassiz, Lincoln, Grant, Sherman, Brigham Young, Bright, Colfaxe, Carlyle, Rev. Dr. Peters, Martineau, Fredrika Thiers, Baskin, Kingsley, Disraeli, Victor Hugo, and many others. A CAPITAL HAND-BOOK, with "Signs of Character, and How to Read Them" Sent postpaid by mail for $1 25. Address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

Star and Comet
KEROSENE
BURNERS & LAMPS.
THE HANDIEST
AND BEST.
Sent C.O.D. on receipt of 25 cts take place where these Burners are Sold.
SEND FOR CIRCULAR.
$2 for sample dozen,
well packed.
F. R. DOMINICK,
393 Hudson St., New York City.

A WATCH FOR $1.—THE MAGNETIC TIME INDICATOR AND COMPASS, in a neat case, with a glass shade, clock movement, and reliable silver watch, enameled dial, ordinary watch size, sound and serviceable. Warranted to keep correct time. Sent by mail to order for two years. Where satisfaction is not given, the money will be refunded. Sent postpaid for $1; 3 for $5, by HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

THE CHRISTIAN, 60 CENTS.

A large, live, 8-page Monthly Religious and Family paper, containing facts, incidents, tales, sketches, music, poetry, true stories, pictures, reading for young, old, saints, sinners, ministers, and the congregation; controversy, politics, puffs, pills, or patent medicines. 60 cts. a year; 10 copies $5. Sunday Schools, 13 copies $4. Send 10 cts. for 3 specimens before you forget it. Address, No. 106 Nassau St., New York. Sample Tracts for $1. Address, H. L. HASTINGS, Agent, New York, 19 Lindell Block, St. Louis, Mo.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent free. Address KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

GREATEST WONDER and Miracle of the age. 25 cents a Package. $2 per dozen packages. W. C. WEMYSS, 675 Broadway, New York.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cts.; 100 Female Beauties for 25 cts.; 100 Actors for 25 cts. Address C. SEYMOUR, Suffield, N. Y.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for flavor and delicacy of Aroma, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., best $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (bl., gr., mix.), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 10 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 80c., $1 10, best $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1, 25, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families using large quantities of Coffee, can economize in this article by using our Steam Roasted and Ground Coffees. Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 20c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense and the money will be cheerfully refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, and forward the order, with the money or its equivalent, to us. We will then make out a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and label the name of each person upon them, with the club, and forward them in a single distribution. Each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may be most convenient for the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $50, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter the Company will make a specialty of supplying large parties getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $20.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or irresponsible. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

(Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

AMATEUR CULTIVATOR'S GUIDE
TO THE
Kitchen and Flower Garden.
NOW READY.

A DESCRIPTIVE WORK of 146 pages, fully illustrated with a beautiful colored plate and 100 engravings, containing a list of over 1200 varieties of Flower and Vegetable Seeds; also, the varieties of the choicest Peach & Apple Orchards. All the novelties, both of the Flower and Vegetable, for 1868, will be found described in the above work.

The following testimonials are unsolicited by us, and can be multiplied by hundreds:

From Mr. John Masters, Wankegan, Ill.—"Your review came safe, and I assure you that it is the best I ever saw."

From Mrs. R. Fitzgerald, East Sanbornton, Belknap Co., N. H.—"It is with great satisfaction and pleasure I have used your AMATEUR'S GUIDE. I have referred it highly. Its pages are full of valuable information, reliable, plain, and practical, and extremely covered—just what every new beginner wants."

From T. Hill, Oakland Centre, Iowa Co., Wis., March 9, 1867.—"It is without exception the best arranged, most reliable, instructive work I have seen, for amateurs especially."

From Rev. D. W. Miller, Winchester, Randolph Co., Ind.—"I have received your Guide for the Flower and Kitchen Garden, for which you have my sincere thanks. It is very valuable for all who wish to cultivate flowers and vegetables. I shall recommend it as needless it must recommend itself to any one."

From Mr. H. Stanley, Greenville, Ill., March 17, 1867.—"Thanks to you AMATEUR'S GUIDE. It is invaluable, plain, and instructive."

Tastefully bound in cloth, three colored plates, price, postpaid, 30 cents; in paper covers, postpaid, 25 cts. Address, WASHBURN & CO., Horticultural Hall, Boston, Mass.

A Manual of Instruction in the art of

WOOD ENGRAVING

With a description of the necessary tools and appurtenances, and directions for their use. With illustrations. Just issued from the press of JOHN WILEY, and for sale by publisher, JOSEPH WATSON, 95 Water Street, Boston.

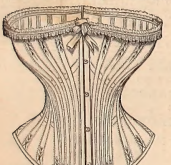
HOVEY & CO.'S Illustrated Guide to the Flower and Vegetable Garden, for 1868, is now ready—containing 140 pages of small type; illustrated with a new and beautiful colored plate of their popular and showy Flowers and novelties, with full descriptions of over 1,000 varieties of Flower and Vegetable Seeds, accompanied with complete practical directions for their culture. Sent to customers with the colored plate. Mailed free to all applicants on the receipt of 25 cents. A. HOVEY & CO., 53 North Market Street, Boston.

AGENTS, M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich., will keep you full employment and expenses, to sell their new and valuable inventions. Particulars sent free.

ESSAYS FOR YOUNG MEN on Errors and Abuses that lead to Impotency, Nervous Debility, with the Humane View of Treatment and Cure. Sent by mail, free of charge. Address, HOWARD ASSOCIATION, Box P, Philadelphia, Pa.

GOLDEN HILL SEMINARY for YOUNG LADIES, Bridgeport, Conn. Address, MISS EMILY NORTON.

THE BABY THAT WON'T TALK AT PRESENT.



NURSE W——E. "Bless your souls, ladies, the child won't talk for several months yet."
DAME A. J. "Say 'My Policy'! that's a little dear."
MOTHER W. H. S——n. "Yes, Baby: say 'My——my——My Policy!' that's a nice little darling."
LADY BEN W——n. "Now, my Precious, put down that little horse one minute, and say 'Con-gress.'"
GRANNY HENRY W——n. "Yes, my Pet, say 'Re-co-stru-ction.'"
MADAME A. T. S——r. "Here's a penny for Baby: say 'Greenbacks,' darling——'Green-backs!'"

A Horse Doctor Free.

SICK AND INJURED ANIMALS CURED GRATIS.

WILKES' SPIRIT OF THE TIMES, the great Family, Sporting, and Literary Weekly Paper of the United States, employs a distinguished Veterinarian Professor, who gives advice and prescriptions, through its columns, free, to all inquiries concerning Sick or Injured Horses or Cattle sent to the paper by mail. The cures of hundreds of valuable animals attest the importance of this department of the Spirit. Replies are made promptly to all inquiries, whether from subscribers or not. No horse-owner or Veterinary student should be without the Spirit. Single copies to be had of the news-stands. Subscription $5 a year. Address, EDITOR "WILKES' SPIRIT," New York.

THOMSON'S PATENT "GLOVE-FITTING" CORSET

EXCELS ALL OTHERS

IN DURABILITY, ELEGANCE OF SHAPE, AND COMFORT TO THE WEARER.

At Retail by LORD & TAYLOR, and all first-class dealers. At Wholesale by THOMSON, LANGDON & CO., 391 Broadway, New York.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

Fifty per cent. or more saved on Dry Goods of every description. Send for package $1. Send for descriptive circular. SYMONDS & CO., 129 Chambers St., N. Y.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.

TURNER'S TIC DOULOUREUX OR Universal Neuralgia PILL.

Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cents. Six packages $5.00, postage 25 cts. Twelve do., $9.00, postage 45 cts. Sold by all druggists.

TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

GOLD PENS.

Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular containing exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Reference at 56 cents each by mail. Manufactory 15 Maiden Lane. C. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

Our Entire Stock

IS NOW OFFERED AT

REDUCED PRICES,

In view of our REMOVAL up town in the Spring.

WHITE CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 145 pieces, $25.

PLAYED WARE FROM ROGERS, SMITH & CO.

GOLD-EDGE TEA SETS, 44 pieces, $11.

DECORATED TEA SETS, $18.

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 479 Broadway, 4 doors below Broome Street.

FARMERS WHO WANT TO BE RICH should save every penny they can. Enough can be saved in one year to buy a cow by making your own soap. It will only cost two cents a pound, and is very easily made. Use GEO. F. GANTZ & CO.'S WHITE ROCK POTASH.

Full Directions with every Can.

Office, 62 Pine Street, New York.

Press your storekeeper to get it for you.

£150,000,000,

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1866. Fee to search for any name, $2. Gen & Co., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL

IN AID OF THE

Gettysburg Asylum

FOR

Invalid Soldiers,

TO BE HELD AT

IRVING HALL, NEW YORK,

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8.

THEODORE THOMAS, ESQ., MUSICAL DIRECTOR.

ASSISTED BY THE

Distinguished Vocalist MISS MARIA S. BRAINERD and the Full Orchestra, with Soloists.

Mr. G. MATZKA will preside at the Piano.

TICKETS, ONE DOLLAR EACH.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1. Opening March (Greeting).....MICHAELIS
2. Overture (The Daughter of the Regiment).....DONIZETTI
3. Song (Will he Come?).....SULLIVAN
   MISS BRAINERD.
4. Waltz (Vienna Bonbons).....STRAUSS
5. Patriotic Song (The Standard Bearer).....LINDPAINTNER
   Solos—Cornet and Trombone—Messrs. DIETZ and LETSCH.
6. Grand National Medley.....C. KOPPITZ

PART II.

7. Overture (William Tell).....ROSSINI
8. (Polka Mazourka (Arm in Arm).....STRAUSS (Polka (Empire City).....
9. Valse Brillante (L'Estasi).....ARDITI
   MISS BRAINERD.
10. Romance from L'Eclair.....HALEVY
    Solos—French Horn and Flute—Messrs. SCHMITZ and RITTZEL.
11. Grand Selection (Il Trovatore).....VERDI

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Tickets are only to be shown at the door, and can be retained by the purchaser until after the distribution of Awards. (See Descriptive Circular.)

Tickets can be obtained at the Music, Drug, Book, and Fancy Stores generally, and at the offices of the

Gettysburg Asylum Association,
546 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
217 GRAND STREET, BROOKLYN, E. D.
PHILADELPHIA OFFICE, 1126 CHESTNUT STREET.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York,

Importer and Manufacturer of

Fashionable Furnishing Goods, Hosiery, Gloves, and Under Wear, For Ladies.

☞ Orders by mail will receive prompt attention.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Grand, Square, & Upright Piano-Fortes,

were awarded at the Paris Exposition the First Grand Prize, the Legion of Honor and a Grand Gold Medal, making 63 first premiums during the past 44 years.

WAREROOMS, No. 652 BROADWAY.

PATENT OFFICES.

Inventors who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for over Twenty Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. Pamphlet containing full instructions to inventors, is sent gratis.

☞ A handsome Bound Volume, containing 150 Mechanical Engravings, and the United States Census by Counties, with Hints and Receipts for Mechanics, mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum goods, 27 John St., NEW NASSAU, and 697 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 3840.

NOTICE.

TO

"ALL MEN WHO USE PLANE IRONS."

We hereby authorize all "HARDWARE DEALERS" to allow their customers to try our "CLOVER-LEAF PLANE IRONS," and, if not PERFECTLY SUITED, take them back, refund price paid, and charge iron over to us.

WE WANT MECHANICS AND DEALERS TO SEND NO RISK IN BUYING OUR PLANE IRONS.

See that our TRADE MARK

Is on each Iron.

REYNOLDS, BARBER & CO., STEEL TEMPERING WORKS, AUBURN, N. Y.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.

New Designs, $1 50 postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, ARCHITECT, 191 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. (Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 20 cts.—by mail 69 cts. All Druggists sell it. WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

F. Upham's Fresh Meat Cure for Consumption and Bronchial Affections, is prescribed and recommended by Physicians all over the country, and is performing more cures than all other remedies combined. A trial will convince the most skeptical. $1 a bottle; six for $5. Sent by Express. Circulars free. Sold by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth St., Philada., and all Druggists.

LOOK! LOOK! LOOK!

NO MORE TO BE BOTHERED BY CARPET-TACKS WITH A STRAP.

MILLER & WATSON'S PATENT BOOK CLAMP

Saves Time, Money & Trouble. Recommended by all School Teachers. Sent to any P. O. Address in the United States on receipt of 50 cts. Miller & Watson, SOLE MANUFACTURERS, 211 Centre St., N. Y. City.

IF YOU ARE TROUBLED with a Cough, Weakness of the Lungs, Sore Throat, Pain in the Side, or Kidney Complaints, White Pine Compound will help you, and, as a general thing, effect a permanent cure.

(PATENTED OCTOBER 1, 1867.)

$4 Each. Reid's Patent Bread Pan. $4 Each. and Biscuit Baker.

On receipt of Price, BULL & CO., Stove Manufacturers, Buffalo, N.Y., will send a Baker. All sizes use them precisely the same. Saves fuel and time. No delays. It rests directly over the fire, like a pot. The shelf is adjustable to any degree of heat. Heats rapidly. Does as well with a low fire as a hot. Heating a family for even dinner saves wood. The fire is always ready. In the morning it bakes as soon as you can build a kettle of water. Bakes quickly, therefore better. Housewives and others will appreciate all this. Agents wanted every where. Send for Illustrated Circular.

J. C. HULL'S SON, New York.

BAY RUM SOAP

Over 100 Styles Toilet Soaps, NONE BETTER IMPORTED.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS.

And others should send to all parts of the United tates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

PRINCE & COS AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.

Forty thou sand are now in use

BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 582.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

DEAD-LETTER OFFICE.

OUT of the 462,279,719 letters which annually pass through the United States mails, 4,306,568 are misdirected or unpaid and go to the Dead-Letter Office at Washington. Our own correspondence—by no means light, since we have had very frequently to open over a thousand letters a day—has taught us that there are a great many careless people who consign not only their effusions but their money to the mails with the most reckless negligence; what must be then the experience of the venerable clerks of the Dead-Letter Office who examine the misdirected ones of a daily correspondence of over one million letters? It is hardly credible that frequently letters reach the Department at Washington which have the name of the town as well as that of the State omitted from the direction; or that often there is no other address than that of the town and State, the name of the person being omitted as totally unimportant. And occasionally letters thus carelessly directed contain money or other valuables.

But if the misdirections of dead-letter offices are curious often their contents are far more singular. A great many persons have a singular idea of the nature of mailable matter; and in the Museum of the Department at Washington may be found articles of every character resurrected from the dead-letters. While our artist was making the sketch on this page a worn-out gaiter boot, size 2½, was disemboweled from a defunct package and consigned to the waste bundle. Hoop-skirts, night-gowns, embroidered slippers, as well as lace collars and such light wearing apparel, are supposed by some deluded females to be mailable matter; while oil-paintings, jewelry, and sometimes even glass ware pass by Uncle Sam's express rather than those of Adams's.

Our sketch of this interesting bureau of the Postal Department at Washington illustrates the process of disposing of the dead-letters. The work of opening the letters and arranging them in bundles is done by male clerks, some of whom have been for many years engaged in the Department. One of the old gentlemen shown in the sketch is a brother of a former Postmaster-General. When the letters have been opened, they are tied up in bundles and passed to female clerks, who occupy a balcony which extends around the apartment. Those letters which contain money or valuables are passed directly to the chief clerks or "heads of divisions," and by them registered and carefully noted and examined. It is the duty of the female clerks to investigate the bundles of opened letters and discover all information that may be contained which will facilitate the return at the dead-letter to the sender.

THE DEAD-LETTER OFFICE AT WASHINGTON.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

The latest statistics of the Dead-Letter Office show that of the 4,306,508 letters consigned thereto during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, 3,136,738 were domestic, and 179,460 foreign. Nearly half a million were held for non-payment of postage. These statistics show that the number dead-letters diminished nearly one million during the last year, and this gratifying result is attributed to the use of envelopes with a request for the return to the writer of unclaimed letters directly from the post-office addressed. It is estimated that fully fifty millions of these envelopes were used during that year, the Department supplying about one-third of the number.

There is very little of this great amount of paper wasted. Such letters as can not be returned to their owners are sold by contract, and, by a patented process, reduced to a pulp in the presence of a post-office oil inn; from the ink is extracted, and the pulp worked over again.

So profitable has this prov- that the other departments at Washington are saving their waste paper, and the Treasury Department has lately made a proposal to supply the Postal Department with envelopes made from defaced fractional currency.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1868.

NEW YORK POLITICS.

THE Republican Convention of New York has declared its preference for General GRANT as a candidate for the Presidency, and for GOVERNOR FENTON as Vice-President. The Convention appointed the delegates to Chicago, and adopted a series of simple and decided resolutions, which express the utmost confidence in GRANT and FENTON, the heartiest sympathy with Congress, and the most contingent desire of an economical administration of the Government. The Convention was large, enthusiastic, and unanimous. The temporary Chairman, the Hon. M. Y. A. COTT, opened the session with a very admirable and eloquent statement of the principle and position of the party, and the difference in the city, which appears in every Convention, had a full hearing, and was determined as usual.

Upon this point we have only to repeat what we said a week ago in the last Convention. The Republican party does not wish to exclude any honest votes. It welcomes all who accept its principles and approve its policy. Its candidates have but one wish to respect old differences when they are once settled; and with its National delegation, headed by the names of General SICKLES and LYMAN TREMAIN, it will hardly be accused of a reluctance to honor those who have not always acted with it. But if General SICKLES and Mr. TREMAIN had been Republicans, and had ever actively engaged in a movement the inevitable result of which would have been the overthrow of the party, and had openly supported the Democratic candidates and policy, with what face could those gentlemen or their friends have insisted upon the party honors this year?

Yet this is precisely the position of the gentlemen who every year go to the Convention from the city and demand what they call recognition. That is recognition if any of them supported Mr. HOFFMAN for Governor. Their peculiar organs constantly decide the policy which the Republican party adopts. It is very difficult to see why they are not practically Democrats in every thing but the name, and yet they perpetually demand "recognition." Recognition of what? As representatives of the Republican party, as interpreters of the Republican policy, as candidates for Republican honors? Such a claim is palpably unfair, if they wish recognition as Republicans merely if they have it if they sincerely support the party. If they wish something more—if they aim at party honors, they ought certainly to see that the surest way to them is not the provocation of dissensions: it is a quiet blending with the mass of the party, and the rest will follow.

But what is the real practical argument that the Republican vote diminishes in the city, what do they mean? Is the vote smaller because they themselves vote against the party? And is that a cogent reason for giving them a "recognition" which consists in conspicuous position or leadership? Is it not the simple truth that those gentlemen diverged from the party, and it is not equally true that nothing prevents their return to it? When Mr. SPENCER or Mr. GREELEY speak of the party as doing better without them they mean merely, we presume, that an open enemy is better than a false friend. But why should there be any false friendship in the matter? Why do not the contestants vote and act with the party?

They will not, of course, claim that they have been the only faithful Republicans, and that the rest were in error. For they will recall what Mr. WEED has himself confessed, and they must concede that Mr. WEED's difference with the great party with which he was so long associated sprung from the adoption by that party of a policy which he did not favor. Mr. WEED would hardly insist that he had been a consistent Republican, in the ordinary use of the words; and if he would not make the claim, surely none of the gentlemen who now act with him can properly urge it. Their duty as sincere Republicans, by which we now merely mean voters who prefer, from whatever reason, to support the Republican party—is to acknowledge a present organization, and when they have done so, if they are dissatisfied with it, to endeavor to change that organization within the line of the party. Every man of the constituency of the city knows that more in a single day to obliterate all difference by quietly uniting with the party, than they can ever do by obstinate persistence in a quarrel with which the party in the State has no sympathy.

The New York Republicans have done their duties. Their voice is clear and firm. But the great result of the campaign, to which every generous American who believes that the welfare of the country imperatively demands the ascendency of the Republican party, looks hopefully forward, is to be attained only by the most diligent and intelligent and conscientious labor. It will be a time of reunion and pacification with the surviving traditions of the political demoralization wrought by slavery upon the public mind.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE GENERAL.

THERE can no longer be a doubt of General GRANT's opinions upon the political situation. He has spoken as he should have spoken, not in obedience to party views, or to satisfy the exigency of a Presidential canvass, but in the course of his official duty, and in reply to a verbal order of the President of the United States to disregard it. Of the scope and manner of the General's reply every body in the country is now aware. He says in the most positive tone that his intention is and has been to obey the law—an intention which, when asserted by General HANCOCK, threw the President into ecstasies of delight—and he adds that he thinks it his duty to resist any effort that has lately issued from the White House, through certain newspapers, in an attempt to involve him in the resistance of the law which the President hesitated to assume the responsibility.

In a question of veracity between the President and the General-in-Chief of the Military Forces, we presume, would long hesitate which to believe. It is certainly a painful duty for any citizen to be compelled to say that he does not believe the President to have told the truth; and to obviate that necessity General GRANT generously states, at the close of his letter of January 25, that the President may have been misunderstood him. But that is hardly possible. The President's intention to use General GRANT to the General's political ruin has been evident from the day that Mr. STANTON left the War Department. He counted undoubtedly upon the involuntary flexibility of a soldier who had given a long period of his life to the service of a trained politician. GRANT was too popular. He commanded the confidence of thoughtful men, as well as the admiration of the multitude. The President plainly saw that he was an irresistible candidate for the Presidency, unless his fame were in some manner tarnished, or his unquestioned popularity shaken. And as this not yet the fully accepted favorite of the most radical Republicans, and it would be an ingenious and effective movement to entangle him in a net of false appearances.

For this purpose he was made to displace Mr. STANTON, the Republican representative in the Cabinet. For a moment the scheme seemed to succeed. Those Republicans who were opposed to the nomination of General GRANT made the most of the occasion, and spoke of his action with a regret which betrayed their personal satisfaction. Gradually the truth began to appear. The General quietly discharged his duties, and refused upon his best possible terms with Mr. STANTON. Those who truly comprehended the position of affairs felt that he had succeeded Mr. STANTON as the representative of the anti-slavery sentiment. For a moment they were content. The feeling for him in the country deepened. Without writing letters or making speeches, he became more and more the accepted candidate of the liberal party under the changed circumstances of the time. The meeting in New York, proceeding from a great interest which is not political, remained and remains unmistakably—whenever a proper occasion arose, was as puzzling to his enemies as it was satisfactory to his friends. The impeachment failed. Generals ORD and PORE were removed. Congress debated, and as the necessity of action in the case of Mr. STANTON approached, the President resolved to turn it to his own advantage.

Nobody should be surer of his weapons and of his adversary than a political fencer. The President made another thrust—and has thrown himself instead of touching his opponent. There is something comical in his discomfiture, if it did not involve some very grave considerations. Knowing that Mr. STANTON would be reinstated, and desiring to thwart the course of law, the President tried to engage General GRANT as an accomplice. He failed ignominiously, and in revenge declared that the General had promised to help him break the law. The General, of course, denies it, but says that the President may have thought otherwise. To say that the President must have thought otherwise, or he would have removed the General, is folly. The President is not of opinion that would have the true reasons of such an act. He hoped to place General GRANT in the attitude of passively opposing Congress by awaiting an order of the Supreme Court which would have failed.

The correspondence will not materially affect the opinion which honorable men hold of the President, but it shows that General GRANT is no fulfilled tool, and, as sagacious as he is brave. The most skeptical Republican now sees what many have always known, that the General's devotion to the principle upon which alone the country can be restored to permanent peace is sure and profound. We all talk so much in this country that we can hardly believe a man to be resolute and right unless he occasionally vociferates the fact of his fidelity. But there is something in the total want of exaggeration both in General GRANT's character and conduct, a charm of blended modesty, sagacity, and simplicity, so unusual among our public men, that, as with LINCOLN, its contemplation tends to high public benefit. He is the only prominent candidate for any office who knows not Buncombe.

From this time forward he must, of course, endure a fierce storm of the foulest slander. The very doubt which his silence inspired in the minds of some reactionary managers, that he would be a convenient candidate of negro hate and repudiation, will touch their darts with a more acrid venom. But the man who advanced from tranquil obscurity to be the great soldier who victoriously fought the battle, and whose moderation and subordination to law are as admirable as his warlike genius, will know how to preserve his own and the public peace the enthusiastic confidence of his friends amidst the furious falsehoods of party malignity.

RECONSTRUCTION.

THE POWERS OF CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT OVER STATES.

THE question, what are the relative powers of Congress and the President in adjusting the relations growing out of civil war, and the exercise of their respective powers, increases in interest as each new and important event arises in our progress toward the consummation of peace. The minds of some are embarrassed by the constitutional arguments of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, that Congress is acting outside of its just constitutional limits; and some confusion is produced by the conflicting opinions of the ablest lawyers and statesmen who have written on the subject. Chancellor KENT, 'n the first volume of his Commentaries, page 163, affirms that in the Constitution of the United States the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may make peace; but it is reserved to Congress to declare war. The former position is supported articles under the signature of "Helvidius," takes the same ground, basing it wholly upon the treaty-making power, which in the words: "[In the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." There is no other grant upon this opinion. It is clear, therefore, that the deduction as to where the authority to make peace is to be exercised, as applied to a civil war; as no party on the other side capable of making a treaty is admitted to exist. In case of a foreign war with an acknowledged party, closing with a treaty of peace, and declosing it by treaty, and such treaty when made would undoubtedly govern. If when the utterances of Mr. JAMES MADISON Monroe between agents of the so-called Confederate Government and President LINCOLN an understanding had been reached, the matters in difference between the parties were arranged by treaty, agreed to in the first instance by the President and Mr. DAVIS; but as the interview was fruitless, it can not be affirmed with certainty what course would have been taken in the opposite contingency. It might have been in the contemplation of President LINCOLN to submit the matter, in case of such understanding, to Congress for its decision; for this would have been the true course. The President alone has no power to terminate war by the ends of war; on the contrary, the power (except in the case of a foreign war ended by treaty) is lodged solely with Congress. VATTEL, in his LAW of Nations, page 432, says: "The same power who has the power of making war, of determining on it, of declaring it, and of directing its operations, has naturally that likewise of making and concluding the treaty of peace. These two powers are connected together, and the latter naturally follows the former. If the ruler of the state is empowered to judge of the causes and reasons for which the war is to be undertaken, of the time and circumstances proper for undertaking it, of the manner in which it is to be supported and carried on, it is therefore his province to set bounds to its progress, to point out the time when it shall be discontinued, and to conclude a peace." BLACKSTONE, at 258 of his Commentaries, 1st volume, confirms this view, as follows: "And wherever the right resides of beginning a national war, there must also reside the right of ending it, or the power of making peace." The Supreme Court of the United States, in 3d DALLAS, page 54, referring to the Articles of Confederation (in which, however, the right to make peace is conferred in express terms), say: "In Congress were vested.....the rights and powers of war and peace.....there must be a supreme power or will—the rights of war and peace are component parts of this supremacy." The only authority conferred on the President besides that relating to treaties, which has the least bearing on this subject, are the clauses which vest in him "the executive power;" which provide that "he shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy," and of the militia while in service, and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." These, it will be seen, are executive powers, while the power to declare war is made wholly legislative, as will appear from an examination of the clauses which bear upon it. It is "the United States" (Constitution, §4, art. 4), not the Executive, "which shall protect each of them" (the States) "against invasion; and.....against domestic violence." The necessary powers for these purposes and for declaring war were expressly conferred on Congress among the enumerated powers. "The Congress shall have power" (says the Constitution) "to declare war,".....to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;" and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

It is very clear, therefore, that the only control, if it amount to control, of the authority of Congress on the subject of war and peace, is contained in the clause authorizing the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. The President can do nothing without the advice and consent of the Senate, nor can the two jointly do any thing which the experience and science of the law of acknowledged authority, competent to make, and who has assented to, a treaty with our Government, in a war, such as that now raged within the limits of the United States, the power of Congress is wholly unfettered as respects its termination as well as its commencement. The power of Congress with respect to civil war is unpent until peace is accomplished to its satisfaction. No interference of the Executive, except in the single case of treaty, if that were possible, can affect it. The terms on which the capitulation of General LEE were accepted do not impair this power, the extent of which was recognized by the commander that called it into being, which put at stake the life, liberty, and property of every citizen and the very existence of the nation. Until Congress decides that these great interests are placed on a basis of security the powers which war called into existence, and which supplant those of peace, remain in force. The laws and collected forces which are arrayed for our destruction must be met by an equivalent or greater force; and a the power to assault is unlimited, that for defence must be equally unlimited. The framers of our Constitution could not, and did not, therefore, set any limits upon the discretion of Congress in declaring, conducting, or terminating a civil war, but made its powers commensurate with the emergency.

The question has arisen in adjusting the terms of peace, for this the country is now engaged in—whether it is competent for Congress to bestow powers on an officer created by its own authority without direct responsibility to the Executive. The Constitution, in the clause § 2, ART. II., conferring on the President the power to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, certain officers, provides expressly that "the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the Heads of Departments."

In the case of Kendall against the United States, reported in 12th Peters, 625, Chief-Justice TANEY observes: "The office of Postmaster-General was not created by the Constitution, nor are its powers or duties defined by that instrument. The office was created by act of Congress, and whenever Congress creates such an office as that of Postmaster-General by law, it may unquestionably by law limit its powers, and regulate its proceedings, and may subject it to any supervision or control, executive or judicial, which the wisdom of the Legislature may deem right."

Judge THOMPSON, in delivering the opinion of the Court in that case, says (page 612): "It was urged at the bar that the Postmaster-General was alone subject to the direction and control of the President with respect to the execution of the duty imposed on him by this law; and this right of the President is claimed as growing out of the obligation imposed upon him by the Constitution to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. This is a doctrine that can not receive the sanction of this Court. It would be vesting in the President a dispensing power which has no countenance for its support in any part of the Constitution, and is asserting a principle which, if carried out in its results to all cases falling within it, would be placing the President with a power entirely to control the legislation of Congress and paralyze the administration of justice."

As the case arose during the Presidency of General JACKSON, and was argued in behalf of AMOS KENDALL, Postmaster-General, by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL of the United States, Mr. BUTLER, and by Mr. KEY, it must be supposed that all the points which ingenuity and ability could raise were presented to the Court, and that the decision against the supremacy of General JACKSON was made with all the caution and solemnity which marked the course of the Supreme Court in important Constitutional questions.

OUR MINISTER IN ENGLAND.

If Mr. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS has really resigned his mission Mr. WILLIAM H. SEWARD now will probably be glad, but the country, which values great ability and the most efficient services as a very critical time, will be extremely sorry. Mr. ADAMS was one of the first appointments of President LINCOLN, and arrived at his post just after the famous recognition of the rebel States as a belligerent power, which is now the subject of very serious and even critical discussion. He was heralded chiefly by his name, for he had not been conspicuous in public life except as the Buffalo Free-soil candidate for the Vice-Presidency in 1848, and as a Representative in Congress during the stormy session of 1860, '61. We have before us a copy of the speech which he made in the House after the movement of secession had begun. It was very grave, as conciliatory as a truly sagacious lover of Union and liberty must be, and was solemnized by the profound impression of the inevitable conflict. In May, 1861, he went to London as United States Minister.

A man of ample fortune, of secluded habits, and reserved temperament, Mr. ADAMS was an accomplished political student, and his preparation of the Life and Works of his grandfather, JOHN ADAMS, had made him very familiar with our own history. He was one of the earliest of the political anti-slavery men, and had taken an earnest part in the great debates which ended in the war. When he went to England, therefore, he was an admirable representative of the views which he had just succeeded in the election of the Government. He was in accord with the dominant feeling and conviction of the country, and by training and temperament was curiously fitted for his post. His masterly performance of his duties is an important part of the history of the war; and his correspondence with EARL RUSSELL upon all the different questions that demanded consideration is one of the finest and most honorable chapters of our diplomacy. He has been seven years Minister, and his career has nobly maintained the high traditions of his name.

Within a few months he has been violently assailed by the Fenian champions as negligent of the rights of the fellow-citizens imprisoned in England upon lawful business; and Mr. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON, a Democratic Representative from Brooklyn, a gentleman of Irish birth and a Fenian, has lately indulged a great deal of loose rhetoric at Mr. ADAMS. For ourselves, with due respect for the prudence and wisdom of Mr. ROBINSON, we do not believe that any outrage upon any American citizen was ever brought to the notice of Mr. ADAMS and disregarded by him. It is his misfortune, of course, that our Government has no determined policy upon the question of the alienation of allegiance; but we wait for the evidence that the rights of any peaceful American citizen have been violated by Great Britain within the knowledge of Mr. ADAMS and without action upon his part. Irishmen hot from the head-quarters of the Irish Republic of the World, hailing from Dublin or Ireland and arrested under suspicious circumstances of conspiracy, are not presumptively American citizens. When they demand Mr. ADAMS's protection as such it is his duty promptly to ascertain the truth, and he is not the man to omit any duty.

We do not know that his reported resignation springs from any complaint of dereliction of duty —nor from the stories of any new M'CRACKEN. But we do know that if it be true we lose a man from the public service who is peculiarly fitted for its responsibilities. Nor do we know what are his views of the present situation at home. The course of his son, Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, has been asserted to be not without the sympathy and approval of the father. But we judge Mr. ADAMS by his public words and acts, and they are thus far such as every honorable American must approve.

As we write, his successor is not announced. Of the three gentlemen named for the position —Mr. SEWARD, Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, and Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR—we very much prefer Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. SEWARD's appointment would be peculiarly unfortunate, if for no other reason than the unfriendly feeling toward him in England. It would be painful to every generous American and every liberal English mind that the reaction of slavery and of our most disgraceful epoch should be represented in England by Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR as our Minister. Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, if not a Republican, was true to the country in its peril, and was therefore contemptuously rejected as Senator by the Democratic party in his State. He is by no means a representative of the best American spirit and conviction; but we shall surely have no right to complain if a President who removed Mr. BOOTH upon the word of M'CRACKEN should nominate Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON as Minister to England. But whoever goes upon FRANCIS GRANGER's nomination will not tarry very long; for the regenerated public sentiment which sent Mr. ADAMS will after the 4th of March, 1869, name his successor.

FROM VIRGINIA.

A letter from a Virginian who deplores the folly which refuses to accept the terms of reconstruction offered by Congress, says that a large part of the population of the State desire that the domination of the old Democratic leaders, and that the La Crosse Democrat and similar Northern papers are loudly to express the controlling sentiment of this part of the country. The Convention now sitting in Richmond is regarded as a body which means to subject the State to negro supremacy, and although the white voters are a majority of all, and as a class have certainly a superior education with it, the advantages of influence, they prefer to sulk and to let the State stagnate. Of course we cannot argue to the Government, not remembering that what would be permitted to the reverse majority in United States would also exert a disastrous influence on our own minds, but we may fairly express our contempt for the negroes—that would have a tendency to place them on an equality with ourselves. Our prejudices make us proud to call them inferiors.

This is a condition of feeling, as we have often said, which ought to surprise no one. The theory that the South was not in any proper sense of arms, in which having conquered we have only to show gracefully to the defeated knight and invite him to dinner that all may be serene, is the very opposite of the chief element of statesmanship is common-sense; and no one but a visionary or hopeless doctrinaire would seriously insist upon such a sound and permanent reconstruction could be effected by inviting the late rebels to resume control of the various States that attempted secession. Whatever may be the right or the wrong of that way, and if the country, tired of trying other methods, should at last try that, the consequences would be inevitably disastrous.

THE OHIO "MARTYR."

The New York World, in a severe article upon Vallandigham, which the Democratic newspaper can do to read him out of the Democratic party. Why it should now suddenly turn upon the eminent "Martyr" and roundly denounce him will not be very easily understood by one who is not tolerably familiar with current politics. The illustrious "Martyr" has certainly not changed his views; but he has written an article prophesying a heavy Democratic defeat in Ohio, and it is but natural to suppose that he will do what he can to prove himself a true prophet. This is the occasion of the virulent attack of the World, which is of the opinion that VALLANDIGHAM has done all the service which the Democratic party can reasonably claim, and that he may, therefore, now be contemptuously kicked aside.

Now it does not need the very remarkable memory to recall that in the year 1863 VALLANDIGHAM was the regular Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio. He was not then residing in the State, having expelled the country for aid given to the national enemy. The Democratic party made as usual a very loud canvass. Mr. S. S. COX, who is now urged as Minister to Austria, stumped the State for VALLANDIGHAM, and made some remarks about the triumphant return of the illustrious exile from banishment. The "Martyr," however, was defeated by a hundred thousand majority, and was not much heard of until the Democratic National Convention in 1864, in which he was an accredited delegate, and framed the second resolution of the celebrated platform, which, as he stated in a letter on the 22d of October, 1864, received fifteen out of eighteen votes in the Platform Committee; and in his speech at Dayton, upon his return from Chicago, he said of the Convention "it meant peace, and it said so." The World says that VALLANDIGHAM and Mr. PENDLETON "both held pronounced views on the conduct of the war." The truth is, that they both bitterly denounced the war in which we conduct; they were both secessionists, and one of them was the regular Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio in 1863, and the other was the regular Democratic candidate for Vice-President in 1864.

Why is VALLANDIGHAM now contemptuously cashiered, while Mr. PENDLETON is at this moment the most promising, and certainly the most logical, Democratic candidate for the Presidency? That he tried to defeat National Union, a political rival, and now foretells the doom of the Democratic party in Ohio, may be convenient pretexts for denouncing him with loathing; but the real reason is, that VALLANDIGHAM is a living monument of the party position of his associates during the war, and that is a memory which the party managers would most gladly obliterate if they could. We say the party position, not, certainly, the position of all Democrats. Nor is the coming election to be determined by any arrangement drawn from the war. But when the reaction reveals its candidate, whether he be repudiated or not, the country thoroughly aroused, and mindful of its late history, will see in his supporters the party which, when GRANT was taking Richmond and SHERMAN was marching to the sea, cried Amen when VALLANDIGHAM in its name declared the war a failure.

OUR CITY SCHOOLS.

Since the publication of the article in our last issue on "The Expense of the City Schools" we have received a copy of an elaborate Report of the Financial Committee of the Board of Education, showing the operations of the school system of the city under existing laws. This is a public document, and one which invites the examination of all who are interested in our system of public instruction.

It appears from this Report that the Board of Education, in accordance with the recommendation of a committee of the Legislature of 1867, of which Hon. GIDEON ARCHER was Chairman, has asked the passage of an act introduced by Hon. HORATIO BALLARD, a member of that committee—providing funds for this purpose—propose this year to furnish additional school accommodations for over 10,000 children. This will necessitate an expense of $601,954 $50,000 of which, by a provision of the Act, is devoted to erecting a school-house for colored children.

The whole fund, estimated by the Board for the year's expenses, including the above amount, is $2,900,000, of which the salaries of the 2514 teachers employed in the Day, Evening, and Normal Schools amount to $1,677,500.

In consideration of the high position accorded to the school system of the city by the representatives from all our neighboring cities, as well as by visitors from abroad, for its liberality and efficiency, the action of the Board of Education seems to show commendable economy and good management.

We recommend an examination and careful consideration of the document to all of our citizens.

M. DU CHAILLU'S LECTURES.

The Lectures of M. DU CHAILLU on his travels in Africa will be resumed at Steinway Hall, beginning on February 17, and continuing on the 20th and 25th instants, will be among the most interesting of the season. The lecturer will illustrate his subject by many new and elegant diagrams.

CHICAGO'S CALAMITY.

The destruction of the great book-house of Messrs. S. C. Griggs & Co. by the fire of January 28 is recognized by the citizens of Chicago as a public calamity, in consequence not only of the draw-back which the fire has been to the commercial prosperity of the city, but also, and principally, because of the destruction of the choice works which formed the principal part of the stock of the great book-firm of Chicago. No house in the West exercised a greater controlling influence on the literary growth of that region than did that of Griggs & Co.; their stock was not only large but very choice, embracing imprints of the best Eastern publishers, the standard works of all languages, the choicest illustrated and artistic works of France, Germany, and England, all the standard educational works for schools and colleges, including the classics, and an immense stock of stationery. While the loss of Chicago by this fire has therefore been large, commercially speaking, her calamity, intellectually regarded, has been much greater. The public of the city felt a metropolitan pride in the institution; the public of the surrounding country had long enjoyed its literary and educational influences; and the destruction of the establishment is justly looked upon as a serious public loss.

But it is not irreparable. Messrs. GRIGGS & Co. are men of energy, who will in the future as in the past by their great industry, experience, and tact soon build up their house upon its old foundations and attain their former prosperity. In their losses they have received the sympathy of all; in their efforts to restore their house they will have the cordial good-will and aid of the entire community and the trade East and West.

"THE VOICE IN SINGING."

A modest little book, which many persons would most gladly see, and of which they are not likely to hear, has been just publish by J. B. LIPPINCOTT, in Philadelphia. It is "The Voice in Singing," by Mrs. EMMA SEILER, a German lady of extraordinary scientific knowledge, who had made a name as a very careful, skilled, and learned teacher in Germany before she came to this country, and has brief works has been translated by an accomplished and most conscientious German scholar. Mrs. SEILER has made a thorough study of the voice physiologically, physically, and æsthetically; and her attention was drawn to it by her own experience as a singer. She was revealed to her that she had no sound general principle for the special culture of voices, and by the correction of competent judges of singers saw how to become a better singer. Hereupon, her acquaintance with the best modern singers—notably with JENNY LIND—her study in Italy and in France, and familiarity with the method of GARCIA and the other masters, taught her that the present method of teaching is illogical and basically unphilosophical at the beginning, with the laryngoscope, she satisfied herself by patient study and reflection, and the result of her researches is written in this little book. We commend it most earnestly to all students of vocal music as sure to instruct and delight them. It is the thoroughest and clearest. It is not easy reading, but it is very valuable, and may help to save and perfect many a lovely voice. It is a work of blended knowledge and enthusiasm, and unique in conciseness and simplicity.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

The sessions of Congress from February 4 to February 10 were not very important.

In the Senate on the 4th the Reconstruction bill under debate, with no signs of an early conclusion of the discussion.

On February 5, a bill was promptly passed through both Houses authorizing the Secretary of War to employ counsel for the defense of army officers in cases brought against them for acts performed in the discharge of their duties in enforcing the Reconstruction laws.

The first step toward forfeiting the railroad grants by certain of the Southern States was taken in the House on February 5, a bill for that purpose passing by a vote of 112 to 73 nays.

The new army appropriation bill, reported in the House February 6, reduces the gilding of the army, and the expense and very largely reduces the force.

The Senate has now not limit that the Capitol of the United States ought to be removed to the Mississippi Valley. A resolution introduced by Mr. WILSON to that effect of the House was lost on February 10 by a vote of 27 nays to 17 yeas.

A bill was introduced in the House on February 10 to provide for a gradual return to specie payments. It provides that on and after the 1st of December, 1868, the Secretary of the Treasury shall sell coin gold for legal-tender notes at the rate of one gold dollar for one dollar and thirty cents in currency; on the 1st of January, 1869, at one dollar and twenty-nine cents, and each less on the 1st of each succeeding month until the exchange is dollar for dollar; and that on and after January 1, 1870, the Secretary shall pay gold for all its legal-tender notes, dollar for dollar. It leaves the question of contraction or expansion of the currency to future legislation. No action has as yet been taken on it.

NEWS ITEMS.

Minister Adams has resigned, and is to return to the United States in April, in time to take an active and perhaps prominent part in the next great political canvass.

The Republican Convention of New York met at Albany on February 5, and instructed the delegates to the National Convention to vote for General GRANT as President, and to vote as the majority of the party for President and Vice-President.

The Democratic Convention recently voted upon a resolution to prohibit amalgamation of the races. The vote was 19 in the affirmative, the Hon. SAMUL TILDEN voting for and the Conservatives against the proposition.

General Hall, of Florida, has resigned, as the President one hundred thousand men to enforce the Alabama act of the Alabama scalawag Legislature.

The Supreme Court decision in the Georgia and Mississippi cases, declaring that it has no power to restrain the Secretary of War, General-in-Chief, and others from enforcing the reconstruction laws, is understood to be the court is without jurisdiction. A former decision of Chief Justice TANEY was expressly to the effect of the political kind. It was held by the court that the question was purely political, not judicial, and that the court could have no right to pronounce merely an abstract opinion. The question of the constitution or of statutes is not a question of person or property and considered in the bill to justify political action on the part of the court.

The Alabama election resulted in a defeat of the proposed Constitution by the failure of a vote of a majority of the registered electors. This is the first election of the character which has been held by any of the Southern States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Roman question is again being seriously discussed in Europe. Italy in consequence of the interesting fact that Victor Emanuel had prohibited the Italian Clergy from performing Te Deum ordered by the Pope to celebrate the defeat of the Garibaldians.

The Pope's Zouaves of Freedom while hunting on February 8 were fired upon by a party in ambush, but escaped unhurt.

Prussia has pensioned the deposed King of Hanover, and objects to his living in France, and Napoleon has consented to expel all Hanoverian political refugees from French soil.

The King of Prussia has expressed a willingness to act as umpire between the United States and Great Britain in the matter of the Alabama claims.

United States Minister Burlingame is in the service of the Emperor of China: at least he has resigned the mission to China, and is on his way home with a message from the Emperor of China to the President of the United States. Whether or not it has reference to commercial intercourse, or asks aid against the rebels, is not yet known.

"Shame on the policy that first began
To tamper with the heart to hide its thoughts."—Havard's Regulus.

"The seal of truth is on thy gallant form,
For none but cowards lie."—Murphy's Alonzo.

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER XIII.

I FOUND my lady in her own sitting-room. She started and looked annoyed when I mentioned that Sergeant Cuff wished to speak to her.

"Must I see him?" she asked. "Can't you represent me, Gabriel?"

I felt at a loss to understand this, and showed it plainly, I suppose, in my face. My lady was so good as to explain herself.

"I am afraid my nerves are a little shaken," she said. "There is something in that police-officer from London which I recoil from—I don't know why. I have a presentiment that he is bringing trouble and misery with him into the house. Very foolish and very unlike me—but so it is."

I hardly knew what to say to this. The more I saw of Sergeant Cuff the better I liked him. My lady rallied a little after having opened her heart to me—being naturally a woman of a high courage, as I have already told you.

"If I must see him, I must," she said. "But I can't prevail on myself to see him alone. Bring him in, Gabriel, and stay here as long as he stays."

This was the first attack of the megrims that I remembered in my mistress since the time when she was a young girl. I went back to the "boudoir." Mr. Franklin strolled out into the garden, and joined Mr. Godfrey, whose time for departure was now settled. Sergeant Cuff and I went straight to my mistress's room.

I declare my lady turned a shade paler at the sight of him! She commanded herself, however, in other respects, and asked the Sergeant if he had any objection to me by being present. She was so good as to add that I was her trusted adviser as well as her old servant, and that in say thing which related to the household I was the person whom it might be most profitable to consult. The Sergeant politely answered that he would take my presence as a favor, having something to say about the servants in general, and having found my experience in that quarter already of some use to him. My lady pointed to two chairs, and we set in for our conference immediately.

"I have already formed an opinion on this case," says Sergeant Cuff, "which I beg your ladyship's permission to keep to myself for the present. My business now is to mention what I have discovered up stairs in Miss Verinder's sitting-room, and what I have decided (with your ladyship's leave) on doing next."

He then went into the matter of the smear on the paint, and stated the conclusions he drew from it—just as he had stated them (only with greater respect of language) to Superintendent Seegrave. "'One thing,' he said, in conclusion, 'is certain. The Diamond is missing out of the drawer in the cabinet. Another thing is next to certain. The marks from the smear on the door must be on some article of dress belonging to somebody in this house. We must discover that article of dress before we go a step further."

"And that discovery," remarked my mistress, "implies, I presume, the discovery of the thief?"

"I beg your ladyship's pardon—I don't say the Diamond is stolen. I only say, at present, that the Diamond is missing. The discovery of the stained dress may lead the way to finding it."

Her ladyship looked at me. "Do you understand this?" she said.

"Sergeant Cuff understands it, my lady," I answered.

"How do you propose to discover the stained dress?" inquired my mistress, addressing herself once more to the Sergeant. "My good servants, who have been with me for years, have, I am ashamed to say, had their boxes and rooms searched already by the other officer. I can't and won't permit them to be insulted in that way a second time!"

(There was a mistress to serve! There was a woman in ten thousand, if you like!)

"That is the very point I was about to put to your ladyship," said the Sergeant. "The other officer has done a world of harm to this inquiry by letting the servants see that he suspected them. If I give them cause to think themselves suspected a second time, there's no knowing what obstacles they may not throw in my way—the women especially. At the same time, their boxes must be searched again—for this plain reason, that the first investigation only looked for the Diamond, and that the second investigation must look for the stained dress. I quite agree with you, my lady, that the servants' feelings ought to be consulted. But I am equally clear that the servants' wardrobes ought to be searched."

This looked very like a dead lock. My lady said so, in choicer language than mine.

"I have got a plan to meet the difficulty," said Sergeant Cuff, "if your ladyship will consent to it. I propose explaining the case to the servants."

"The women will think themselves suspected directly," I said, interrupting him.

"The women won't, Mr. Betteredge," answered the Sergeant, "if I can tell them I am going to examine the wardrobes of every body—from her ladyship downward—who slept in the house on Wednesday night. It's a mere formality," he added, with a side look at my mistress; "but the servants will accept it as even dealing between them and their betters; and, instead of hindering the investigation, they will make a point of honor of assisting it."

I saw the truth of that. My lady, after her first surprise was over, saw the truth of it also.

"You are certain the investigation is necessary?" she said.

"It's the shortest way that I can see, my lady, to the end we have in view."

My mistress rose to ring the bell for her maid. "You shall speak to the servants," she said, "with the keys of my wardrobe in your hand."

Sergeant Cuff stopped her by a very unexpected question.

"Hadn't we better make sure first," he asked, "that the other ladies and gentlemen in the house will consent, too?"

"The only other lady in the house is Miss Verinder," answered my mistress, with a look of surprise. "The only gentlemen are my nephews, Mr. Blake and Mr. Ablewhite. There is not the least fear of a refusal from any of the three."

I reminded my lady here that Mr. Godfrey was going away. As I said the words Mr. Godfrey himself knocked at the door to say good-by, and was followed in by Mr. Franklin, who was going with him to the station. My lady explained the difficulty. Mr. Godfrey settled it directly. He called to Samuel, through the window, to take his portmanteau up stairs again, and he then put the key himself into Sergeant Cuff's hand. "My luggage can follow me to London," he said, "when the inquiry is over." The Sergeant received the key with a becoming apology. "I am sorry to put you to any inconvenience, Sir, for a mere formality; but the example of their betters will do wonders in reconciling the servants to this inquiry." Mr. Godfrey, after taking leave of my lady, in a most sympathizing manner, left a farewell message for Miss Rachel, the terms of which made it clear to my mind that he had not taken No for an answer, and that he meant to put the marriage question to her once more, at the next opportunity. Mr. Franklin, on following his cousin out, informed the Sergeant that all his clothes were open to examination, and that nothing he possessed was kept under lock and key. Sergeant Cuff made his best acknowledgments. His views, you will observe, had been met with the utmost readiness by my lady, by Mr. Godfrey, and by Mr. Franklin. There was only Miss Rachel now wanting to follow their lead, before we called the servants together, and began the search for the stained dress.

My lady's unaccountable objection to the Sergeant seemed to make our conference more distasteful to her than ever, as soon as we were left alone again. "If I send you down Miss Verinder's keys," she said to him, "I presume I shall have done all you want of me for the present."

"I beg your ladyship's pardon," said Sergeant Cuff. "Before we begin, I should like, if convenient, to have the washing-book. The stained article of dress may be an article of linen. If the search leads to nothing, I want to be able to account for all the linen in the house, and for all the linen sent to wash. If there is an article missing, there will be at least a presumption that it has got the paint-stain on it, and that it has been purposely made away with, yesterday or to-day, by the person owning it. Superintendent Seegrave," added the Sergeant, turning to me, "pointed the attention of the women-servants to the smear, when they all crowded into the room on Thursday morning. That may turn out, Mr. Betteredge, to have been one more of Superintendent Seegrave's many mistakes."

My lady desired me to ring the bell and order the washing-book. She remained with us until it was produced, in case Sergeant Cuff had any further request to make of her after looking at it.

The washing-book was brought in by Rosanna Spearman. The girl had come down to breakfast that morning miserably pale and haggard, but sufficiently recovered from her illness of the previous day to do her usual work. Sergeant Cuff looked attentively at our second house-maid—at her face, when she came in; at her crooked shoulder, when she went out.

"Have you any thing more to say to me?" asked my lady, still as eager as ever to be out of the Sergeant's society.

The great Cuff opened the washing-book, understood it perfectly in half a minute, and shut it up again. "I venture to trouble your ladyship with one question more," he said. "Has the young woman who brought us this book been in your employment as long as the other servants?"

"Why do you ask?" said my lady.

"The last time I saw her," answered the Sergeant, "she was in prison for theft."

After that there was no help for it but to tell him the truth. My mistress dwelt strongly on Rosanna's good conduct in her service, and on the high opinion entertained of her by the matron at the Reformatory. "You don't suspect her, I hope?" my lady added, in conclusion, very earnestly.

"I have already told your ladyship that I don't suspect any person in the house of thieving, up to the present time."

After that answer, my lady rose to go up stairs and ask for Miss Rachel's keys. The Sergeant was beforehand with me in opening the door for her. He made a very low bow. My lady shuddered as she passed him.

We waited, and waited, and no keys appeared. Sergeant Cuff made no remark to me. He turned his melancholy face to the window; he put his lanky hands into his pockets, and he whistled The Last Rose of Summer drearily to himself.

At last Samuel came in, not with the keys, but with a morsel of paper for me. I got at my spectacles, with some fumbling and difficulty, feeling the Sergeant's dismal eyes fixed on me all the time. There were two or three lines on the paper, written in pencil by my lady. They informed me that Miss Rachel flatly refused to have her wardrobe examined. Asked for her reasons, she had burst out crying. Asked again, she had said: "I won't, because I won't. I must yield to force if you use it, but I will yield to nothing else." I understood my lady's diminclination to face Sergeant Cuff with such an answer from her daughter as that. If I had not been too old for the amiable weaknesses of youth, I believe I should have blushed at the notion of facing him myself.

"Any news of Miss Verinder's keys?" asked the Sergeant.

"My young lady refuses to have her wardrobe examined."

"Ah!" said the Sergeant.

His voice was not quite in such a perfect state of discipline as his face. When he said "Ah!" he said it in the tone of a man who had heard something which he expected to hear. He half-angered and half-frightened me—why, I couldn't tell, but he did it.

He laid the washing-book on the table, and, taking out his penknife, began to trim his nails.

"You don't seem to be much disappointed," I said.

"No," said Sergeant Cuff; "I'm not much disappointed."

I tried to make him explain himself.

"Why should Miss Rachel put an obstacle in your way?" I inquired. "Isn't it her interest to help you?"

"Wait a little, Mr. Betteredge—wait a little." Cleverer heads than mine might have seen his drift. One person less fond of Miss Rachel than I was might have seen his drift. My lady's horror of him might (as I have since thought) have meant that she saw his drift (as the Scripture says) "in a glass darkly." I didn't see it yet —that's all I know.

"What's to be done next?" I asked.

Sergeant Cuff finished the nail on which he was then at work, looked at it for a moment with a melancholy interest, and put up his penknife.

"Come out into the garden," he said, "and let's have a look at the roses."

CHAPTER XIV.

THE nearest way to the garden, on going out of my lady's sitting-room, was by the shrubbery path, which you already know of. For the sake of your better understanding of what is now to come, I may add to this, that the shrubbery path was Mr. Franklin's favorite walk. When he was out in the grounds, and when we failed to find him any where else, we generally found him here.

I am afraid I must own that I am rather an obstinate old man. The more firmly Sergeant Cuff kept his thoughts shut up from me the more firmly I persisted in trying to look in at them. As we turned into the shrubbery path I attempted to circumvent him in another way.

"As things are now," I said, "if I was in your place I should be at my wit's end."

"If you were in my place," answered the Sergeant, "you would have formed an opinion—and, as things are now, any doubt you might previously have felt about your own conclusions would be completely set at rest. Never mind, for the present, what those conclusions are, Mr. Betteredge. I haven't brought you out here to draw me like a badger; I have brought you out here to ask for some information. You might have given it to me, no doubt, in the house, instead of out of it. But doors and listeners have a knack of getting together, and, in my line of life, we sometimes cultivate a healthy taste for the open air."

"SERGEANT CUFF LOOKED ATTENTIVELY AT OUR SECOND HOUSE-MAID—AT HER FACE, WHEN SHE CAME IN; AT HER CROOKED SHOULDER, WHEN SHE WENT OUT."

Who was to circumvent this man? I gave in—and waited as patiently as I could to hear what was coming next.

"We won't enter into your young lady's motives," the Sergeant went on; "we shall only say it's a pity she declines to assist me, because, by so doing, she makes this investigation more difficult than it might otherwise have been. We must now try to solve the mystery of the smear on the door—which, you may take my word for it, means the mystery of the Diamond also—in some other way. I have decided to see the servants, and to search their thoughts and actions, Mr. Betteredge, instead of searching their wardrobes. Before I begin, however, I want to ask you a question or two. You are an observant man—the most observant man among many in any of the servants (making due allowance, of course, for fright and flutter) after the loss of the Diamond was found out? Any particular quarrel among them? Any one of them not in his or her usual spirits? Unexpectedly out of temper, for instance? or unexpectedly taken ill?"

I had just time to think of Rosanna Spearman's sudden illness at yesterday's dinner-time, and to shake my head in answer—when I saw Sergeant Cuff's eyes suddenly turn aside toward the shrubbery; and I heard him say softly to himself, "Hullo!"

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"A touch of the rheumatics in my back," said the Sergeant, in a loud voice, as if he wanted some third person to hear us. "We shall have a change in the weather before long."

A few steps further brought us to the corner of the house. Turning off sharp to the right, we entered the narrow, sandy path which led, by the steps in the middle, into the garden below. Sergeant Cuff stopped there, in the open space, where we could see round us on every side.

"About that young person, Rosanna Spearman?" he said. "It isn't very likely, with her personal appearance, that she has got a lover. But, for the girl's own sake, I must ask you to once whether she has provided herself with a sweet-heart, poor wretch, like the rest of them?"

What on earth did he mean, under present circumstances, by putting such a question to me or to that? I stared at him instead of answering him.

"I saw Rosanna Spearman hiding in the shrubbery as we went by," said the Sergeant.

"What, at Hullo?"

"Yes—when I said, 'Hullo.' If there's a sweet-heart in the case, the hiding doesn't much matter. If there is—as things are in this house—the hiding is a highly suspicious circumstance, and it will be my painful duty to act on it accordingly."

What, in God's name, was I to say to him? I knew the shrubbery was Mr. Franklin's favorite walk; I knew he would most likely turn this way when he came back from the station; I knew that Penelope had over and over again caught her fellow-servant hanging about there, and had always declared to me that Rosanna's object was to attract Mr. Franklin's attention. If my daughter was right, she might well have been laying in wait for Mr. Franklin's return when the Sergeant noticed her. I could not between the two difficulties of mentioning Penelope's fanciful notion as if it was mine, or of leaving a most innocent creature to run the consequences, the very serious consequences, of exciting the suspicion of Sergeant Cuff. Out of pure pity for the girl—on my soul and honor, out of pure pity for the girl—I gave the Sergeant the necessary explanations, and told him that Rosanna had been mad enough to set her heart on Mr. Franklin Blake.

Sergeant Cuff never laughed. On the few occasions when a thing amused him he curled up where things cleared up. Yes, I'll keep it a secret, Mr. Betteredge. I like to be sure to know man infirmity—though I don't get many chances of exercising that virtue in my line of life. You think Mr. Franklin Blake hasn't got a suspicion of the girl's fancy for him? Ah! he would have found it out fast enough if she had been nice-looking. The ugly women have a long time of it in this world; let's hope it will be made up to them in another. You have got a nice garden there, and a well-kept lawn. See how curved how much better the flowers look with grass about them instead of gravel. No, thank you. I won't take a rose. It goes to my heart to break them off the stem. Just as it goes to your heart, you know, when there's something wrong in the domestic hall. Did you notice any thing you couldn't account for in any of the servants when the loss of the Diamond was first found out?"

I had got on very fairly well with Sergeant Cuff so far. But the strong vein which he slipped in that last question put me on my guard. In plain English, I didn't at all relish the notion of helping his inquiries, when those inquiries took him (in the capacity of snake in the grass) among my fellow-servants.

"I noticed nothing," I said, "except that we all lost our heads together, myself included."

"Oh," says the Sergeant, "that's all you have to tell me, is it?"

I answered, with (as I flattered myself) an unmoved countenance, "That is all."

Sergeant Cuff's dismal eyes looked me hard in the face.

"Mr. Betteredge," he said, "have you any objection to oblige me by sinking hands? I have taken an extraordinary liking to you."

(Why he should have chosen the exact moment when I was deceiving him to give me that proof of his good opinion is beyond all comprehension! I felt a little proud—I really did feel a little proud of having been one too many at last for the celebrated Cuff!)

We went back to the house; the Sergeant requesting that I would give him a room to himself, and then send in the servants (the indoor servants only), one after another, in the order of their rank, from first to last.

I showed Sergeant Cuff into my own room, and then called the servants together in the hall. Rosanna Spearman appeared among them, much to my relief. She was so quick in her way to the Sergeant in his, and I suspect she had heard what he had to say to the servants in general, just before he discovered her. Then she was, at any rate, looking as if she had never heard of such a place as the shrubbery in her life.

I sent them in, one by one, as desired. The cook was the first to come. She went in cheerfully, otherwise my room. She remained but a short time. Report, on coming out: "Sergeant Cuff is interested in nothing—in nothing, Mr. Betteredge, but a perfect gentleman." My lady's own maid followed. Remained much longer. Report, on coming out: "If Sergeant Cuff doesn't believe a respectable woman, he might keep his opinion to himself, at any rate!" Penelope went next. Remained about as long as the cook. Report, on coming out: "Sergeant Cuff is much to be pitied. He must have been crossed in love, I believe, when he was a young man." The first house-maid followed Penelope. Remained like my lady's maid, a long time. Report, on coming out: "I didn't expect much from Sergeant Mr. Betteredge, to be doubted to my face by a low police-officer!" Rosanna Spearman went next. Remained remarkably short time. No report on coming out—dead silence, and lips as pale as ashes. Susanna, the footman, followed Rosanna. Remained about as long. Report, on coming out: "Whoever blacks Sergeant Cuff's boots ought to be ashamed of himself." Nancy, the kitchen-maid, last. Remained a minute or two. Report, on coming out: "Sergeant Cuff has a heart; he doesn't cut jokes, Mr. Betteredge, with a poor hard-working girl."

Going into the Court of Justice, when it was all over, to hear if there were any further commands for me, I found the Sergeant at his old work—looking out of the window and whistling The Last Rose of Summer to himself.

"Any discoveries, Sir?" I inquired.

"If Rosanna Spearman asks leave to go out," said the Sergeant, "let the poor thing go; but let me know first."

I might as well have had my tongue about Rosanna and Mr. Franklin! It was through her the unfortunate girl had fallen under Sergeant Cuff's suspicions, in spite of all I could do to prevent it.

"I hope you don't think Rosanna is concerned in the loss of the Diamond?" I ventured to say.

The corners of the Sergeant's mouth instantly curled up, and he looked hard in my face; just as he had looked in the garden.

"I shall better be able to tell you, Mr. Betteredge," he said. "You might lose your head, you know, for the second time."

I kept to doubt whether I had been one too many for the celebrated Cuff, after all! It was rather a satisfaction that we were interrupted here by a knock at the door and a message from the cook. Rosanna Spearman had asked to go out, for the air, and Sergeant Cuff had said Yes, and she wanted a breath of fresh air. As a sign from the Sergeant, I said, Yes. "Which is the servant's way to the shrubbery?" was the message her maid got home. I showed him the servant's way out. "Lock the door of your room," says the Sergeant, "and if any one asks for me, say I'm in there, composing my mind." He curled up again at the corners of the lips, and disappeared.

Left alone, under those circumstances, a devouring curiosity pushed me on to make some discoveries for myself.

It was plain that Sergeant Cuff's suspicions of Rosanna had been roused by something that he had found out in his examination of the house-maids in my room. Now, the only two servants (excepting Rosanna herself) who had remained under examination for any length of time were my lady's own maid and the first house-maid, those two being also the women who had taken the lead in persecuting their unfortunate fellow-servant to the last. Reaching these conclusions, I looked in on them, casually as it might be, in the servants' hall, finding no one there but Penelope, busily at work at her needle. (For, nota bene, a drop of tea is, to a woman's tongue, what a drop of oil is to a wasting lamp.)

My reliance on the tea-pot as an ally did not go unrewarded. In less than half an hour I knew as much as the Sergeant himself.

My lady's maid and the house-maid had, it appears, neither of them believed in Rosanna's illness of the previous day. They now declared—I ask your pardon; but how else can you describe a couple of spiteful women?—and stolen up stairs, at intervals during the Thursday afternoon; had tried Rosanna's door, and found it locked; had knocked, and not been answered; had listened, and not heard a sound inside. When the girl had come down to tea, and had been sent up, still out of sorts, to bed again, the two devils aforesaid had tried her door once more, and found it locked; had looked at the keyhole, and found it stopped up; had sent a little note to the door at midnight, and had heard the rustling of a fire (a fire in a servant's bedroom in the month of June!) on four in the morning. All this they had told Sergeant Cuff, who, in return for their anxiety to enlighten him, had eyed them with sour and suspicious looks, and had shown them plainly that he didn't believe either one or the other. Hence the unfavorable reports of him which these two women had brought out with them from the examination. Hence, also (without reckoning the influence of the tea-pot), their readiness to set their tongues run to any length on the subject of the Sergeant's ungracious behavior to them.

Having had some experience of the great Cuff's roundabout ways, and having last seen him evidently bent on following Rosanna privately when she went out for her walk, it seemed clear to me that he had thought it unadvisable to let the lady's maid and the house-maid know how materially they had helped him. They were just the sort of women, if he had treated their evidence as trust-worthy, to have been puffed up by it, and to have said or done something which would have put Rosanna Spearman on her guard.

I walked out in the fine summer evening, very sorry for the poor girl, and very uneasy in my mind, generally, at the turn things had taken. Strolling toward the shrubbery, there I met Mr. Franklin in his favorite walk. He had been back some time from the station, and had been with my lady, holding a long conversation with her. She had told him of Mrs Rachel's unaccountable refusal to let her wardrobe be examined, and had put him in such low spirits about my young lady that he seemed to shrink from speaking on the subject. The family temper appeared in his face that evening for the first time in my experience of him.

"Well, Betteredge," he said, "how does the atmosphere of mystery and suspicion in which we are all living now agree with you? Do you remember that morning when I first came here with the Diamond? I wish to God we had thrown it into the quicksand!"

After breaking out in that way, he abstained from speaking until he had mastered himself. We walked silently, side by side, for a minute or two, and then he asked me what had become of Sergeant Cuff. It was impossible to put-Mr. Franklin off with the excuse of the Sergeant being in my room, composing his mind. I told him exactly what had happened, mentioning particularly what my lady's maid and the house-maid had said about Rosanna Spearman.

Mr. Franklin's clear head saw the case in Sergeant's suspicions had taken, in the twinkling of an eye.

"Didn't you tell me this morning," he said, "that one of the tradespeople declared he had met Rosanna yesterday, on the foot-way to Fivehead Farm?"

"Yes, Sir."

"If my aunt's maid and the other woman have spoken the truth, you may depend upon it the tradesman did meet her. The girl's attack of illness was a trick to deceive us. She had some guilty reason for going to the town secretly. The paint-stained dress is a dress of hers; and the fire heard crackling in her room at four in the morning was a fire lit to destroy it. Rosanna Spearman has stolen the Diamond. I'll go to Sergeant Cuff, and tell my aunt the turn things have taken."

"Not just yet, if you please, Sir," said a melancholy voice behind us.

We both turned about, and found ourselves face to face with Sergeant Cuff.

"Why not just yet?" asked Mr. Franklin.

"Because, Sir, if you tell her ladyship, her ladyship will tell Miss Verinder."

"Suppose she does? What then?" Mr. Franklin said those words with a sudden heat and vehemence, as if the Sergeant had mortally offended him.

"Do you think it's wise, Sir," said Sergeant Cuff, quietly, "to put such a question as that to me, after what I have just heard?"

There was a moment's silence between them: Mr. Franklin walked close up to the Sergeant. The two looked each other steadily in the face. Mr. Franklin spoke first; dropping his voice as suddenly as he had raised it.

"I ask your pardon, Mr. Cuff," he said, "that you are treading on delicate ground?"

"If isn't the first time, by a good many hundreds, Sir, that I have been treading on delicate ground," answered the other just as immovable as ever.

"I am to understand that you forbid me to tell my aunt what has happened?"

"I am to understand, if you please, Sir, that I throw up the case, if you tell Lady Verinder, or tell any body, what has happened until I give you leave."

That settled it. Mr. Franklin had no choice but to submit. He turned away in anger, and left us.

I had stood there listening to them, all in a tremble; not knowing whom to suspect, or what to think about. The sudden end of my confusion, two things, however, were plain to me. First, that my young lady was, in some unaccountable manner, the object of the sharp speeches that had passed between them. Second, that they thoroughly understood each other without having previously exchanged a word of explanation or either side.

"Mr. Betteredge," said the Sergeant, "you have done a very clever thing in my absence. You have done a little detective business on your own account. For the future, perhaps you will be so obliging as to do your detective business along with me."

He took me by the arm, and walked me away with him along the road by which he had come. I dare say I had deserved his reproof—but I was going to help him to set traps for Rosanna Spearman for all that. Thief or no thief, legal or not legal, I don't care—I pitied her.

"What do you want of me?" I asked, shaking him off, and stopping short.

"Only a little information about the country round here," said the Sergeant.

I couldn't well object to improve Sergeant Cuff in his geography.

"Is there any path, in that direction, leading from the sea-beach to this house?" asked the Sergeant. He pointed, as he spoke, to the flirtation which led to the Shivering Sand.

"Yes," I said; "there is a path."

"Show it to me."

Side by side, in the gray of the summer evening, Sergeant Cuff and I set forth for the Shivering Sand.

THE QUEEN'S BOOK.

[FROM PUNCH.]

LET cynics scoff and worldlings sneer,
And cold aristocrats condemn;
Their contempt we weigh not a hair,
Her counsel was not taken with them.

A wiser, womanlier thought
Whispered within her woman's heart:
They that may solace would have sought,
They in my grief shall have their part.

"The love I mourn, for whom I go
In mourning, ever, to the end,
What England lost in him they know,
How sure a guide, how firm a friend:

"But what the loss the wife, and Queen,
Had in that nature, pure and sweet,
That judgment, steady and serene,
That counsel swift all needs to meet,

"That light of joy within the home,
That touch of power beside the hearth,
That gravity which ne'er was gloom,
That glee as pure as maiden's mirth—

"All this my people can not know,
All this I only can make known,
That they may gauge the love and woe
I knew with him, now know alone.

"So my past life, my walks and ways,
The wife's and mother's, not the Queen's,
My treasured tale of happy days,
My record of love-hallowed scenes,

"I'll open to my people's eyes,
And therein bid them take their part,
That they may weigh the weight that lies
On my lone life and widowed heart.

"I'll feeling what my joy has been
They feel how vast my grief must be:
And, when my treasure they have seen,
May measure what is to me."

What Queen like this was ever known
To take her people to her heart?
When was Queen's household-life so shown
With modest truth and artless art?

The Royal Widow has done well
Thus on her people's love to call.
Her simple, wife's y tale to tell,
And trust her joys and griefs to all.

NE'er since VICTORIA felt the Crown
A weight upon her girlish brow,
Have Heaven's best blessings been called down
About her path, as they are now.

THE WILL I FOUND.

WHEN ANNE Jeffrey died we looked very much lously for a will, but in vain.

Uncle Abner had been a childless widower when he married her, and she had then one son, John Atkins, to remember her first husband by. John Atkins and I were pretty good friends for a while, but when my uncle died and left all his property to his wife I did not like it.

Not that I needed it—not by any means, for my sister Marion and I had been very handsomely provided for by our own father—but then what right had Uncle Jeffrey to forget us in that manner? He ought at least to have made some mention of his wife's niece, Annie Atkins; but he did not, although I always believed that she had gilted me more to oblige him than any thing else.

When, therefore, Aunt Jeffrey died without a will, which had become her habit, and first tered upon the property with as much coolness and in as matter-of-course a way as if it really of right belonged to him, and from that day forth I took a dislike to him.

I never said as much to him, and he kept on visiting at our house just the same. He made my grandmother Spooner, who kept house for me then, invite Annie Atkins to come and live with us, and my wife hints now that I denied me that he took that also as a matter of course and didn't seem to care. He even went so far as to say that it was the correct thing under the circumstances, and that grandmother Spooner was the proper person remaining in the family who could properly take charge of the young lady members.

Marion even sided with him in that; but then she was excessively fond of Annie, and was ever so much taken with the idea of having her in the house.

I had known a great deal of Aunt Jeffrey's ways, however, for I had always been her favorite, and I made up my mind that she never did allow herself to die without making some kind of a will. And if she had made a will, I was sure that Annie, and Marion, and myself would all be handsomely remembered. Not that I cared on my account, but there really was no sense or justice in all new old Jeffrey and Spooner property going to John Atkins without so much as the stroke of a pen.

The matter troubled me, and I fairly dreamed about it, wondering where on earth that will could have been deposited.

Sometimes I thought that John Atkins knew something about it, and when he sat by the library fire talking with Marion, or stood by Annie at the piano, I would watch his face for the lines that indicate craft and secretiveness. He certainly had some of them, and his mother had before him. She had been odd in some respects, and my knowledge of her taste for queer, out-of-the-way hiding-places, and all that sort of thing, furnished me with food for more than a little meditation.

Another of her tastes had led her to the collection of a huge stock of antiquated and singular-looking furniture. In the course of time she had made her house quite a curiosity-shop. And here it was that my first available idea struck me. I said nothing about it to Marion, and I was a good deal puzzled how to do any thing with it, but time furnished me with the opportunity. I had called to mind that, for as long as I could remember, an immense old-fashioned chest-of-drawers—what she called a "secretary"—had stood in Aunt Jeffrey's dressing-room, and had been the receptacle of all the heterogeneous collection of minor nick-nacks. I would never have dreamed of trying to get it of John Atkins; indeed I was afraid of arousing his suspicions by mentioning the matter ever so guardedly, but I fully made up my mind that that old omnium-gatherum had a story of its own to tell.

At last, however, as I was saying, the thing was done for me, and by John Atkins himself. He announced, some months after his mother's death, that he was going to sell out all the old rattle-traps at auction, and put in some new furniture. Annie and Marion heartily approved of the idea, but I very wisely said nothing.

When the day of the sale came I managed to have a telegram sent to him that kept him away for several hours on a regular wild-goose chase, and by the time he got back every thing was done and completed.

Of course I purchased the old "secretary," though not without a sharp competition with one or two musty individuals who were on the look-out for just such Noah's relics as that was, and as soon as ever it was fairly mine I had it carted off home without a moment's delay.

It was very well that I did so, for the moment John Atkins came back and found that the auctioneer had included that particular piece of work in the list of sales he began to make a most unreasonable fuss about it, solemnly averring that he had had no intention of selling an article which had been so great a favorite with his dear departed mother. That, of course, did not diminish my satisfaction with my purchase; but when he found out who had it, and came to speak to me about it, I told him that I had had the very same idea, and had bid it in out of regard for Aunt Jeffrey. He offered me my money back, but I very quietly refused, telling him, in a half-sarcastic way, that it would not look well among his elegant new furniture, and that I really wanted to have something from the old Jeffrey estate.

That silenced him, for he knew very well that I was not altogether pleased with the manner in which he had received his inheritance.

Annie and Marion both told me that I ought to let him have it back again; but I chuckled to myself and told them that perhaps I would some day.

I had the old "secretary," with a good deal of trouble, carried into the library, and it gave me no end of inward satisfaction when I saw John Atkins's eyes wandering to it that evening. I half believed that he suspected my motive in the purchase, and I knew that, if so, he could not have made a prior examination, or he would not have cared.

I overheard him saying to Marion, in the hall, "I wish you would persuade your brother to let me have that old affair back again."

"Oh," said Marion, "you know how crotchety he is. It won't be long before he is tired of it, and then you may find it set down before your door any morning, but it won't be of any use to argue with him now."

I thought of what "that old affair" might contain for her benefit, and laughed to myself over her opinion of her crotchety brother. But even Annie came to bother me about it, and I really did not like to be rude to her, so I put on an air of mystery, and told her I had some very singular ideas connected with that piece of furniture; I was quite superstitious about it. Annie did not have much to say to me in those days. I used to think that her conscience troubled her, as well it might, about the manner in which she had treated me before Aunt Jeffrey's death.

Why, she even cut my correspondence while I was in Europe, allowing my letters to go unanswered for a whole year; and when I came home, soured and crusty, she never vouchsafed to me a breath of explanation. Marion tried to patch the matter up, but I would not hear a word after what had happened; a man is a fool who allows a woman to snub him in that way. Still, as she was a sort of a relation, poor, too, and under Grandmother Spooner's protection, I could not be otherwise than civil to her, only I was determined to have my way about Aunt Jeffrey's old furniture in spite of all the young women, or old ones either, in the house.

John Atkins made a more than usually long call that night, and seemed to have something on his mind, and after he left I could see clearly that I was, for the occasion, out of favor with the young ladies for my churlish refusal to comply with their notions. I did not care much for that, however, but hugged my own idea and wished them both safe in bed.

I had been reading an old story of Poe's, in which he describes the method used by the French police in searching for secret drawers and other hidden receptacles, and I was determined to take my time to it and make as sure of my business as his friend Dupin, or Vidocq himself, could have done.

A whole ring-full of keys, of different sizes, had been delivered with the "secretary," and I had provided myself with an accurate rule, a small chisel, and a gimlet. I knew very well that the chest of drawers contained just so much space, and no more, and that all I need do was to make sure that all of that space was accounted for. Any space which the several drawers, cupboards, etc., did not account for would at once furnish me with a chance for more accurate investigation.

It was late when the girls retired, but I determined to commence operations that night.

I sat there for a little while looking curiously at my ancient-looking purchase, and studying its peculiarities, for it was peculiar.

It was fairly enormous in size, built of solid mahogany, now dark with age, and finished and ornamented with queer devices in brass. It was so heavy that the united strength of half a dozen men had barely sufficed to put it in its present position. It stood on four great lion-claws, each of which contained a massive castor or roller.

There was a low cupboard at the bottom, with double doors. Then came a couple of not very deep drawers, and then a sort of carved front, fully two feet in height, that let down, on being unlocked, like the leaf of a table, disclosing a multiplicity of little drawers and pigeon-holes. I had seen Aunt Jeffrey open it more than once, and I knew very well that she had been in the habit of keeping her papers there.

As I sat and studied my proposed "job," the idea of its probable success grew rapidly upon me, and at last I pitched my cigar into the grate, and set to work with as much of science as my reading had supplied me with. First, I took an accurate external measurement of the whole affair, making careful minutes of the dimensions. There was no mirror on top, only a high, carved scroll of mahogany.

I began, systematically, with the cupboard at the bottom, and after some trouble in finding the key I threw it open. The shelves were thin, and after a good hour spent in prying, measuring, and sounding, I made up my mind that that part of the old "secretary" at least was honest and just what it appeared to be.

I never enjoyed any thing more in my life than I did that search, and was not at all disappointed with my want of immediate success. In fact, I found so much pleasure in the business that I made up my mind to prolong it, and have at least one more evening of just such fun. Nine-tenths of all our real pleasure is more in expectation and endeavor than in actual attainment or possession.

So I went to bed that night to dream of all sorts of absurd and impossible discoveries in the musty recesses of Aunt Jeffrey's mahogany monster.

The next day I had the servants polish up the brass-work, and rub the whole thing till it shone as it had done under the old lady's care. When evening came John Atkins made his appearance, as usual, and I tried to be uncommonly gracious to him, but he carefully abstained from any allusion to the "secretary," though I could see that he noticed its improved appearance. I believe he thought I had done all that to aggravate him, but if so he was mistaken.

He and Marion seemed disposed to let me alone that evening, and took themselves off to the parlor for some music, though I must say that they were a pair of most wretched performers.

Marion was even gruff enough to bid John good-night and show him out, and then go off up stairs to her own room without coming in to see us again, leaving me and Annie by ourselves, for Grandmother Spooner, like a sensible old person, went to bed early. I did not mind that, for Annie was good company, but I got tired, after a while, of waiting for her to go, and took it into my head to amuse myself by telling her all sorts of stories about secret drawers, lost wills, and so forth, until, at last, I fairly let the cat out of the bag, in a manner, by suggesting the possibility of such a thing in the old secretary, and proposing a search. Of course, I did it in an off-hand way, as a good piece of fun, and Annie merrily assented. She opened her eyes a little, however, when she came to see my preparations, though she said nothing, and joined me with a very fair show of interest in the work.

I began with the two middle drawers, but it did not take a great while to prove that there was nothing wonderful there. A few old rags and some papers of very dry herbs were all that rewarded that part of our search.

Then we came to the "let down" part of the concern, and here I was infinitely more particular—so much so that Annie became weary of it, declaring that she was satisfied, and gave the matter up. She went and sat down by the fire, however, and watched me, sleepily, as I went on. I stuck to it, however, measuring and peering and prying, until I thought I had fairly ransacked every nook and cranny, but all to no purpose. Truth to tell I was about to give up in despair when an idea struck me. In the centre, between the rows of pigeon-holes, were two upright tiers of little drawers, each with its own useless little old-fashioned lock. They all were empty; but when I came to pull one of them all the way out, I found that it was only about a foot deep, while the secretary was nearly twice as much. Here was something to go ahead on, and I rapidly took out all the little drawers. Then a smart pull on the centre-piece and its attached wood-work brought that all out together, and then, "Eureka!" there was a little door, the key of which I readily found on the ring. I kept as mute as a mouse; but a side-glance informed me that Annie had gone to sleep in her chair.

I felt sure that I had now reached the object of my search, and my fingers fairly trembled as I put the feeble, clumsy little key in the lock. The door opened readily, and there were four good-sized compartments jam full of papers.

With as little noise as possible I drew them out and began to run them over. It was very easy to determine the character of most of them at a glance, and all their importance had died with poor Aunt Jeffrey.

Paper after paper flew from my nervous fingers; envelope after envelope fell on the floor. I never stopped to untie any of the red tape, until at last I came upon a package that looked somewhat fresher than the rest, done up in common yellow wrapping-paper. There was some writing on this, and I held it up to the light and read:

"The end of my nephew's folly."

Off came the wrapper in an instant, and a pile of letters fell into my hands. I uttered a loud and somewhat forcible exclamation, for the first upon which my eyes fell were addressed to myself in Annie's handwriting, and the remainder were addressed to her in mine—and none of the seals were broken.

I was gazing at them in stupid amazement, but my exclamation had startled Annie, and she again stood beside me.

"Have you found it?" said she; and then she saw what it was that I had found, and put out her hand for them, saying, in a trembling, troubled sort of voice, and turning very pale: "Oh, Tom, give them to me! You have no right to them now!"

"I'd like to know why," said I. "When I bought this old thing I bought all that was in it. But who would have thought that of Aunt Jeffrey?"

"Oh, Tom," said she again, "do give me my letters!"

"There are yours," said I; "but these others are addressed to me. Let's sit down and read them."

And so we did; for there was evidently no will among those papers.

I was satisfied with the result of my search, however; for after Marion had tried to explain to me in the morning the reason of her odd retreat on John's departure, I said to her:

"Tell John Atkins that he is mistaken about my not liking him; and you may have his mother's old secretary as a part of your wedding portion. Annie and I wouldn't have it in our house for any money."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The recently invented "steam man" continues to excite the attention of the curious, not only in Newark, but also in far-distant places. This wonderful creature is seven feet nine inches in height, and weighs five hundred pounds. Steam is generated in his body, and by a complicated mechanism he steps along quite naturally, walks or runs as he is bid, goes in any direction, and at almost any speed, and, without the least objection, draws after him heavy burdens. This giant has been humorously christened "Daniel Lambert;" and is actually provided with human habiliments; not exactly to keep him warm—but to complete the likeness. Mr. Deddrick the inventor, has been besieged by calls and letters from the curious. A creature of such wonderful power, able to ascend or descend all grades, will certainly become popular, unless those are right who regard the whole thing as a hoax, and incline to make all possible fun about it. One gentleman proposed that "Daniel" be allowed "to walk to Chicago," as the sensation produced would eclipse Weston's in his pedestrian trip. Some letters received are from ladies who pretend to be in search of husbands. And one gentleman wants a lady made to order; but the inventor is doubtful whether a woman would be a success, as his creatures do not talk. The "first (steam) man" cost about two thousand dollars; but duplicates can probably be constructed at about one-sixth that expense. And it is also believed that horses can be made on similar principles, which will do the work of a dozen ordinary horses. Truly this is an age of wonders!

In a recent number of the American Gaslight Journal some simple facts are given, together with practical advice concerning the management of gas, which, if followed, might save much annoyance and useless expense. Without attempting to give even the substance of the article in a short paragraph, one or two hints may be serviceable to consumers who complain of deficient light and excessive gas bills. Light derived from gas is remarkably reduced by improperly constructed burners. The most important requisites for good burners are, that the orifices where the gas issues should be perfectly regular in shape, and of a proper size to permit it to issue with a very low pressure. And these conditions apply to every kind of burner. If the orifices are too small, a high pressure is required to expel the gas, and the light is diminished just in proportion to the increased pressure. It is a mistake to suppose that the amount of light obtained will be in proportion to the quantity of gas issuing from a burner. There is a particular point in the consumption of any class of burner where the maximum of light is derived, and any deviation from this entails loss. A five-feet bat-wing or fish-tail burner will give a maximum of light in proportion to the gas consumed, compared with any less-sized burner, and it will be found in practice the larger-sized burners are the most economical, the large sizes giving as high as 200 to 300 per cent. advantage in light as compared with the smallest sizes. Consequently, it is more economical to have one good large gaslight than several small ones. Although the ornamental effect of globes and glasses is pleasant, still they are detrimental to the diffusion of the light of gas. A clear glass globe obstructs about 12 per cent.; a clear globe engraved with flowers about 24 per cent.; a globe ground all over about 40 per cent.; an opal globe about 60 per cent. Hence is apparent the folly of using elaborately engraved and ground globes or shades where it is desirable to economize.

Almost every day accidents occur from falling or slipping upon the ice. It is generally supposed that rubber over-shoes are a safeguard against slipping. But when the ice is wet many have found rubbers to prove more treacherous than ordinary leather boots. There is a kind of rubber cloth shoe, with rough soles, which is far more protective than the ordinary make. It is light and warm without giving that unpleasant dampness to the foot which rubbers usually do. These are chiefly used by gentlemen, but are so much lighter than the "Arctic" boot that it seems strange they are not also made for ladies. The suggestion has been made that some ingenious person should invent a cheap and convenient attachment, made of rough cloth or carpeting, to be worn with boots or shoes in slippery weather. A mere sole would be sufficient, nor is it necessary that this should extend the whole length of the boot. Some simple contrivance would doubtless save many broken bones.

The ice crop this year will be an unusually good one, the weather having been very favorable. The Knickerbocker Ice Company is the largest in the business in the United States. There are between seven and eight hundred men in its employ, filling its houses in Ulster County alone. It has located houses in nearly every available place on the Hudson River, which are capable of storing not less than 402,000 tons. Over two thousand and five hundred laborers, and more than three hundred horses, are employed in storing the ice. Many other companies reap their harvest from the Hudson and Rondout Creek, making an aggregate of something like 721,000 tons of ice which is packed away for summer use. New ice-houses are in process of erection. About fifty per cent. of the ice is wasted between the storing and the delivery to customers.

A novel contrivance has been invented by a gentleman of Michigan for heating, cooling, or ventilating buildings, as may be desired. It consists of an arrangement that can be attached to any ordinary heater, the effect being to force a continuous volume of fresh air up between the hot cylinder and casing, which, becoming heated in its passage, warms an apartment of almost any size in an incredibly short time. The inventor also claims that by means of his appliance he can heat a dwelling throughout with one-eighth the quantity of fuel that is ordinarily consumed. When heated air is not required, the same mechanism will introduce a circulating stream of cold air, thus both cooling and ventilating the apartment.

The town of Hinsdale, New Hampshire, recently indulged itself in a grand sleigh-ride. A neighboring town got up a sleighing-party of fifty couples, and challenged Hinsdale to surpass it—number, weight, and pretty ladies being the special points to be considered. Hinsdale responded with one hundred and thirty-four couples, drawn by one hundred and fifteen horses, in sixty-nine single sleighs, seventeen double, and three four-in-hands, making a procession a mile long, headed by their brass band. The palm was also awarded to Hinsdale for the heaviest man and the prettiest woman.

How very unquiet must be the slumbers of the veritable author of "Rock me to sleep, mother"—whoever he or she may be! Some new aspirant for the glory of authorship is rising up every now and then. The latest appears to be one Edward Young, of Lexington, Georgia. At least "An Old Compositor" declares that he himself set the poem, from Young's manuscript, in 1859; and that it originally appeared in The Southern Field and Fireside, printed in Augusta, Georgia. Mr. Young—so states the "Old Compositor," who seems to ignore the claims of both Mr. Ball and Mrs. Akers—was a blacksmith or carriage-smith of eccentric and wayward character, but the author of some very exquisite and plaintive melodies, and a frequent contributor to the journals of the day.

The poor peasants of Finland are suffering fearfully from the famine which is now raging there. They think themselves fortunate if they can obtain loaves composed of equal portions of saw-dust, moss, and a coarse rye-flour. Many have obtained the Emperor's permission to emigrate.

There has recently been on exhibition in Boston, at Williams & Everett's, an exquisite little drawing, which at first appears to be a fine engraving. It represents the Village Rat-catcher and his dogs; and though very perfect as a work of art, it is of peculiar interest as being the master-piece of a poor, untaught, crippled silk-weaver, who drew and painted it with his mouth alone, unassisted, and without instruction. Incredible as this may seem there is no doubt of the fact. John Carter (for that is the artist's name) was the son of a common laborer in England. In early life he fell from a tree forty feet in height, which accident entirely deprived him of the use of his limbs, every part of the body being paralyzed excepting his head and neck. In this condition the idea occurred to him of amusing himself by drawing with his mouth; and after long-continued efforts he succeeded. His wife or sister assisted him only by filling the brush from the pallet with India ink, and placing it between his lips. He continued to twirl it rapidly round so as to bring it to a fine point for use. He first outlined or sketched his composition, and then filled in and shaded it after the manner of a line engraving. His work was performed resting upon his couch, his paper being fastened to a desk, which was placed almost perpendicularly before, and in close proximity to, his face. With his head inclined toward the right side, and with his hair pencil between his teeth, he produced by the means of the motion of his neck, assisted by his lips and tongue, the most beautifully-turned strokes, rivaling in fact the greatest proficients in the art of drawing.

An exchange publishes—for gratuitous distribution—some valuable rules, which gentlemen may find convenient for reference. Ladies are not expected to adhere to them strictly; but all others in the habit of visiting printing establishments would do well to "pocket this scrap:"

1. Enter softly.
2. Sit down quietly.
3. Subscribe for the paper.
4. Don't touch the poker.
5. Say nothing interesting.
6. Engage in no controversy.
7. Don't smoke.
8. Keep six feet from the table.'
9. Don't talk to the workmen.
10. Hands off the papers.
11. Eyes off the manuscript.
12. Let the "devil" alone.

The following story is good—as a story merely; but a little moral may be drawn from it which may be useful to Sabbath-school Superintendents and teachers:

A boy of more natural brightness than some who are better educated was asked,

"Where do you go to Sunday-school, Jimmy?"

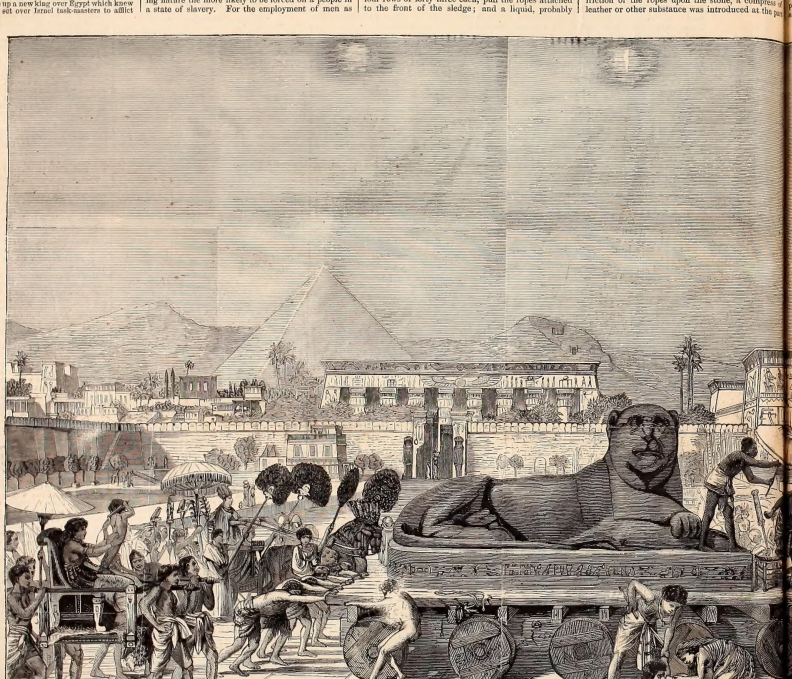
"Why, marm, I go to Baptisses, and Methodisses, and the Presbyteriums, but I've been trying the 'Piscopals for two or three weeks."

"You don't seem to belong any where, then, Jimmy?"

"Why, yes marm, don't you see? I belongs to 'em all, exceptin' the 'Piscopals, but I'm going to jine them, too, now."

"Well, Jimmy, what's your idea in going to so many?"

"Why, you see, I get's a little of what's going on at 'em all, marm. I gits liberries, and hymn-books, and all that: and when they have picnics I goes to every one of 'em."



"ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

ONE of the most remarkable pictures at the last exhibition of the English Royal Academy of Arts was that of E. J. POYNTER, which we copy on this page of the Weekly. High praise was awarded to it, not only as a thoroughly artistic work, but as the most complete illustration hitherto afforded by any painter of a principle of modern art which opens up sources of interest unthought of by the "Old Masters." That principle is the union of archæology with art: meaning by this the representation of an historical event not conventionally, but as truthfully as possible, with the aid of the knowledge amassed by modern critical research, by travel, museums, or otherwise.

The subject chosen—one of the most interesting episodes of the Old Testament narrative—illustrates the following text:

"Now there arose up a new king over Egypt which knew not Joseph, and he set over Israel task-masters to afflict them with burdens. And the Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigor. All their service wherein they made them serve was with rigor."—Exodus i. 8, 14.

The picture represents the sufferings of the Israelites under King THOTHMES III. of the eighteenth dynasty. This great king and conqueror is supposed by some writers to be the PHARAOH in whose reign the exodus took place, and who was, at all events, one of their chief oppressors. The narrative in the book of Exodus, from which the quotation above is given, informs us further that the Egyptians made the lives of the children of Israel "bitter with hard bondage in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field;" and also that the Hebrews "built for PHARAOH treasure cities, Pithom and Raamses." There is, therefore, abundant authority for supposing that they were condemned to the kind of labor represented in the picture—from its degrading nature the more likely to be forced on a people in a state of slavery. For the employment of men as beasts of draught in the manner represented there is likewise ample authority. Sir GARDNER WILKINSON, from whose researches alone might be adduced facts in confirmation of a very great deal that is introduced into the picture, states that the ancient Egyptians transported the vast blocks of stone and colossal statues, which they so freely used in their grandiose architecture, from the quarries to the places where they were to be set up, often in flat-bottomed boats on canals made for the purpose; but sometimes the stones and statues were drawn on sledges, perhaps some hundreds of miles, by oxen or by human labor. There are extant ancient Egyptian paintings depicting the last mode of transport. One of these illustrates a manner of conveying colossal figures very similar to that conceived by Mr. POYNTER. The figure, in this instance, is a seated, human-shaped colossus. "One hundred and seventy-two men, in four rows of forty-three each, pull the ropes attached to the front of the sledge; and a liquid, probably grease, is poured from a vase by a person standing on the pedestal of the statue, in order to facilitate its progress as it slides over the ground, which was probably covered by a bed of planks, though they are not indicated in the painting. Some of the persons employed in this laborious duty appear to be Egyptians, the others are foreign slaves, who are clad in the costume of their country. Below are persons carrying vases of the liquid, or perhaps water, for the use of the workmen, and some implements connected with the transport of the statue, followed by task-masters with their wands of office. On the knee of the figure stands a man who claps his hands to the measured cadence of a song to mark the time and insure the simultaneous draught. The statue was bound to the sledge by ropes, which were tightened by means of pegs inserted between them and twisted round until completely braced; and to prevent injury from the friction of the ropes upon the stone, a compress of leather or other substance was introduced at the part

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.—[By

RAOH, or lady of rank, also accompanies the procession in a palanquin borne on the shoulders of four servants. She holds on her knees a little boy, and—by a happily-conceived touch of nature which seems to bring the strange, far-off scene down almost to our own day—she is represented as laughing delightedly at his precocious flourishing of a toy-whip over the shoulders of one of the servants in imitation of the cruelty of the task-masters. Toward the right of the picture is a cart or truck, drawn by three men, which is laden with spare cables, levers, and other implements that might be required in the event of a break-down on the road. Perched on the top of the coils is a boy of brutal visage (suggestively enough) putting a new lash to his whip. By-the-way, in the Assyrian sculptures in the British Museum, which represent the removal of the colossal bulls, carts of this kind holding coils of rope are shown. Hebrew women carrying watering-pots on their heads accompany the toiling slaves. One of them in giving drink to a fainting wretch who has fallen out from his gang, while a task-master stoops over him to see whether more work can be forced out of him. In the corner to the right is a group of women dancing and playing on musical instruments, celebrating with songs and cymbals the arrival of the lion; and among them is a negro buffoon jeering at the Israelites, and dancing with mocking antics. The paved road takes a curve to the propylon of the temple, and under the lofty portal may be seen another lion which has almost arrived at its destination. Between the immediate fore-ground and the straight wall that forms the inclosure of another temple are two tanks, separated by a causeway; these are the sacred lakes across which the funeral processions were ferried, as symbolizing the passage of the dead from this world to the next. Over the wall just mentioned rises, in the middle distance to the left, the town, with its palaces, its villas, its terraced gardens; and the view beyond is bounded, as already intimated, incidentally, by a pyramid and such arid, tomb-pierced rocks as border the Nile through so much of its vast length. We have only to add, by way of description, that fidelity to local color appears as conspicuously in the general effect incident to the climate as in the countless details of the picture. The too literally blinding, ophthalmia-engendering sunlight of Egypt is indicated by the calcined aspect of almost every thing on which falls the glaring rays, and by the sharp definition of the dark-cast shadows, a notable instance occurring in the shadow projected from the obelisk on to the sloping face of the propylon tower.

This picture—at once a monument of research, a triumph of invention, an example of intelligent composition of complex materials, and an achievement of artistic knowledge and skill, must be regarded as one of the most remarkable works of art of our time.

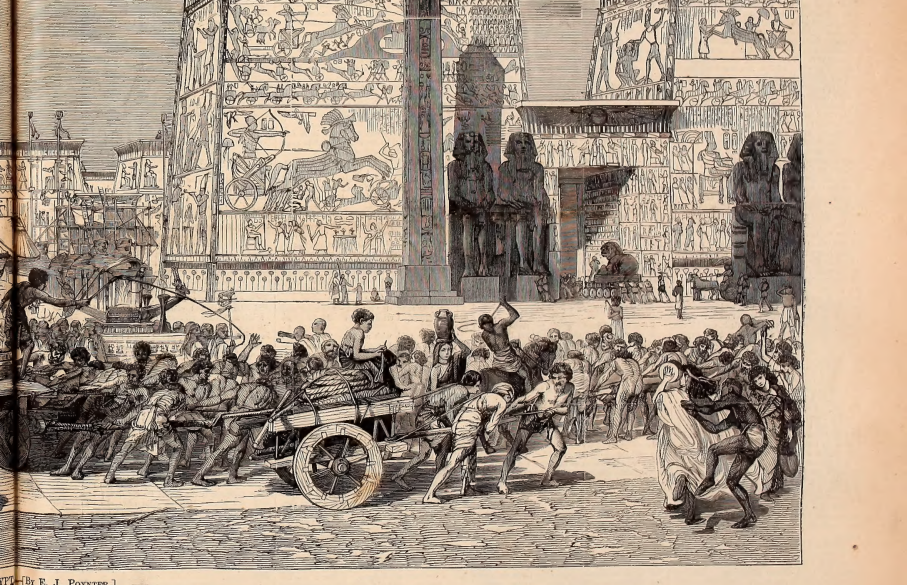
To verify the laborious accuracy with which this picture has been wrought out, one needs but to refer for character to WILKINSON'S "Ancient Egyptians," with its 500 illustrations from monuments; and for scenery, unchanged for centuries, to BARTLETT'S "Nile Notes," CURTIS'S "Howadji," and PRIME'S "Boat Life."

MY NEIGHBOR NELLY.

By MISS THACKERAY.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART II.



THE NEWS soon became known to every body on the Green, and great surprise was excited by it. Every body, I think, spoke to me on the subject. They said, "If it had been the other sister!" Even Lady Denzil went so far as to say this, when, after having called at the Admiral's to offer her congratulations, she came in to see me. "I do not pretend that I like the marriage," she said, with a little solemnity. "There were claims upon him nearer home. It is not every man that is at liberty to choose for himself; but if it had been the little one I could have understood it." I hope nobody spoke like this to Nelly; she kept up a great deal too well to satisfy there they touched the statue." It was customary for a band of soldiers to attend, perhaps for the purpose of overawing the slaves and compelling obedience in their odious task.

In regard to the locality indicated, we have to bear in mind that the Hebrews inhabited the eastern side of the Delta. Consequently, it may readily be imagined that they were employed by Thothmes III. in the completion by him of the temple of the sun at On (Heliopolis) in the Delta, the foundations of which had been laid some centuries before by Osirtasen, first king of the twelfth dynasty. The obelisk of Osirtasen, with his name and titles engraved thereon, is still standing in a garden a few miles from Cairo after a lapse of nearly 4000 years, and is almost all that remains of the famous temple described by Strabo. This temple the painter has depicted, as restored, in accordance with the general plan of the principal Egyptian temples as proved by the remains at Thebes and elsewhere, and the obelisk in the picture is an accurate delineation of the ancient monolith of Osirtasen. The extreme distance faintly seen through the haze of light does not, however, represent the country in the neighborhood of Heliopolis; but is evidently meant to convey an impression of the general character of the scenery of the Nile valley, with its pyramids and temples, and rocky mountains honey-combed with tombs.

The first great propylon of the temple consists, as we see, of a gateway and two great flanking towers, in front of which are four colossal sitting statues of the king in black syenite, and the obelisk already mentioned, the fellow to which, though not included in the picture, should be assumed as standing on the corresponding side of the seated figures. The walls of the massive towers are covered (according, of course, to common precedent in Egyptian temples of all ages) with paintings; the two principal subjects representing the victories of Thothmes. The lower one shows the king symbolically as a colossal hero putting single-handed his enemies to flight, and driving them to take refuge in a walled city. In the upper one he is shown with his phalanxes of chariots and horsemen. In the smaller paintings he is seen receiving tribute, disposing of the prisoners who are brought bound before him, offering prayers and sacrifices to the gods. The second propylon is still in course of completion and is partly covered with scaffolding, on which artists are at work finishing the paintings. Here in figures of gigantic size the king is making adorations and offerings to the gods. Lining the course or dromos which connects the propylae is a double row of colossal lions in red granite.

One of these colossi (the last we may suppose to be wanting to complete the avenue) appears here conspicuously in the fore-ground. Placed on a ponderous wheeled platform, it is drawn by a long string of Hebrew slaves, who are urged on by the pitiless lash of the task-masters, the principal and most conspicuous slave-driver having, forsooth (to make his tyranny more insufferable by contrast), his own precious person protected from the sun by an Ethiopian umbrella-bearer. Pharaoh himself accompanies it in his chariot, preceded and followed by a long procession of the officers of his court. At each side of him walk the fan-bearers, carrying the state flabella, which not only served to cool the air when waved before him, but were the insignia of his rank. He is dressed in the thin white muslin with which Egyptians of rank are always represented as being draped, and wears on his head a mitre studded with gold rings. An umbrella embroidered with his names is held over his head, and behind walk officers carrying emblems of royalty and figures of the gods on poles decorated with fluttering streamers. Before him goes the sacred ark of Ea, the great sun-god, borne on the shoulders of twelve priests with shaven heads. Other priests walk in front offering incense and bowing before it; while behind it two priests carry the names and titles of the king. A princess, daughter of Phame. She was in the very centre of all the flutter that such an event makes in a small society like ours, and she knew people were watching her; but she never betrayed herself. She had lost her color somehow every body remarked that; and the proud little girl got up a succession of maladies, and said she had influenza and indigestion, and I know not what, that nobody might suspect any other cause. Sometimes I might her for one instant off her guard, but it was nothing that happened very rarely. Two or three times I met her going off by herself for a long walk, and she would not have my company when I offered to go with her. "I walk so fast," she said, "and I think it is too far for you." Once I even saw her in the spot to which all our walks tended—the Dingle, which was our favorite haunt. It was a glorious autumn, and the fine weather lasted long—much longer than usual. Up to the middle of November there were still masses of gorgeous foliage on the trees, and the sky was as blue—not as Italy, for Italy is soft and languorous and melting—but as an English sky without clouds, full of sunshine, yet clear, with a premonitory touch of frost, can be. The trees in the Dingle are no common trees; they are giant beeches, big-boled, heavily-clothed giants, and redden and crisp and hold their own until the latest moment: and that mount up upon heights, and descend into hollows, and opened up here and there into gleams of the far plain around, growing misty in the distance as if it were sea. The great point in the landscape is a royal castle, the noblest dwelling-place I ever saw. We who live so near are learned in the different points of view; we know where to catch it shining like a fairy stronghold in the white hazy country, or stretching out in gray profile upon its height, or setting itself—here the great donjon, there a flanking tower—in frames of leafy branches. I had left my little carriage and my stout old pony on the road, and had wandered up alone to have my last peep before winter set in, when suddenly I saw Nelly before me. She was walking up and down on the soft yielding moss, carpeted with beech-mast and pine-needles; then she would stop and gaze blankly at the view—at the great plain whitening off to the horizon, and the castle rising in the midst. I knew what the view was, but I saw also that she did not see it. Her face was all drawn together, small and shrunken up. There were deep shadowy lines round her eyes; and as for the eyes themselves, it was them and not Nelly that I saw. They were dilated, almost exaggerated, unlike any thing I ever saw before. She had come out here to be alone, poor child! I crept away as best I could through the brown crackling ferns. If she heard any thing, probably she thought it was some woodland creature that could not spy upon her. But I don't believe she heard any thing, or saw any thing; and I was no spy upon her, dear heart!

[By E. J. Poynter.]

The nearest we ever came to conversation on the subject was once when I was telling her about a girl I once knew, whose story had been a very sad one. She had pledged her heart and her life to a foolish young fellow, who was very fond of her, and then was very fond of somebody else; and would have been fond of her again, periodically, to any number of times. She had borne it as long as she could, and then she had broken down; and it had been a relief to her, poor girl, to come and cry her heart out to me.

"It has never been my way, Nelly," I said; "but it seems to ease the heart when it can speak. I don't think that I could have spoken to any one, had it been me."

"And as for me," cried Nelly, "if I should ever be like that—and it is any one, even you, were so much as to look at me as if you knew, I think I should die!"

This was before the lamp was lighted; and in the dark I think she put up a hand to wipe off something from her eyelash. But you may be sure I took care not to look. I tried to put all speculation out of my eyes whenever I looked at her afterward. My poor Nelly! in the very extravagance of her pride was there not an appeal, and piteous throwing of herself upon my forbearance? I thought there was, and it went to my heart.

The next thing, of course, was that Llewellyn was coming to see his betrothed. He was to come by Christmas, not being able to leave his ship before. And then it was to be settled when the marriage should take place. I confess that I listened to all this with a very bad grace. Any reference to the marriage put me out of temper. He wrote to her regularly and very often, and Martha used to read his letters complacently before us all, and communicate little bits out of them, and spend half her morning writing her replies. But she was not a ready writer, and it really was hard work to her, and improved her education—at least, in the mechanical matters of writing and spelling. But I wonder what sort of rubbish it was she wrote to him, and what he thought of it. Was it possible he could suppose it was my Nelly who wrote to him all those commonplaces? or, was the mistake on my part, not on his? As time went on I came to think more and more, that the latter was the case. We had been deceived, Nelly and I. And Martha and Llewellyn were two lovers worthy of each other. I fear I was not very charitable to him in my thoughts.

But I could not help being very serious the day of his arrival. It was a bleak wintry day, Christmas-eve, but not what people call "Christmas weather." It rarely is Christmas weather at Christmas. The sky hung low and leaden over our bare trees, and of course there was no sign of snow, not even the lowest vestige of crape-bells, to enliven the stillness. I was not pleased at home. We had been informed what time Captain Llewellyn was to come by, and my mind was in such a disturbed state that I kept coming and going all day long, on one errand or another, lingering about the road. I don't myself know what I meant by it; nor could I have explained it to any body. Sometimes I think that I should meet him, I would speak, and make sure. Sometimes I fancied that I could read in his face, at the first look, what it was about. But, any how, I did not meet him. I thought all the trains were in which I went to the Admiral's in the afternoon, at five o'clock—and all the trains that could arrive before dinner, for we were two miles from the station. Martha and her father were in the drawing-room when I returned. There was a bright fire, but the candles were not lighted; I suppose, out of reluctance to shut up the shutters and close all the windows before the visitor came. Martha was sitting by the fire looking very gay and bright, and a little excited. She and Nelly had been to the end of the church helping with the decorations, and that she was to stay at the house for dinner, as there was a Christmas-tree for the infant class there to be got ready. "I dare say she thought we should not want her this first evening," Martha said, with a little laugh; and was not quite sweetness and unconsciousness of my heart that I could have shaken her; which was nonsense, for, of course, she had a right to the society of her betrothed. While we were sitting chatting over the fire, all at once there came a sound of wheels, and the lights even from the little inn at Dingledell station came rattling up. Martha gave a little cry and ran to the drawing-room door. I knew I should have gone away, but I did not. I stood behind in the ruddy gloom, and saw her rush into Llewellyn's arms. And he kissed her. And the next moment they were back in the room beside us, she chatting about his journey, and bobbing up in his face, and showing her pleasure and delight, as it was quite natural she should do. It seemed to me that he did not make very much reply to her; the room was dark, and the arrival was sudden, and there was a certain confusion about every thing. The Admiral came forward, and shook hands with him, and so did I; and instead of looking as if he wished us a hundred miles off, Llewellyn kept peering into the corners, as if he wanted another greeting. Then he came to the fire, and stood before it, making the room all the darker with his shadow; and after we had all sat down I felt that he felt he could on his journey, there did not seem very much to say.

"I don't know how the others felt, but I say my heart began to beat violently. Martha was in an unnatural state of excitement. She threw a great many words everywhere in the fire for him. "Dear Ellis, sit down," she said, laying her hand softly on his arm. The touch seemed to wake him out of a kind of reverie. He took her hand, and held it for a moment, and then let it fall.

"You are far too kind," he said, "to take so much trouble for me. A thousand thanks. Where is—your sister? She knew I was to come by this train."

"No, I don't think Sister knew," said Martha; "that was my little secret. I would not tell them what day you were coming. We are busy helping with the church decorations. She will see you to-morrow, you know. I wish they would bring the lamps, will you ring?" And Nelly has gone away. Wait a minute, Ellis dear, and I will run and make them bring it immediately. It will warm you better than any thing else. I'm sha'n't be a moment gone."

The moment she had left us poor Llewellyn turned to me, notwithstanding the ruddy fire. light I could see he was quite haggard with the cruel suspicions that must have flashed upon him.

"Is Mulgrave?" he cried, hurried, holding out his hands. "for God's sake, tell me, what does this mean?"

"It means that you have come to see your betrothed, Captain Llewellyn," said I; "she has gone out of the room. You made your choice, and I hope you did not expect to have both the sisters. Martha said to receive you, as was right and natural. You could not expect the same from Nelly. She thought neither of you would want a third to-night."

I was so angry that I said all this in a breath. I know I ought to be ashamed of myself, but I did it; I don't think, however, that he heard half. He covered his face with his hands, and gave a groan, which seemed to me to echo all through the house; and I had to add on to what I was saying. "Oh, for Heaven's sake, restrain yourself!" I cried, without even taking breath, "now it is too late!"

And then Martha came in, excited and joyous, and dancing with high spirits. I could have groaned too, and hid my face from the light, as he did, poor fellow; but she went up to him, and he drew down his head, and said, "I am here, Ellie, you needn't cover your eyes." He spoke in answer her with a compliment or a sally, did not answer her speech at all; and Martha looked at me where I was standing by the side of the fire. I knew she thought I must be mad, because I had not come down this month and subdued his joy —and what could I do?—I went away. I could be of no use to him, poor fellow! He must face it as he best could. I went away, and as soon as I got safely into my own house sat down and cried. Not that crying would do any good, but I was in a very young grow wrong, and every body is on the way to ruin, and you see how it is, and know how to mend it, and yet can not, there not, not forth a hand, what can any one do but sit down and cry?

But I could not rest in my quiet, comfortable, lonely house, and know that those poor young hearts were being wrung, and keep quiet and take no notice. I put my cap on my head, I put on my warm cloak and hood, and went across the Green, though it was wet and slippery, to the school-room, where I knew I should be. She was in the midst of a heap of toys and paper flies and little tapers, dressing up the Christmas-tree. There were three or four girls with her, and Nelly was the busiest of all. Her little hands were pricked and scratched with the points of the holly, but she had pushed the little fairy fit-tree on which she was working. Poor child, I wish it had been her hands only that were wounded. Martha was sitting by the fire, and had taken her off, either because she found the pain of the pricks good fun her, or because she saw embarrassment in my face. She had her work in gloves, she said, carelessly, "and it don't hurt so much when you are used to it." When I saw her I could see that the little fingers of Martha were tied to the stake, with arrows flying at them from all quarters. I am sure Mr. Sebastian was killed in the same way—a martyr to Martha's love.

"I wish you would come with me, Nelly," said I; "you know Christmas-eve is never very merry to me, and I thought you said you shall have something with your tea."

"I am going to the country," said Nelly. She did not even look at me, and she spoke very quick, with a kind of catch in her breath. "I promised—and there is a great deal to do. I am very busy, and I am sorry, it is best to try and forget it is Christmas. If I were to go with you, you would talk to me, and that would make you feel worse than ever."

"I would not talk—you may trust me, Nelly," I said, quietly. But my excitement I was for one minute off my guard.

She gave me one look, and then turned away, her face crimsoning over. Martha looked up from her little soft fingers. "Talking does not matter to me," she said, in her careless way. "Her smile was somewhat forced, and full of consternation. She would not yield, not if she had been cut in little pieces. Her heart was being torn out of her breast, and she was ready to look her executioners in the face, and cheer them on.

I don't know how they all got through that evening. Nelly, I know, went home late, and went to her own room at once, as being tired. It was past Llewellyn's usual hour to be retired to bed. I could not get him out of my mind, and thought and thought over it, till I could scarcely rest. Was he to be left to manage to emancipate himself and tell the truth? or would the dreadful coil of circumstances in which he had got himself involved be too much for his spirit? I asked myself this question till it made me sick and faint. How was he to turn upon the girl who was loving him, and tell her that he never had confident, and say that he had never cared for her, and never sought her? There are men who would have the nerve to do this. Poor, poor, simple, tender-hearted sailor—who would not hurt a fly, and who was showing no preparation for the fate that was coming on him—I could not hope that he would be so brave.

I saw he was in church next morning at church that he had not been brave. He was seated by Martha's side, looking pale, and haggard, and ashamed, and she in all her lovely and demonstrative happiness. Nelly was at the other end of the pew, under her father's shadow.

I don't know what she had been doing, but after it was excitement, or in her pride she had had recourse to artificial aids. She had received her color, as if by stealth, and was afraid that I did not pay so much attention to the service as I ought to have done. My whole thoughts were bent upon Llewellyn, and upon where there were two people quite serene and comfortable, and two in the depths of misery and despair. There were moments when I felt as if I could have got up in church and protested against it in the sight of God. One feels as if one could do that; but one keeps still, and only frets and fumes.

In the afternoon Llewellyn came to see me. He would have done it any how, I feel sure, for he had a good heart. But there was a stronger reason still that Christmas-day. He did not say much to me when he came. He walked about my drawing-room, and looked at all the ornaments on the tables, and opened the books, and examined my Christmas presents. Then he came and sat down beside me before the fire. He tried to talk, and then he broke off, and leaned his face between his hands. It was again a gray, dark, sunless day; and it was all the darker in my room because of the veranda over the windows, which made it so pleasant in summer. I could see his profile darkly before me as he made an attempt at conversation, not looking at me, but staring into the fire; and then, all at once, his shoulders went up, and his face disappeared in the shadow of his hands. He stood into the fire, still under that shelter; but he felt himself safe from my inspection, poor fellow.

I ought to beg your pardon," he said, suddenly controlling all his attention upon the glowing embers, "for speaking as I did—last night—"

"There was nothing to pardon," said I. And then we came to an embarrassed pause, for I did not know which was best—to speak, or to be silent.

"I know I was very abrupt," he said. "I was rude. I hope you will forgive me. It was the surprise. And then he gave vent to something between a cry and a groan. "What is to become of us all, good God!" he muttered. It was all I could do to hear him, and the exclamation did not sound to me profane.

"Captain Llewellyn," I said, "I don't know whether I ought to say any thing, or whether I should hold my tongue. I understand it all; and I feel for you with all my heart."

"It doesn't matter," he said. "it doesn't matter. Feeling is of no use. But there is one thing you could tell me. She—you know—I can't call her by any other name—she loves you by her name:—Just tell me what you can, and I'll try and bear it. Did she mind? Does she think me—I could forgive her any thing, no matter what you one thinks? If you are sure it did not hurt her, I—don't mind."

"No," said I; but I don't think he got any comfort from my tone. "You may be sure it will not hurt her," I went on, summoning up my force, as I felt that the sort of girl to let it hurt her." I spoke indignantly, for I did not know what was coming. He seized my hand, you boy, and thing I did I could have extricated; and then he broke down, as a man does when he has come to the last point of wretchedness. "You could not have suffered from him. "God bless her!" he cried.

I was wound up to such a pitch that I could see it still. I got up and grasped his shoulder. In my excitement I did not know what I was doing.

"Are you going to bear it?" I said. "Do you mean to let it go on? It is a lie; and are you going to set it up for the truth? Oh, Captain Llewellyn! is it possible that you mean to let it go on?"

Then he gave me one sorrowful look, and shook his head. "I have accepted it," he said. "It is too late. You said so last night."

I knew I had said it; but things somehow looked different now. "I would speak to Martha herself," said I. And I saw he shuddered at her name. "I will speak to her father."

The Admiral is sensible and kind. He will know what to do."

"He will think I mean to insult them," said Llewellyn, shaking his head. "I have done harm enough. How was I to know? But never mind—never do that. It is my own doing, and I must bear it." Then he rose up suddenly, and turned to me with a wan kind of smile. "I can not afford to expose myself with rule," he said. "Good-by, and thanks. I don't feel as if I cared much now what happened. The only thing is, I can't stay here."

"But you must stay a week—you must stay over Christmas," I cried, as he stood holding my hand.

"Yes," he said, with a sigh. "I must get through to-night. If you'd keep her out of the way, Mrs. Mulgrave, I would be much kinder thing you could do. I can't look at her. I kills me. But I'll be summoned by telegram to-morrow," he added, with a kind of despairing satisfaction. "I wrote this morning." And then he shook hands with me hurriedly, and went away.

I had very little trouble to keep Nelly—poor Nelly!—out of his way. She made me go up with her to the church (I always attend them on Christmas), to show me the presents she had got, and the things she had prepared for her pensioners in the parish. She made a great part of the village, we people who lived on the Green, said, I fear, rather spoiled it. There were things for the bachelor girls, and for the old women, which were to be bestowed next day when they all came to the school-room for the Christmas-tree. She never mentioned Llewellyn to me, nor Martha, nor referred to the domestic event which, in other circumstances, would have occupied her mind above all others. I wonder if did not occur to her that to speak of, and show an interest in, her sister's engagement was a quite necessary part of her own self-defense. Either it was too much, and she could not, or it did not enter into her mind. Any how, she never referred to it at least to me. She never so much as mentioned his name. They never looked at each other, nor addressed any remark to each other, when they were busy and movement of one was visible to the other. Nelly kept me up stairs until it was time for me to go home. She came running out with me, with her red cloak round her, when the Admiral marched to the gate to see me home, as he made a point of doing, and she stood at the gate, in the foggy, wintry darkness, to wait for him until he came back from my door. And I waited on my own threshold, and saw them passing back —Nelly, poor child, clinging fast to her father's arm. My heart ached; and yet not so much even for her as for the other. What was he doing indoors, left alone with the girl he was engaged to and did not love?

Next morning, to the astonishment and dismay of every body but myself, Captain Llewellyn was summoned back to his ship by telegraph. Martha was more excited about it than I should have supposed possible. It was so hard upon poor dear Ellis, she said, before they had been able to arrange any thing, or even to talk of any thing. She had not the slightest doubt of him. His wretched looks, and his hesitation and coldness, had taught nothing to Martha. If she was, perhaps, disappointed at first by his want of ardor, the disappointment had soon passed. It was his way; he was not the sort of man to make a fuss. By this means she quite accounted for it to herself. For my own part, I can not say that I was satisfied with his conduct. If he had put a stop to it boldly—if he had said at once it was all a mistake—that whatever had come of it, he could have supported and sympathized with him; but it made an end of Captain Llewellyn, as a man, in my estimation, when he ran away as he did. I was vexed, and I was sorry; and yet I can not say I was surprised.

He wrote afterward to say it was important business, and that he had no hope of being able to come back. And then he wrote that he had been transferred to another ship just put into commission, and had to sail at once. He could not even come to wish his betrothed good-by. He assured her it could not be for long, as their orders were only for the Mediterranean; but it was a curious reversal of all their former ideas. "He must retire," Martha said, when she had told me this news with tears. "The idea of a man with a good property of his own being offered about like this! Papa says things like these happen every his days; he never heard of any thing so arbitrary. After all he said about our marriage taking place first, to think that he shall have to go away now, without a moment to say good-by!"

And she cried and dried her eyes, while I sat by and myself a conspirator, and was very uncomfortable. Nelly was present too. She sat working in the window, and her head bowed very low, and was, and took no part in the conversation. Perhaps it was a relief; perhaps—and this was what I should myself have preferred—it been better to have got it over at once. Any how, at this present juncture, she sat apart, and took no active notice of what we said.

"And Nelly never says a word," sobbed Martha. "She has no sympathy. I think she hates poor Ellis now. She scarcely looked at him when he was here, and she won't say she is sorry now."

"When every body is sorry, what does it matter if I say it or not?" said Nelly, casting one rapid glance from her work. She never was so fond of her work before. Now, she was working all at once a model girl: she never was idle for a moment; one kind of occupation or another was continually in her hands. Now it was her knitting, while Martha, dissipated and vexed, cried and folded up her letter. I don't know whether she felt the force of the look cast by Nelly's mind. Sometimes I thought so. When the time approached which Llewellyn had indicated as the probable period of his return, Martha proposed that she should go on a visit to her godmother, in Devonshire. It was spring then, and she had a notion that there were primroses and cowslips there. The only one that opposed it was Martha. "It will look so unkind to dear Ellis," she said; "if he can possibly get home he will not meet him. At Christmas you were out all the time. And if he dislikes him, Mrs. Mulgrave, she ought to try to get on with her. Don't you think so? It is unkind to go away."

"She does not dislike him," said I. "But she wants a change, my dear." And so we all said. The Admiral, good man, did not understand it at all. He saw that something was wrong, but he was depending on the little one to put it right, he said to me. "I hoped she would have taken you into her confidence. I can't tell what is wrong with her part."

"She wants a change," said I. "She has never said any thing to me."

And so it was; she had never said a word to me. I might have betrayed Llewellyn, but I could not betray Nelly. She had kept her own counsel. Even the Admiral was offended at me. I can not describe how strong the temptation was upon me to tell him all the story. But I dared not. I had to look on while Nelly, in the quietest might have shrunk. And though every body on the Green had begun to wonder vaguely, and the Admiral himself was beginning to suspect, never suspected any thing amiss. She cried a little when "poor Ellis" wrote to say his return was again postponed; but it was for his disappointment she cried. Half an hour after she was quite serene and cheerful again, looking forward to the time when he should arrive unexpectedly. "For he must come some time," she said, "and I'm to keep him a secret." And she said it until one did not know whether to be impatient with her serenity or touched by it, and would not have up one's mind whether it was stupidity or faith.

PREMONITIONS OF INSANITY.

Many mental eccentricities are only the forerunners of more serious disorder. Insanity is indeed recognized as such by the more intelligent and honest physicians. Just as the whirlwind storm in the south and the forerunners of a great storm, so some odd symptom will often indicate the approach of a terrible mental overthrow. In many of the more terrible forms of the brain, resulting in entire loss of intellectual power, the very smallest symptoms are often indicative of the unhappy fate in store for everyone. The inability to grasp a trick, the continual numbness of a finger, the loss of memory in small matters, are often indications of the approach of serious cerebral disturbance. Doctor Forbes Winslow, in his very interesting volume on obscure diseases of the brain and mind, gives a most extraordinary instance of impairment of memory, which he quotes from the case-book of Dr. Graves, a Dublin physician. "An Irish farmer, in consequence of a paralytic fit, lost the power of remembering noun substantives and proper names; the extraordinary thing was that he could remember the initial letter of the words he wished to say, but no more. In order to meet this singular difficulty he constructed a dictionary, including the names of the articles he was in the habit of calling for, and also the names of his family and servants. Thus, when he wished to speak of any of those persons or things, he turned to the initial letter, and as long as he kept his eye upon the word or name he could pronounce it, but his power to do so was lost immediately he lost the place." We do not know the ultimate history of this case, but in all probability this extraordinary symptom was as fatal as it was singular. Even the use of a wrong initial letter, it persisted in, is a symptom of mental disturbance. If you hear a man continually saying "pie" for cup, "gum" for mug, or "tuffe" for flute without being aware of it, you may be pretty sure that his brain is affected. It often happens that such mistakes are made by the best of us in ordinary conversation, but we instantly become aware of the error, and correct ourselves, and this is just the difference between the sound and the unsound brain. In other cases of mental disease persons have wholly forgotten acquired languages, and reverted to their native tongue: on the other hand, it is recorded that Dr. Johnson, when he was dying, attempted in vain to repeat the Lord's Prayer in English, but did so in Latin. In the same manner certain events will slip out of the memory altogether. A farmer of New England, while inclosing a piece of land, happened, when he had finished his day's work, to put the last wedge-shaped wedge which he had used for splitting the timber in the hollow of a tree. That night he was seized with a mental attack which prostrated his mind for many years. At length, however, his senses were suddenly restored, when the first question he asked was whether his sons had wedged it in the beetle. They replied that they could not find it, fearful of bringing back a recurrence of the attack: upon which the old man got up, went straight to the fatal tree, and brought back the wedges and the ring of the beetle, the wood-work itself having rotted away. Sometimes during mental illness a patient will forget all the early events of his life, and upon recovery lose knowledge of all late events, and revert to those of which he was previously oblivious.

Samuel Rogers, the poet, toward the latter end of his long life, presented peculiarities of memory very similar to those we have related of undoubtedly diseased brains. In his ninetieth year his memory began to fail him in a manner that was painful to his friends. He was no longer able to relate his shortest stories, or welcome his constant companions with his usual complimentary expressions. He began to forget familiar faces, and at last forgot that he had ever been a poet. Pressure upon the brain by pieces of bone forced inward by some accident, sometimes produces a complete death of the sentient being for the time, and a restoration of the mental power upon the removal of the cause. A singular example of loss of mental life occurred during the battle of the Nile, when a captain was struck on the head while in the act of giving orders. A portion of the skull was driven in upon the brain, and the officer at once became unconscious. In this condition he was taken home and removed to Greenwich Hospital, where he remained for fifteen months, living the life of an inanimate vegetable. Upon the operation of trephining being performed, however, his consciousness immediately returned: he rose up in his bed, and in a loud voice finished giving the order he was issuing when he was struck down.

One can understand the recovery of a man's wits in consequence of the removal of a pressure upon the brain, but unprofessional people can scarcely understand a born idiot turned into a man of ability by a blow upon the head. We have the fact, however, upon the high testimony of Dr. Pritchard. "I have been informed," he says, "on good authority, that there was some time since a family consisting of three boys, who were all considered idiots. One of them received a severe injury upon the head; from that time his faculties began to brighten, and he is now a man of good talents, and practices as a barrister;" and we may state that this is by no means a singular instance recorded in volumes on psychology of the brightening of the brains of idiots by reason of hard shocks.

One of the earliest indications of softening of the brain is often found to be a paralysis of the muscles of the face. The eyelid will drop, or the mouth will regular slightly drawn aside. The paralysis of the nerves of sensation sometimes leads to painful mistakes. A case is recorded of a gentleman who scolded his servant for having brought him a broken wine-glass at dinner. The servant, after looking at it, said it was a sound one; the master again put it to his lips, and again said there was a piece out of it. Ultimately it turned out, however, that the master was under the paralysis of the nerves of sensation of one side of the lip, and not feeling the glass in that spot, of course concluded that it was broken. The commonest symptom of approaching paralysis is a numbness of fingers, sometimes of only one finger, or a want of power in the grasping action of the hand. We do not allude to partial attacks, which often happen to the healthiest, but to persistent loss of either power or sensation. The gait of a person is often highly indicative of some slowly proceeding cerebral mischief. A man so suffering will either let his plant his foot down decidedly on the ground, or his foot will slip aside, or he will drag his leg. Sometimes the motions of a person suffering from incipient brain disease are very like those of a drunken man, and it has often happened that an individual has been charged with having thus disgraced himself, when in reality he deserved pity and commiseration, in consequence of being upon the edge of an attack of paralysis.

Sometimes morbid conditions of sight are premonitory of impending apoplexy. A singular instance in point is given by Dr. Gregory, who tells us that a sportsman one day, while out shooting, complained to his gamekeeper for having with him so many dogs, asking why he had brought out eight. The gamekeeper asserted that there were only four; and the gentleman, by the sense of touch having found out his mistake, immediately feeling that he was suffering from double vision, recognized the danger of his condition and went home, and was almost immediately attacked by a fit of apoplexy, in which he died.

Soldiers have been known, again, to carry bullets in their brains without being much inconvenienced therefrom; and, what is more, have passed through operations for their extraction, which resulted in a further injury to the cerebral mass, without permanently injuring their mental powers. The senses of smell and touch become exaggerated. Every thing will feel cold to the touch, something gritty or greasy. In others the sense of smell is augmented in an extraordinary degree, and also perverted. Some persons on the eve of an attack of insanity complain that their insides are putrid, and that the smell arising therefrom is intolerable to them. The touch, in the same manner, is often vitiated.

The warnings, in short, of the approach of mental disease are very numerous, and would be very valuable if they were known in time, but to the patients themselves they always appear trivial. There are, it is true, fleeting attacks of despondency which for a time reduce the patient's mind to a condition of melancholia. The stomach, in such cases, is mainly in fault, and the spirits are relieved by a simple dose of medicine. There is an anecdote told respecting Voltaire and an Englishman which admirably illustrates this point. The two, in conversation, having exaggerated their own feelings with respect to the miseries of life, and the ennui that at times overcame them, agreed that life was not worth having, and made an appointment to commit suicide together on an appointed day. The Englishman came to his appointment, armed with the instruments of destruction, but Voltaire seemed to be no longer in the suicidal mood, and upon the other urging upon him the completion of their project, the Frenchman held back: "I beg your pardon, Sir; but a little medical treatment this morning has entirely changed my ideas on that subject."

There are other attacks, again, whose early symptoms are so extraordinary that no discrimination or medical knowledge is needed to decide the question of the person's condition. There is such a thing as insanity of the muscles, of which St. Vitus's dance is a well-known example. In this condition the will has no power of directing the actions of the limbs. The unfortunate victim avoids thus afflicted are constantly committing are so odd that they are provocative of laughter rather than of commiseration. Their legs and their arms fly out in all directions; their faces, when they would look grave, put on the oddest grimaces. In short, it seems as though a demon were in possession, distorting every action, and forcing the unhappy individual to make contortions against his wish: for in this disease it is clearly against his will that his body rebels, the mind remaining clear and untouched. In some cases the physical spasm continues constant in one direction. The propensity to gyrate has, in some cases, been known to extend to the whole body, the patient rapidly whirling round for a month together continuously. In such cases there was undoubtedly brain disease of a severe character, implicating, most probably, the co-ordinating power of the muscles.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SLIPPERY SPECULATION.—Sixtus have proved a good investment to purchasers who, having had them in last summer, realized their advantages during the late severe weather, although hardening many who have suffered as operators for the fall.

Two servant girls were given tickets to go to a theatre. Returning in a short time their mistress asked them why they did not stay. They answered they sat in the pit, which was filled up, and some ladies and gentlemen began talking about farthings, pence, and shillings, and no loudness there, they left.

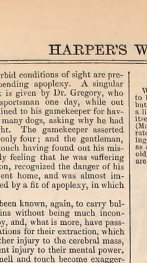
An orchis unconsciously perpetrated a great joke at the expense of his teacher the other day. The lady was announcing to her pupils the holiday on the 22d day of February, and asking them some questions concerning its observance—among others, why the birthday of Washington should be celebrated more than that of any one else. "Why," she added, "more than mine? You may tell me, and do a little fellow eager to explain, "Because," he exclaimed, with great vivacity, "because he told a lie."

THE SHAVERS.

The barber shaves with polished blade,
The merchant shaves in constant trade,
The broker shaves on twelve per cents,
The landlord shaves by raising rents,
The doctor shaves in patent pills,
The tipster shaves in pints and gills,
The farmer shaves in hay and oats,
The banker shaves on his own notes,
The lawyer shaves both friends and foes,
The peddler shaves when'er he goes,
The office-holder shaves the nation,
The parson shaves to men's salvation,
The wily merchman shaves his brother,
The people all shave one another.

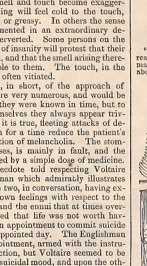
REFUTED RESURRECTION.—In an editor has a box at a theatre, are letters for him are received there? If a gardener was to set a diamond, would he have a crop of pearls? Is "Do you dance?" a gaiety question? Can boots be purchased, like lead, at ten shillings per foot?

THE EFFECTS OF EATING HORSE-FLESH FOR SUPPER.—Night Mare.



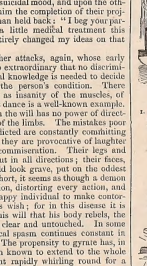
"Do you charge any body for the address, when yer sends a message by telegraph?" inquired Michael. "Never," replied the operator. "Do yez charge for signing the name?" "Never." "Then just take me ould mother will know I am here: To John McFlin, New York. Signed, Michael McFlin."

THE "SPECIALS" PROCLAMATION;
OR, TWO WRONGS MAKE ONE RIGHT.



We have hitherto believed this logical contradiction to be beyond the possibility of any other solution; but we live in strange times, which produce results of a like character. The proclamation below speaks for itself. It is composed of two Fenian proclamations (Manchester and Clerkenwell), and when read separately there can be but little doubt about there being two outrageous "Wrongs;" but let them be read as one whole Specials' Proclamation (as "Hurrah for old England"), and it can not be denied that they are one "Noble Right."

Hurrah for	Old England
Hurrah for	Right
We fight for	The Queen and Constitution
The Fenian Brotherhood	Is a bogus with Satan
We love	Free Speech
In Rebellion	Is treason
We glory	To be free
Shooting and pistols	Will not be tolerated
We will not fight for	The "Centre's" freedom
England's welfare	must be secured
We must succeed	at every hazard
Or die	Or fail
We Love and	Back wreck and waste
And never and	Let the Union sink
We wish	The Union
Foreign Intervention	cannot be allowed
Is a curse	To be a power
The Emerald Green	Is a deserving lie
We venerate	The powers that be
Fenian Chivalry	Is baleful mockery
Down with	Mob Law
Love and Death	Are God's Triumph.
Vivat Regina!



"Whenever I marry," says masculine Ann, "I must really insist upon wedding a man in." But what if the man (for men are but human) should be equally nice About wedding a woman?

1. Higgins determines to send his Seraphina a Valentine large enough to express in some degree his unbounded love for her.

2. He Seals it.

3. He makes an unsuccessful Attempt to get it into the Letter-Box.

4. He takes it to the Post-office, but the officials refuse to receive it.

5. And he is obliged to deliver it Himself.

6. The Happy Result.

ADVICE TO THE GIRLS.—Girls, do you want to get married, and do you want good husbands? If so, cease to set like fools. Don't take pride in saying you never did house-work—never cooked a pair of chickens—never made a bed, and so on. Don't turn up your pretty noses at honest industry—never tell your friends that you are not obliged to work. When you go a-shopping never take your basket with you to "carry the bundle."

MEM. BY OUR MARIO.—The man who drinks lime-juice plays his stomach a sorry trick.

When does an artist appear most thoroughly miserable?—When he draws a long face.

A Connecticut Yankee has cleared his house of rats by catching one and dipping him in red paint. He then let him loose, and the other rats, not liking his looks, left immediately.

A gentleman traveling in Ireland overtook a peasant, and asked, "Who lives in that house on the hill, Pat?" "One Mr. Cassidy, Sir; but he is dead, and his son!" "How long has he been dead?" asked the gentleman. "Well, yer Honor, if he lived till next month he'd been dead just twelve months." "Of what did he die?" "Troth, Sir, he died of a Tuesday."

Dandies, to make a greater show,
Wear coats stuck out with pad and padding;
But that, you know, is apropos—
For what's a coat without a stuffing?

"Nat, what are you leaving over that empty cask for?" "I'm mourning over departed spirits."

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY—THE OLD STORY IN ALL LANDS.—[DRAWN BY WINSLOW HOMER.]

J. ROSS BROWNE.

JOHN ROSS BROWNE, nominated, and we trust to be confirmed, as Minister to China, was born about the year 1822. His father had been editor of the Dublin Comet, a leading newspaper of the day, which took strong ground against the English Government. Those were days when writers in Ireland had no rights which the British Government was bound to respect. BROWNE'S paper was assailed, and he thrown into prison, from which he was released on condition of leaving the country. Naturally he came to the United States, where he arrived in 1833. He struck for the West, settled first in Indiana, and then removed to Louisville, Kentucky, where he became editor of a newspaper.

The passion for travel which has grown up with his son, JOHN ROSS BROWNE, early manifested itself. While a mere lad he traveled on foot through several of the Western States, a tour which lasted for months; then he voyaged for a while as a common "boat-hand" up and down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. At eighteen he became a reporter on a Cincinnati paper, and commenced the study of medicine, making himself in the mean while an accomplished stenographic reporter. Going to Washington he became a reporter in the Senate, having all the while an eye to future travels. Having saved a few dollars he started out, expecting that his funds would last him as far as Jerusalem. They were exhausted by the time he reached New York, whence, nothing better turning up, he shipped for a whaling-voyage. From this he returned after a couple of years with just money enough to carry him to Washington, but with matter in his head for a very clever book, "Etchings of a Whaling Cruise." Again he acted as Senatorial reporter until Mr. ROBERT J. WALKER, then Secretary of the Treasury, offered him the place of his private Secretary. He held this place till 1849, when he set out for California, a State which has since been his proper home, with a commission as Lieutenant in the Revenue Service. After an adventurous voyage, some incidents of which he has pleasantly told in his "Crusoe Life," he reached San Francisco with just money enough to pay the postage upon a package of letters, one of which contained the startling tidings that the revenue service had been reduced, and that he was among those whose services were "no longer required."

His stenographic acquirements here stood him in good stead. The Convention for forming a Constitution was in session, and he was appointed reporter, with the privilege, besides his pay of $10,000, of publishing the debates for his own benefit. He had the book printed, and has then the California question was the prominent one before Congress. The Senate ordered two thousand copies from which BROWNE, who by this time had married, realized a profit of $3000. He built a house at Washington, and supposed that his journeyings were at an end. But the passion for travel was not thus to be stifled. After a few months he sold out, and with the money thus acquired set off for a European tour, corresponding for the National Intelligencer from Germany, Hungary, Italy, Greece, Turkey, and the Holy Land. A portion of his adventures in Sicily and Palestine were given to the public in his "Yusef," one of the most charming books of travel in the language.

He had become known to the Government as a keen man of affairs as well as a clever writer. Returning to Washington he was appointed Inspector of Custom-houses and the like, and in this capacity traversed the frontiers of the Union, both on the East and the West. In 1855 he bought a ranche near San Francisco, and for five years was Special Agent for the Treasury Department, visiting the whole Pacific Coast and journeying into the interior. In this capacity he excited the ill-will of the powers that then were by his exposures of frauds in the public service. Traces of this old enmity still survive, and have cropped out in a strenuous opposition to the confirmation of his nomination as Minister to China.

J. ROSS BROWNE.

Losing his "official head," after a series of journeys through the mining districts, in 1860 he set out again for Europe, partly to educate his children in Germany, and partly to travel. These journeys in Iceland, Russia, Poland, and elsewhere, together with his genial account of Home Life in Germany, have furnished matter for several capital books.

Returning to California soon after the breaking out of the war, he again traveled through all the mining regions, and made himself so thoroughly acquainted with our great mineral interests that he received the appointment of Commissioner to investigate and report upon them. His reports, printed by order of Congress, demonstrate his fitness for this post. Meanwhile the Wine-Growers of California, finding that the existing laws bore hardly upon that interest, commissioned him to lay the matter before Congress and endeavor to procure a modification of the laws. His efforts were successful: and Congress, appreciating the reliability of his facts and the soundness of his arguments, made modifications of the tax-law which have saved that growing interest from at least temporary prostration.

The voluntary retirement of Mr. BURLINGAME from the Chinese Mission has rendered another appointment necessary. We believe that Mr. BROWNE possesses more qualifications for this post than any other man. We do not urge it simply because he is an accomplished writer, although this was the reason why WASHINGTON IRVING was appointed Minister to Spain, and Mr. MOTLEY to Austria. But this fact certainly should be no disqualification. We urge it because he is the man for the place. Few men living have come in contact with so many people of so many races and countries. No man, we are sure, has met with and parted from them upon such terms of esteem and good-will. The personal manners of a foreign Minister have much to do with the success of his mission. A cordial gentleman will easily accomplish every where, and especially among the Orientals, what a churlish Minister would attempt in vain. Mr. BROWNE has shown by his long relations with our Government that he is fully capable of dealing with all the questions which can arise between us and the Chinese. In matters of finance, industry, and national intercourse he is fully at home. His most absolute integrity has never been called in question. There is, moreover, a special reason why a Californian should represent us in China. California is the great point where the two peoples touch each other. No man but a Californian can fairly understand the great questions involved in our relations with the Celestial Empire.

Mr. BROWNE has long had it in mind to add China to the countries over which his travels have extended. Life spared, he will certainly go to China. As a mere personal matter we could wish that he should visit the Flowery Kingdom as a private traveler; for in that case we, and our collaborateurs of Harper's Magazine, would be in constant receipt of papers setting forth, by pen and pencil, the results of his observations. If he goes as representative of the nation, we presume that official propriety will not permit him to make any communications except to the Government. We yield our own wishes to the public good, and hope that Mr. BROWNE will represent not us but the Nation in the Chinese Empire.

HOW TO CONVERSE.

Do not interlard your talk with Greek or Latin quotations. You know you would not dare to repeat English poetry after the same fashion; why, then, do you take that liberty with a dead language? If your audience is a scholarly one, they must have heard it all before; if not, they will not understand you, and you will in that case be guilty of an unpardonable breach of good-manners. A still more contemptible exhibition is afforded by those persons who insist upon using French terms (such as exigeant for exacting), when English ones express their meaning equally well. When these foreign words are delivered with a rich roll of the tongue (to convey the idea of a Parisian accent), and even with shrugs of the shoulders, and palms of the hands thrown outward, to complete the local coloring, the educated Idiot stands confessed.

Be modest in your demands upon the attention of your company; and while taking good care that no other person shall monopolize the conversation, do not fall into that error yourself. Let every one say his say in turn, (with his Widderburn Bottom or otherwise) he has proved himself incapable. And never interrupt a narration merely because you have heard it before yourself, although if the company generally is under the barrow, any worm may turn. If the memory is sometimes "a tremendous engine of conversation," it is also often arrayed against it; and a muttered groan will circle round a whole company at the beginning of some old stories.

A PARIS GUIDE-BOOK.

It was fitting that the year which saw Paris at the summit of its splendor should see the publication of the Paris Guide. This extraordinary work is to all other guide-books what the Iliad is to all other epics. The Colosseum is to all other theatres, what the Pyramids are to all other tombs. Here is a work of over 2000 closely-printed pages, written by the foremost writers of France, interspersed with illustrations by some of the most famous designers. It is in bulk an encyclopedia; for interest, a volume of brilliant essays. It is not to be put into the pocket in setting out for a ramble through the streets or a run through the galleries. It is a work to study before seeing Paris, to study again after seeing Paris. The history, the science, the art, the social condition, the outside aspects, the inner life of Paris are here set forth by men, each specially acquainted with the subject with which he deals. If one could imagine Macaulay, Thackeray, Dickens, Lord Shaftesbury, Professor Tyndall, Ruskin, Matthew Arnold, Dean Stanley, Spurgeon, the Mayhews, Anthony Trollope, Greenwood, Tom Taylor, and Oxenford, combining to produce a London guide—or Horace Greeley, Henry Ward Beecher, Richard Grant White, Walt Whitman, Dr. Draper, Peter Cooper, Charles Sumner, General Sherman, Oakey Hall, and Henry T. Tuckerman writing to tell us all about New York and its ways and by-ways, then we should have a work analagous to the volumes now before us. To the Paris Guide nearly all the chief living writers of France have contributed. Victor Hugo has written one of his extraordinary rhapsodies by way of introduction; Louis Blanc, the eminent Republican and refugee, and Eugène Pelletan, the practiced debater of the Corps Législatif, have narrated the history of Paris. Renan, Sainte-Beuve, Berthelot, and Littré have described the scientific and literary institutions. Michelet, Feyrounet, Perdonnet, Labenlaye, Morin, and a number of others have dealt with the schools and places of instruction. Dalloz, the eminent publisher, has told what there is to say about printing and publishing establishments. Gautier, Charles Blanc, Burges, Jacquemart, and others have discoursed upon the museums. Asselfant and Guillemot are among those who have described the art treasures. Quinet, Le Duc, and Coquerel have written upon the churches. Dumas, fils, Roqueplan, and Augier upon the theatres. Dumas, père, and Taine upon the schools of art; and Darcel and Lock upon the industrial arts of Paris. When we turn to the second volume, "The Life of Paris," we find an even larger staff of illustrious names—Paul Feval, Edmond About, Arthur Janin, Ernest Legouvé, John Lemoinne, Mademoiselle Doria d'Istria, Emile de Girardin, Louis Ulbach, George Sand, Paul de Kock, François Hugo; Nadar, the aëronaut; Forcade, of the Revue des Deux Mondes; Berger, first of advocates; Jules Favre, most eloquent of orators; Jules Simon, foremost of educational reformers; Nelaton, facile princeps of surgeons; and some scores of others. Altogether, more than 130 of the principal writers of France have constructed this noble memorial of the most beautiful of cities. Every writer has been commissioned to write in his own way upon his own subject. The result is a diversity of style most charming in an encyclopædia, and like this, and an amount of information such as no half dozen, much less one man, could have collected, even though a lifetime had been devoted to the task.

THE OLD SCHOOL-HOUSE.

WHATEVER else to the night may come—
The night that never shall know a dawn—
It stands enshrined in my memory still,
The old brown schoolhouse on the hill.

I see the briers beside the door,
The rocks where we played at "keeping store,"
The elms we sing in the bank below,
And the "bear track" trod in the winter snow.

The corner brick on the chimney lies
Just as it fell to my boyish eyes;
And in dreams I throw the stones again
I threw at that crumbling brick in vain.

The names on the weather-boards are part
Of the sacred treasures of my heart;
Some yet a glint wield in the earth-sounds keep,
And some in the holds of silence sleep.

I hear the growl from the central pit,
Of the school bee when the day was hot;
And the sound brings back the joy and glow
Of the close round me in ring of snow.

Often again in thought I stide
On the unstained desks of my hill-side;
The brambles speed, and the discs reel,
And the wild "Fox and Hound" I feel.

Ah me! There are spots that hold my dead
In a sleep sanctioned by memory's tread;
And many a spot of life's triumph lies
Deep in the mists that never rise.

And things of rapture, and things of tears,
Are hidden with the veil of years;
But the old brown school-house on the hill—
It stands undimmed in my memory still.

SPIRITUAL WIVES.

WILLIAM HEPWORTH DIXON, who, some time ago, in a volume misnamed "The New America," gave England the benefit of his experiences among the Polygamists of Salt Lake, the Spiritualists of New England, the Celibate Lovers of Mount Lebanon, the Communists of Oneida Creek, and the Free Lovers of a dozen other American localities, has evidently caught the infection which has long troubled Thomas Young, Andrew Jack son Davis, and Father Noyes. He has lately published two large volumes of jargon about "spiritual wives" and "celestial love," in which he endeavors to convey the idea that in America we are all Mormons and Spiritualists and Free Lovers. He dislikes the theory of spiritual wives to be "that a man who may be either unmarried before the law or wedded to a woman whom he can not love, or a wife should be loved by, should, the right, in virtue of a higher morality, and a more sacred duty than the churches teach him, to go on among the crowd of his female friends and seek a partner in whom he shall find some spiritual affinities to answer with himself; and when he has found such a bride of the soul, that he shall have the further right of courting her, even though she may have taken vows so much below his wife, and of entering into closer and sweeter relations with her than those which belong to the common crowd; all vows on his part and on her part being to this end thrust aside as so much worldly waste."

Mr. Dixon calls this a purely American theory originating in this country. "In England the rising and writing public have scarcely entered upon these inclinations. In Germany they have been more debated, and the public feeling has found expression both in the church and in the courts of law." He thinks that "in Germany the old forms of society are too strong for this intoxicating religious spirit to make swift and certain head, and in Russia seems to know" where shall we find room for a new light, a new liberty, a new Gospel? "Only in America, completely loosed themselves in the choice of their goodly land as the field of this labor, for, according to Mr. Dixon, "it is manifest to the New World that the subject is being brought out in a thousand busy brains, and by a thousand busy pens. "In America," he says, "the door is open. There the new race is vast, the population sparse, the order new, the custom lax. No man cares to ask what his neighbor thinks or does under pressure of present excitement ever dreams of interfering with what he says or does. In matters of religion, even more than in others, a Yankee is taught by his circumstances to give and take. The way in which people come together in a new place compels them to adopt a tolerant habit of mind, not only in respect to doctrine, but to all that flows from doctrine."

Some one has informed Mr. Dixon that "great numbers of men and women put their faith in spirits." Judge Edmonds, of New York, is quoted as numbering the Spiritualists of America at 4,000,000," and that among these men and women not a few accept the doctrine of natural mates." He believes in this doctrine he explains that he means women who believe in spiritual husbands, and men who believe in spiritual wives —" persons who are known to be restive in the married state;" and he seriously quotes, as proof of the great numbers of these chilled spirits, even the statement of a Southern paper made during the war, to the effect that "more wives ran away from their husbands to the Southern than slaves from their masters in the South."

English tourists in America are proverbially unfortunate, and proverbially inquisitive. Mr. Dixon has been the most unfortunate and most deceived of all; and his rather doubtful praise is the worst of all. English tourists in America naturally fall into bad hands; for they can not choose their own society, and, of course, not the best class of persons who intrude their attentions on the foreign gentlemen. But Mr. Dixon's tastes and inclinations have led him immediately into disreputable company, and he has gone home impressed with the idea that all America is given up to what he calls the "new Gospel." Mr. Dixon gives notice in his preface that scarcely any of his facts are to be found in books. As far as America is concerned, we can assure him that few of them are to be found issued on truth.

GETTYSBURG SULPHUR FUND CONCERT.

LAST evening a concert in aid of the Gettysburg Asylum for Invalid Soldiers took place at Irving Hall. Altogether the worthy undertaking was a success, and was attended with credit to the performances of the artists, or in point of attendance, the latter having by far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of its generous promoters.—New York Herald, Feb. 9.

The grand musical festival in aid of the Gettysburg Asylum for Disabled Soldiers, which opened last evening, at Irving Hall. The occasion drew together one of the largest audiences ever seen in that Hall, and so many persons applied for admission that at eight o'clock standing room was crowded to the full hundreds who arrived after that hour. After the overture Mr. Richard Busteed, representing the Gettysburg Asylum Association, came forward and addressed the audience briefly thanking them, both for their presence, and explained that the movement now inaugurated was to establish a home and asylum for the benefit of individuals. The people had erected a monument to the memory of the dead, and who laid down their lives on the field of Gettysburg, and now it remained for the people to provide for the reception of those veterans who suffered mutilation or such severe wounds that rendered them unfit for supporting themselves.—New York Times, Feb. 9.

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM.—A musical festival in aid of the Gettysburg Asylum for Invalid Soldiers was held last night at Irving Hall. Three thousand persons attended. Mr. THEODORE THOMAS presided, and was assisted by Miss ANNA MEARDON and a full orchestra.—New York Mercury, Feb. 9.

CONCERT AT THE IRVING HALL FOR GETTYSBURG ASYLUM.—Irving Hall last night was packed with an immense audience, and the concert was, of course, a success. The people, indeed, seem to take this matter to heart as well, and the object certainly merits most praiseworthy and patriotic.—N. Y. Dispatch, Feb. 9.

For particulars, see page 128 of this paper.

THE WITCH-FINDER.

THIS is the title of a most exciting story, which has been published weekly with the excellent family literary journal, the New York Weekly. It is from the pen of the great romancist, LEON LAUVRIÈRE, and literally the purest of all that writer's great works. The story is strictly historical of the scenes as drawn from the records in the history of Salem when innocent men, women, and children were hung, burned, and drowned as witches. It is without doubt the most exciting as well as the most instructive romance of modern times. See the advertisement on the next page.

There do positively extract Teeth without pain at the COLTON DENTAL ASSOCIATION, 19 Cooper Institute.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ARION PIANO-FORTE.—PATENTED. Highest premium awarded to this pianoforte, even the renowned World's Exposition Pianos. Send for descriptive pamphlet. WAREROOMS, Manufactory and warerooms, 181 and 189 Bowery. MANNER & CO.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES C AND D.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Steamboats.

FUN! FUN!! FUN!!! Rich, rare, and racy is the STAR-SPANGLED BANNER." Full of fun. A live, 32 column, illustrated, literary newspaper. Only a dollar. Wit, Humor. It is unsurpassed. Nothing like it. Sold by newsmen. Or sent to subscribers. Specimen to render. Only 50 cents for a whole year. A splendid gift to every subscriber. Send for specimen. Specimens 10 cents. Subscribe now. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

GREAT PREMIUM SALE of SHEET MUSIC. The largest catalogue published, and greatest inducements ever offered. Catalogue mailed free, 100 Pianos and 100 Organs. Reference of the highest character. Call or address HORACE WATERS, Agent, 481 Broadway, New York. Extra inducements to agents and sellers up of clubs.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make all kinds of Patent Medicines, Perfumery, Toilet Articles, Cosmetics, Candies, Wines, Cordials, Soaps, Dyes, and a hundred of other articles. Every family should have one, and sold at large profits. Sent postpaid for 25 cents, by O. A. BOUDRACH, No. 93 Nassau St., N. Y.

Mrs. Oliphant's New Novel.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Publish this Day:

BROWNLOWS.

A NOVEL.
By MRS. OLIPHANT,
AUTHOR OF
"Agnes," "The Laird of Norlaw," "Madonna Mary," "The Days of my Life," "The Perpetual Curate," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," &c.

8vo, Paper, 37 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send "Brownlows" by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 37 cents.

JACKSON & CO., established 1809. (Licensed by the United States. GREAT ONE DOLLAR SALE of rich and valuable goods, consisting of Diamond, Gold and Silver Watches, Carpets, Furniture, Silverplated Ware, Fine Jewelry, Sewing Machines, &c., comprising a great variety of useful articles, and each and every article will be sold for $1. We purchase our goods for cash from importers, manufacturers, and bankrupt merchants or their assignees. Our method of doing business is as follows: To any one sending the amount of one dollar, we will forward by mail a certificate giving the name and description of the article we will send for $1, and then, by returning this certificate with $1, we will forward the article named in their address. We offer the following terms to agents:

8 Certificates of Articles for	.....	$1 00
12 " "	.....	1 50
25 " "	.....	2 50
50 " "	.....	5 00
100 " "	.....	10 00

With extra inducements to Agents. Agents wanted in every town in the United States. Send for our circular. JACKSON & CO., 89 Court St., Boston, Mass.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.

In Oil and Water-Colors.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS are fac-simile reproductions of oil and water color paintings, so fully and perfectly executed that it requires the experience of an expert to detect the difference between the original and the copy.

For every purpose of decoration—for parlors, sitting-rooms, libraries, school-rooms, or churches—nothing so exquisitely beautiful as these Chromos can be procured for the money. Nothing that will lend the ornaments of the same cost are so admirably calculated to subdue a room, to cultivate a love for Art among the people at large; to brighten up the dwellings of the poor, and to refine the taste of the rising generation, by their silent yet refining influence. To love the beautiful is natural in Nature. Hitherto Art has been aristocratic in its associations—none but the wealthy could afford to buy the works of art, but chromo-lithography has changed all that, and brought exquisite paintings within the reach of every family. It is doing for Art what the printing press did for Literature. Every family should be without a few classical books, and one or two masterpieces of Art. Prang's Chromos, produced, as lithography is to complete a home.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMO: a Journal of Popular Art," and see what we have done and are doing to popularize Art. It will be sent to you free. Address PRANG & CO., Boston.

J. ROSS BROWNE'S WORKS.

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Of all the indefatigable American travellers who go knocking about the world, picking out the peculiarities of countries and peoples, studying up governments and their workings, interpreting philosophical conclusions and practical theories from every thing they see, and bringing home materials for our profit for the benefit of the stay-at-homes who would study continents, and peoples, and systems, of exploring them—directly the most entertaining, in a general way, is J. Ross Browne.—Hartford Evening Journal.

AN AMERICAN FAMILY IN GERMANY. By J. Ross Browne. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

CRUSOE'S ISLAND, CALIFORNIA, &c. Crusoe's Island: a Ramble in the Footsteps of Alexander Selkirk. With Sketches of Adventure in Lower California and Washoe. By J. Ross Browne. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE LAND OF THE SAKIS. By J. Ross Browne. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

YUSEF. A Crusade to the East. A Narrative of Personal Adventure and Travels on the Shores of the Mediterranean, in Asia Minor, Palestine, and Syria. By J. Ross Browne. With numerous Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

All the Family Sewing.

BARTLETT'S REVERSIBLE SEWING MACHINES are the cheapest and best machines. The price is but $25 00 will do all the family sewing. Send stamp for circulars, or call and examine the Reversible Sewing Machine and Needle Depot, 569 Broadway, New York.

A NEW ORDER OF THINGS.

UNDER the present rivalen system at trade, consumers will be compelled to pay more than double what they cost, owing to the number of hand-through which they pass. The Wheeler & Wilson Company, a plan whereby consumers in the country towns can receive their machines direct from first hands, and not at a very small advance. Send for our Circular. A liberal discount to Agents and Dealers. Call at Salesroom, 625 Broadway, New York.

"Economy is Wealth."—Franklin.

WHY will people pay $50 or $100 for a Sewing Machine when they can buy a better one for all PRACTICAL purposes? Notwithstanding reports to the contrary, it is a fact that there are no humbugs or persons frauds that the "FRANKLIN" and "MEALLO." Machines are not in any respect equal. This Machine is a double thread, complete with Tucker, Hemmer, Feller, and many new principles, and DOES NOT INFRINGE upon any other in the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of letters will testify. ☞ AGENTS WANTED.—Machines sent to Agents on trial, and GIVEN AWAY to families who are needy and deserving. Address J. C. UTTIS & CO., Boston, Mass.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cts.; 100 Female Beauties for 25 cts.; 100 Actors for 25 cts. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just ready:

I.

THE COMPLETION OF MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands, from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By J. Lothrop Motley, D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

The Volumes sold separately at $3 50 each.

II.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1853. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings Within the Text. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

III.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. With Memorandums written and Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Years to Domestic and Public Affairs Published and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS, Clerk Assistant to the Privy Council. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MOTHER OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, from Authentic General the Hon. C. GREY. Portraits. New Edition. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

V.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots, their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

VI.

DU CHAILLU'S GORILLA COUNTRY. Stories of the Gorilla Country. Narrative of Second Journey. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa." Profusely Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

VII.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By LUCY RAMAL COMFORT. With Engravings. Square 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

VIII.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, from 1st to 25th February 31, 1867. On the "Ely Foundation" of the Union Theological Seminary. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

IX.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Love in Verse and Prose. Selected and arranged by Jerrold. Intended with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $4 00.

X.

THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on Political History of England. By GOLDWIN SMITH, Author of "Lectures on the Study of History," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

A FRENCH COUNTRY FAMILY. By Madame De WITT, née GUIZOT. Translated by DORAN HURLEY CHASE, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Miss Mulock," "Christian's Mistake," "Two Marriages," &c. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

BROWNLOWS. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Madonna Mary," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of my Life," "Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, Paper, 37 cents.

MARGARET'S ENGAGEMENT. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Walter Goring," "Theo Leigh," "Walter Goring," "Played Out," "Called Back," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

GUILD COURT. A London Story. By GEORGE MAC DONALD, Author of "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," "Alec Forbes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE BROTHERS BET; or, Within Six Weeks. By EMILE FLYGARE CARLEN. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By SARAH TYTLER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the Author of "Paul Ferroll." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CARLTON'S YEAR. By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

STONE EDGE. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $8, $12, $15, $20, $30, $40, $50, $75, $100, $150, $225, $300, $450, $670. Send for circular to LOVE PRESS COMPANY, 25 Water St., Boston.

$10 free. A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

PAT. ERASER

Burnisher, Pencil Sharpener, Paper Cutter, and Pen Holder combined. Sells at sight. Agents wanted. Can make $10 a day. Samples sent by mail for 25c. or two styles for 50c. Address NORSE ERASER CO., 464 Library Street, Philadelphia.

RICH AND RACY. "STAR SPANGLED BANNER" for the Million. Only $1 a year. Full of Fun, Anecdotes, Sensations. 32 columns of Wit, Humor, and "funny" matters generally. Only $1 a year. Sold by all newsmen. ONLY 5 CENTS. Mailed for 50 cents a year. SUBSCRIBE NOW. Back Numbers can be had. Specimen for 5 cents. Address

STAR SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

MARYLAND EDUCATIONAL JOURNAL. $1 50 a year. No. 114 West Baltimore St., Baltimore.

WANTED—A home for two boys of 8 and 6 years old, of one, in a quiet, respectable, Protestant family, at moderate terms. Address

JAMES JOHNSTON, 311 Sixth Avenue, N. Y.

GREAT ANNOUNCEMENT.

WILL BE COMMENCED IN No. 16, READY FEB. 15, OF

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

(THE BEST STORY AND SKETCH PAPER OF THE AGE.)

A Thrilling Tale, entitled,

THE WITCH-FINDER;

OR,

THE HUNTED MAID OF SALEM.

By LEON LEWIS,

AUTHOR OF "THE SILVER SHIP," "THE WATER WOLF," "SYRIA, THE JEWESS," ETC.

A thoroughly authentic history of Salem Witchcraft has yet to be written. In the books treating of this subject the atrocities that were perpetrated by the Witch-Testers were classed as almost perdonable offenses, because committed under the delusion that the victims were gifted with supernatural powers, and could at will afflict any person with the most direful physical and mental ailments—such as blindness, deformity, or insanity. In those days every person who suddenly became ill at once proclaimed that he was bewitched, and began recalling to mind the female on whom he had last looked, and who, it was thought, had prostrated him by the power of witchcraft. The suspected party, as was natural, generally proved to be some unfortunate woman against whom the lewdid had long harbored a spirit of unfriendliness. The relatives of the sick person were at once summoned. After listening to the story of the individual supposed to be bewitched, they would proceed in a body to the dwelling of the unsuspecting victim, drag her forth, publicly accuse her of Witchcraft in having afflicted their suffering relative, and make her submit to

The Witch-Finder's Test.

Tears and entreaties were of no avail; the expostulations of friends only made matters worse by irritating them upon to suspicion, and it often happened that in endeavoring to shield the unfortunate victim from the fury of the superstitious multitude even the friends of the supposed witch were compelled to undergo the tortures of

The Witch-Finder's Test.

These tests were as numerous as they were atrocious and diabolical, and frequently resulted in the death of the victim. When proved guilty of Witchcraft, death by the most cruel means was of course the sentence; but it was not a rare occurrence for to put an end to the victim's sufferings by death just as she was about to be declared innocent.

The Witch-Finder's Test

At this distant day, and in this age of enlightenment, there is to be found many who will discredit the following brief description of one of the many tests resorted to by

The Heartless Witch-Finder.

The Salemites believed that it was impossible to drown a witch—that if thrown into a river she would certainly be able to make her way to the shore. Acting upon this belief, when a woman was suspected of Witchcraft, she would be compelled to undergo the Witch-Finder's Drowning Test.

She would be dragged to the nearest river, and plunged in at a considerable distance from the shore. In case the woman succeeded for a time in keeping her head above the surface of the water, that was considered positive evidence that she was a Witch, and she would be stoned to death as she struggled with the remorseless crowd. In this test the only proof of the woman's innocence of Witchcraft was when she could not swim, and therefore sank or rise no more. Innocent or guilty, it was death in either case! By drowning she proved herself innocent; but if it appeared probable that she could save her life by swimming, she was stoned like a cat until she drowned.

Even cruelty more atrocious than this was put in practice by

The Witch-Finder.

Private quarrels and ancient grudges were avenged by accusing innocent people of Witchcraft. Young wives were ruthlessly torn from loving husbands, accused before the gaping, ignorant, and superstitious populace,

Branded as Witches, and after being marched through the town, that every body might look their last upon the Female Demons,

the terrified women were given over to the villainous Wretches who had aroused notoriety as Witch-Finders.

The remarkable story which is soon to appear in

The New York Weekly,

is a reliable exposé of the atrocities enacted in the Days of Salem Witchcraft.

The tale is founded on authentic records and data, and is entitled

THE WITCH-FINDER;

OR,

The Hunted Maid of Salem.

The plot of the story is original, although it has for its basis an accurate account of the cruelties that were perpetrated during the period of Salem Witchcraft.

Among the principal characters portrayed in this exciting story is

The Witch-Hunter.

The most disreputable person in Salem, at the time of the Witchcraft excitement, was a man named BRABBINSON, who had achieved a devilish notoriety as a Volunteer Accuser, a Witch-Tester, or Witch-Discoverer. This heartless miscreant practiced various legeries, under pretense of distinguishing a witch from an innocent person, such as drawing blood, saying the Lord's Prayer backward, &c.

The Hunted Maiden.

Another interesting personage of those times was HESTER WATTMOOR, the daughter of a colonial merchant—a beautiful and noble-hearted girl, whom the Witch-Hunter persecuted with his attentions, and afterward hunted as a Witch.

The White Angel of Salem.

A third and most remarkable personage of those dark days was a mysterious being who appeared in Salem when the delusion was deepest. She possessed the aspect of a young lady; but a strange peculiarity was noticed in her appearance—she was strangely white, and her skin shone so brilliantly that many supposed her to be an angel. She went about doing good, opposing the Witch-Hunters, releasing prisoners, helping widows and orphans, &c.

Whoever reads how full particulars concerning these and a score of other inhabitants of Salem in the days of Witchcraft, must read the thrilling and beautiful narration just drawn from the historical collections of Massachusetts, and entitled

THE WITCH-FINDER;

OR,

The Hunted Maid of Salem,

BY LEON LEWIS,

which will be commenced in No. 16 of

The New York Weekly.

The great success of the NEW YORK WEEKLY is in a measure due to the scrutiny exercised in compiling the contents, so that the slightest objectionable word or passage may be avoided. Heads of families, fully aware that we expurge from our manuscripts every expression that might contaminate the young, present to their wives and children, fully confident that its teachings will have a beneficial effect, and that its Stories, while they inculcate good morals, also exhibit the punishment that must attend vice.

The New York Weekly

The contents of

The New York Weekly

are varied to suit the popular taste; they are instructive, entertaining, and amusing. The thoughtful will find in subjects that will induce reflection; the knowledge-seeker will be edified, and will learn the social habits peculiar to various parts of the world; while the humorously inclined can always find in the quaint writings of JOSH BILLINGS, PHILANDER DOESTICKS, MARK TWAIN, JOHN QUILL, and other humorists, something that will provoke merriment and laughter.

The New York Weekly

As we have not space to particularize at great length the numerous features of THE NEW YORK WEEKLY, we will just mention some of the standing attractions:

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—A department in which the editor indulges in familiar chat with his correspondents, replies to various queries put to him, and chronicles information that is of the greatest popular interest.

THE KNOWLEDGE BOX.—In this column will be found Domestic Receipts, Scientific Notes, Hints to Farmers and Gardeners: in fact, suggestions that will prove useful to all classes of society.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.—The important events of the world are carefully noted in this column, and their essence given in pithy sentences.

PLEASANT PARAGRAPHS.—This department is entirely devoted to articles of a humorous nature, and it forms an excellent dessert to the mental feast which the columns of the NEW YORK WEEKLY contains every week.

The above are the regular departments of

The New York Weekly,

besides which we have

Sketches of Every Description.

LOVE SKETCHES, SKETCHES OF ADVENTURE, SKETCHES OF BORDER LIFE, SEA SKETCHES.

With such attractions, who can wonder that

The New York Weekly

is considered

The Best Literary Paper Published?

☞ It should be borne in mind that in No. 16 of the NEW YORK WEEKLY will be commenced "THE WITCH-FINDER; or, THE HUNTED MAID OF SALEM." The NEW YORK WEEKLY is for sale by every News Agent. Price Six Cents per copy.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., Removed from 42 to 37 and 39 Nassau St., Opposite the P. O.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These cases are in hunting cases made at our own factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, while it view to the best movements in regard to cost and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. In such a small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance and time to one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $3 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express agents. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

TESTIMONIALS.

From The Philadelphia Press.

THE OROIDE WATCH.—By reference to the advertisement of Messrs. Collins & Co., it will be seen that the firm claims to give a full gold hunting watch, with gold case and gold chain, for fifteen dollars. Oroide is a costly hued brass watches and found them good and cheap—they having been purchased at retail price by gentlemen dies' watches are very beautiful, and we know of no present so cheap which would be more acceptable. The very small proportion of gold which is given in most of the so-called gold watches of the present day renders them practically of no greater value than oroide.

C. E. Collins & Co., Nassau Street, New York:

GENTS.—I have just seen one of your gold fifteen dollar ($15) BLACKSMITH, GEORGIA, January 6, 1868. You will please ship at your earliest convenience one of the same kind (imitation gold $15 watch) If I get as good a one as the one I have just seen I can make a good trade for you in this part of the country. Yours respectfully, J. S. COLCORD, S. Atlantic and Gulf Railway, Georgia.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTS.—I have carried one of your oroide watches some time. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, January 10, 1868. good. I am well pleased with it. Mine is a large size, at $15. Please send me one of the ladies' size. A. H. BISSON, 266 So. Desplaines, Illinois.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTLEMEN.—I have received your chain per express. FORT SUMNER, NEW MEXICO, December 28, 1867. For which I paid 20 75, and am well pleased with it. I consider it a cheap article. Please send me two of your watches, one at $20, and one at $15, and forward them to C. E. COLLINS, to Fort Union, New Mexico, where the mail conductor from this post will receive them for me and pay all expenses. I have no doubt but I will be able to dispose of several more when the watches are seen here. Yours respectfully, J. H. LAMY.

J. R. BOLTON, Quartermaster Sergeant, Co. "F," 37th U. S. Infantry.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTLEMEN.—Please send me one more of your oroide watches. LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS, December 31, 1867. I received the watch you sent, and I am very much obliged for such a good timepiece. Very respectfully,

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., New York:

GENTLEMEN.—I am very much pleased with the watches, and concluded to keep them both. There is another order on the way for you, sent on my account. Hoping that you above may be satisfactory, and ready to send Yours truly, FARMINGTON, IOWA, December 29, 1867. A. T. CHURCH.

Messrs. Collins & Co.:

GENTLEMEN,—We are very much pleased with the watches and chains you sent us. PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, January 19, 1868. generally. The chains and your advertisement in our paper will do you much good, &c., M. T. WOLF, Press Office.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTLEMEN,—You will please send me one of your oroide watches. BLACKSMITH, GEORGIA, December 27, 1867. —No. 8 A. G. H. R. C. Yours, &c., I saw the watch you sent to Mr. W. W. Campbell, which created a great sensation. I think you will be patronized if you back your goods and prices, &c., and would be pleased to be remembered if I would be any help to you. There will be quite a number here that will send for watches in a short time. Respectfully yours, S. J. SPEAR.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTS.—I have received your watches. FORT UNION, NEW MEXICO, December 28, 1867. I take pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your watch, and it gives entire satisfaction; but you forgot to send me the $2 chain. You will have one before long. Yours truly, JAMES DILLON, "A" Co., 3d Cavalry, Fort Union, New Mexico.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SIRS.—The watch came safely to hand to-day. TOPEKA, KANSAS, January 4, 1868. I think it will prove A 1 (EXQUISITE). Please send me one more watch, and one more chain, by Adams Express, Topeka, Shawnee Co., Kansas, G. W. Wines. Please send me a nice watch, and oblige GEORGE W. WINES.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address for 25 cents by W. HEPBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

CORNS. BRIGGS'S CURATIVE Needs Treated Free, &c., expresses all other remedies. No more pain from Corns; no more sleepless nights from Bunions; no more limping from Ingrowing Nails. Briggs's Curative does not eat or burn, but soothes, softens, and heals all pedal ailments.

Sold by Druggists and sent by mail, free, for $1 60. DR. J. BRIGGS & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, ent the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thereby saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., and testimonials, &c., sent free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. DAVID WATSON, Agt., Adams Press Co., 26 Courtlandt Street, New York.

PHOTOGRAPHS—All kinds. Samples, 25c. Address A. Seymour & Co., Box 37, Station A, New York.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,

12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest Young Hyson Teas of Green Teas from the Ports of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 00.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 00.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 P lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 P lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 P lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN Tea, $1, $1 10, best $1 25 P lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 25, best $1 50 P lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 30c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound. Ground to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of forming Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join the club send for how much tea or coffee he wishes to have sent him at first from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send the list to us, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution —each one getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford to. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

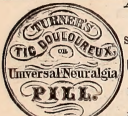
Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

LEAP YEAR.

"Mr. Popinjay, may I have the pleasure of the next dance?"
"A—a b'lieve I'm engaged to Miss —— for the next, and to Miss —— for the one after; but I can give you the one after."

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO.,



479 BROADWAY, 4 doors below Broome St.
WHITE FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 143 Pieces, $30.
TEA SETS, same, 44 Pieces, $7.
FRENCH GOLD EDGE TEA SETS, $11.

A NEW KNIFE.

J. RUSSELL & CO.,
GREEN RIVER WORKS,
MANUFACTURERS OF FINE
TABLE CUTLERY
AND POCKET KNIVES,
OFFER TO THE TRADE
A NEW KNIFE
FOR
HOTELS, STEAMBOATS, AND RESTAURANTS.

This Knife is forged—Handle and Blade—from one bar of steel, is heavily plated with silver, and is the strongest, most durable, and cheapest knife in the market. Office,

60 Beekman Street, New York.

A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES. Its Effects are Magical.

Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package, $1.00, postage 6 cents; six do., $5.00, postage 27 cts.; twelve do., $9.00, postage 48 cts. Sold by all druggists.
TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York,
Importer and Manufacturer of
Fashionable Furnishing Goods, Hosiery, Gloves, and Under Wear, For Ladies.

☞ Orders by mail will receive prompt attention.

CHICKERING & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
Grand, Square, & Upright Piano-Fortes,
were awarded at the Paris Exposition the First Grand Prize, the Legion of Honor and a Grand Gold Medal, making 63 first premiums during the past 44 years.
WAREROOMS, No. 652 BROADWAY.

The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines

MADE PERFECT BY THE USE OF THE
Bruen Manufacturing Co.'s New Cloth Plate.

By substituting this Plate for the old one, three distinct and different stitches can be made, viz., the Lock, Double-Loop Elastic (or so-called Grover & Baker), and the newly-patented Three-Thread Embroidery Stitch. Price of Plate, $10 00.

The Bruen Manufacturing Co.,
678 Broadway, New York.

PATENT OFFICES.

Inventors who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to counsel with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for over Twenty Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A Pamphlet containing full instructions to inventors, is sent gratis.

☞ A handsome Bound Volume, containing 150 Mechanical Engravings, and the United States Census by Counties, with Hints and Receipts for Mechanics, mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address
MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum goods, 27 John St., near Nassau, and 692 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5846.

Agents  Wanted.

FOUNTAIN PEN. Non-corrosive; Durable; Warranted. Writes three pages with once dipping. Sells quick. $10 a day. Sample Box, 12 Pens, for 35 cents, or 12 Boxes for $2. Address MORSE FOUNTAIN PEN CO., 413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.

New Designs, $1 50 postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, ARCHITECT, 191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. [Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

PRINCE & COS.
AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

HAND STAMPS by Mail. Send for circular. Address E. S. ZEVELY, Cumberland, Maryland.

Stereopticons and Magic Lanterns,
With the improved Lime Light, and an assortment of several thousand artistically colored Photographic Views on Glass, to illustrate Art, Science, Religion, and History. Indispensable to academies and Sunday-schools—a refining parlor entertainment—an attractive public exhibition. The light is equal to that of 100 candles, at an expense of $1 for the materials. Priced and illustrated catalogue free by mail on application.
T. H. M'Allister, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

Upham's Fresh Meat Cure for Consumption and Bronchial Affections, is prescribed and recommended by Physicians all over the country, and is performing more cures than all other remedies combined. A trial will convince the most skeptical. $1 a bottle; six for $5. Sent by Express. Circulars free. Sold by S. C. Upham, 25 South Eighth St., Philada., and all Druggists.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United tates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 65 Broadway.

Gettysburg Asylum.

THE GRAND POPULAR MOVEMENT TO ERECT AN ASYLUM FOR INVALID SOLDIERS UPON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF GETTYSBURG.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Association has the honor to announce that its thanks are sincerely tendered to the press and the public for the generous endorsements and kind assistance which the enterprise has thus far received: and with every confidence in the complete success of the undertaking, an earnest appeal is made to the people to continue the good work with increased energy until the 24th of this month, when it is firmly believed the necessary funds will be raised to erect the Asylum.

Tickets $1 each, or ten for $9. They can be obtained at almost any store in this and adjoining cities, or will be sent by mail on receipt of the price. Lists describing presents mailed free on application. Address

Gettysburg Asylum Association,
546 Broadway.

Notices of the First Festival.

From the New York Herald.

GETTYSBURG ASYLUM FUND CONCERT.

Last evening a concert in aid of the Gettysburg Asylum for Invalid Soldiers took place at Irving Hall. Setting aside the attractive features of the programme, the object of the concert itself was quite sufficient to elicit a generous response, and long before the hour announced for the "opening march" the spacious building was densely crowded in every part. Indeed, seldom has Irving Hall presented such an appearance, for shortly after eight o'clock standing room was an impossibility—a fact which speaks volumes for the Gettysburg Asylum fund. Among other things, Miss Brainerd sang a few appropriate songs, which evoked hearty encores, with which, in every instance, she considerately complied; and the well-filled orchestra was quite au fait in the rendering of a grand national medley, which gained a good round of deserved applause. At the conclusion of the first portion of the programme, Major James Haggerty came forward and delivered a lengthened address on behalf of the object of the proposed asylum for the Gettysburg soldiers. Personally, he was not identified with the matter more than to advocate the cause of the brave heroes who died in defense of their country's rights. He alluded in glowing terms to the brilliant deeds of the gallant warriors of Gettysburg, and passed a very high eulogium on the recent editorial in the Herald for its kind and liberal recognition of their merit, and its warm advocacy in their behalf. Moreover, he was exceedingly gratified to observe that the article from the Herald had been widely copied by prominent journals throughout the country, which he was assured would have the usual beneficial effect. Adverting to the American navy and the architecture of ships in this country generally, he alluded to the "Henrietta" as an example for all nations to follow, characterizing it as the acme of perfection and a model for the world. He was sure that though the government had hitherto passed over the very praiseworthy object of the Gettysburg Asylum fund, no doubt through pressure of business, it would, nevertheless, meet with its deserved consideration and support. Major Haggerty retired amid loud applause, and the second portion of the programme was then proceeded with. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas, played some pleasing selections from Rossini, Strauss, and Verdi. "L'Eclair" was charmingly rendered by Miss Brainerd, and a determined encore had the effect of evoking the humorous "Barney O'Hea," which was greeted with loud tokens of approbation. The concert was subsequently brought to a close by a grand selection from "Il Trovatore," comprising the most popular airs from that favorite opera. Altogether the worthy undertaking was a decided success, whether in reference to the performances of the artists, or in point of attendance, the latter having by far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of its generous promoters.

From the N. Y. Daily Times.

The grand musical festival in aid of the Gettysburg Asylum for Invalid Soldiers came off as advertised, last evening, at Irving Hall. The occasion drew together one of the largest audiences ever seen at Irving Hall, and so many persons applied for admission that at 8 o'clock there was no standing room for the hundreds who arrived after that hour. The musical programme was under the direction of Theodore Thomas, assisted by his celebrated orchestra, Miss Brainerd the distinguished vocalist, and Mr. G. Matzka, pianist. The performance was an excellent one, and the several pieces were repeatedly applauded by the enthusiastic audience present. After the overture Mr. Benjamin W. Hitchcock, manager for the Gettysburg Asylum Association, came forward and addressed the audience. He began by thanking them for their presence, and explained that the movement now inaugurated was a national one, and did not operate for the benefit of individuals. The people had erected a monument to honor the memory of the dead who laid down their lives on the field of Gettysburg, and now it was proposed to create an asylum for the reception of those veterans who suffered mutilation or such severe wounds that they were incapable of supporting themselves. He urged those present to keep the work alive, and enable the managers to erect an asylum that may be an honor to the nation and a benefit to the soldier.

Major James Haggerty was next introduced, and made a stirring speech in behalf of the wounded soldiers, and said that as they had braved the perils of the battle-field for the safety of the country, they now deserve to have a proper asylum for the remainder of their lives, instead of being compelled to grind out organ music at street corners for the stray pennies dropped in their hat. He was not ashamed to speak in favor of the Gettysburg Asylum Association, and he had attended the concert because he had added his mite to the funds gathering in the hands of the managers. Both speeches were well received, and the audience appeared to be in the best of humor when the concert closed.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. Babbitt's Lion Coffee." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "hermetically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a One Dollar Greenback." For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

TRY the PATENT LAUNDRY BLUEING BAG. A perfectly pure soluble Indigo Blue. Superior to all others in economy and convenience. Each Bag in a neat Box. Price 10 and 20 cents.
Sold by all Grocers, and by the PLYMOUTH COLOR CO., Nos. 106 and 108 Fulton St., New York.

WHITE PINE COMPOUND is safe, sure, reliable, in all diseases of the Throat, Lungs, and Kidneys. If taken at the commencement of either of these complaints, relief is not only certain, but a sure cure will be obtained.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

Fifty per cent. or more saved on Dry Goods of every description. Every package $1. Send for descriptive circular. SYMONDS & Co., 129 Chambers St., N.Y.

£150,000,000,

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1600. Fee to search for any name, $2. Gun & Co., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

GOLD PENS.

Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Re-pointing at 50 cents each by mail. Manufactory 15 Maiden Lane. E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

EVERY FARMER HIS OWN SOAP-MAKER.

Making Soap with GEORGE F. GANTZ & CO.'S WHITE ROCK POTASH is as easy as milking a good cow. Your soap will only cost 2 cents a pound, and the quality will be most superior. Ask your storekeeper to get it for you at 62 Pine Street, New York. If he is accommodating, he will do so. It is better than any other Ley in the market.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

FEBRUARY, 1868.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by Dinah Mulock Craik, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the issue of "The Moonstone," a Novel, by Wilkie Collins, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in Harper's Weekly form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Creese," a Novel, by James De Mille.

The Bazar, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine, One Year......$4 00
Harper's Weekly, One Year...... 4 00
Harper's Bazar, One Year...... 4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the Magazine, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the Magazine 24 cents a year, for the Weekly or Bazar 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the Magazine, the Weekly, or the Bazar, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of Harper & Brothers is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

Terms for Advertising in Harper's Periodicals.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 583.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

"DON'T GO YET!"

THE picture which we give below is one of that character of illustrations which are, perhaps, better appreciated without any written description—one of those speaking pictures which, as it is usually put, "tell their own story;" but it is one that will tell a different story to each student. A morose old bachelor, for instance, would tell you that he could see no beauty, no sentiment, no meaning in it; that the features of the gentleman who is taking his leave are not natural, like nothing human, while the beautiful in the drawing of the female figure in the foreground and the beauty in her face would have not the slightest charm for him. We might, indeed, find a few of our lady readers who will not appreciate it, though ladies, as a general thing, are much quicker in catching the sentiment of a good picture or song than are the men. But we are happy to think that to ninety-nine hundredths of our readers the sketch will be a highly agreeable one, and recall recollections of the most delightful character. It is evident, as we look at the engraving, that the couple for whom the sleigh waits, and on whom the old driver with his lantern attends at the door, have been the central figures—the popular and live people—at the party which is going on within the farmhouse; all are grieved at their early departure, and all exclaim, in pleading and loving tones, "Don't go yet!" The old gentleman at the door says it, and you can imagine that he half frowns to see that it is unheeded; the good dame of the house says it, and raises her hand in remonstrance, and looks vexed to find it is in vain; while the children who cling to the skirts of their friend cry it out loudly and piteously, with an occasional willful "You shan't go!" and, finally, finding that their voices and their arms can no longer keep their genial friends, they retire to the fireside corner and pout for a moment until the music arouses them again and makes them forget their momentary sorrow.

One of the sweetest of sensations, according to Lord BYRON, is to know you are waited for. We suppose it is not precisely Christian-like to feel gratified at others' sorrow, but it is no less a pleasure, to our minds, to know that you are grieved after bplaying ones. We suppose it is not necessary to tell our older readers so—at least we hope it is not, and so we address this remark to the juveniles—but there are fewer gratifications like that of being followed to the door by those you love; and many of the happiest moments of life are spent "lingering at the door to say good-by." Every young boy who reads this should remember that he will be a very unequivocal inducement of his life if, in his manhood, his friend follows him to the door and entreats, "Don't go yet!" And to every young lady with an eye on a sweet-heart, we can suggest that she may learn a good deal of his character by watching his "leave-taking" at home and in society; and if he is followed to the door, as is the gentleman in the picture, he had better make up her mind at once to take him, and forever after entreat him "Don't go yet!"

"DON'T GO YET!"

WAGES.

By ALFRED TENNYSON.

Glory of warrior, glory of orator, glory of song,
Paid with a voice flying by to be lost on an endless one—
Glory of Virtue, to fight, to struggle, to right the wrong—
Nay, but she aim'd not at glory, no lover of glory she:
Give her the glory of going on, and still to be.

The wages of sin is death: if the wages of Virtue be dust,
Would she have heart to endure for the life of the worm and the fly?
She abides in the looks of the blest, no quiet seats of the just,
To rest in a golden grove, or to bask in a summer sky:
Give her the wages of going on, and not to die.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1868.

THE NEW ALABAMA QUESTION.

THE original reconstruction act, passed on the 2d of March, 1867, provided that the Constitution, in any of "the rebel States" should be ratified by a majority of those voting if they were qualified as electors of delegates to the Convention. The supplemental act, passed on the 23d of March, required a majority of the votes of the registered electors. The number registered in Alabama was something more than a hundred and sixty thousand, and of this number about fifteen thousand more than half were colored. The vote lately pol[illegible] in the State, according to the Governor's Secretary, would have been thrown out by the necessary number, so that the Constitution has probably not been ratified according to the provisions of the law. It is reported, however, that General MEADE will order another election in certain counties where the terrorism exercised over the voters favorable to the Constitution did its perfect work.

That this terrorism is the occasion of the failure of the vote is unquestionable. It is but another illustration of the contempt which has always been known in those States; which before the war marked and ostracized the resident who was opposed to slavery, and which lynched the stranger who protested against it. When the rebel leaders wished to drag Virginia into secession JAMES M. MASON declared that those who were opposed to the movement should not be suffered to vote. It is the natural result of a society which rests upon a barbarous system, and which by outraging human rights necessarily degrades and lubricates the public mind. It can not surprise any thoughtful man that the late rebel class in Alabama has been able to intimidate the large and colored loyal citizens, and so to defeat the adoption of the Constitution. The men of this class, and they are undoubtedly the great bulk of the white population, naturally hate the power that forced the vote, and overthrew "the Confederacy;" and believing that with a President favorable to their scheme and a revolutionary party among those who share in the Government, they have yet a good chance of having their own way, it is to be expected that they will do all that is possible to defeat the wishes and plans of the loyal citizens of the country.

What, then, should be the course of Congress? Certainly it need not be chargined. No honest and patriotic man need feel mortified that the work has not been accomplished at the first trial. There has been a great deal of earnest study of the reconstructive legislation, and it has undoubtedly been sometimes hasty. But the great general principle has been always sound, and that can never be relinquished. The difficulty of the situation lies in the public impatience. "The war is over," cries the country, when the rebel armies surrendered, "now let us all go on as before." It would be very unfortunate for mankind if wars ended with the defeat or surrender of armies, for then arms would be invoked to settle every difference. It is the circumstances and consequences of war that make it dreadful and terrible. It is the devastation and desolation and death; it is the estrangement of the living; the fury of passion which is engendered; the fierce hate and long meditating revenge; it is these, not less than the material ruin, which are the true tragedy of war.

But when to these add the industrial and social change which follows from the sudden emancipation of an essential part of the population and their immediate participation in political power, as an absolute necessity of the situation, the consequences of war are such that the most agacious statesmanship may be often baffled even while moving in the right direction, and will necessarily be accused of incompetency by those who are more impatient of reaching a result than mindful of the means of reaching it. The power of Congress to deal with the States lately in rebellion, it seems to us, as was shown in these columns last week, to be incontestible. The desirable fact, of course, is that each branch of the Government should move harmoniously: the Legislature deliberating and deciding upon the necessary laws, the Executive heartily co-operating, and the Judiciary awaiting the settlement of the political quietly. The novelty of the situation required general forbearance, and such forbearance exists. The country demanded constant action, and it has had it. And the course of Congress has been peculiarly fortunate in this that it has developed the real condition of the rebel States, which is a cardinal point to be known in determining what shall be done.

Had Congress begun by a method of reconstruction, which however justifiable by precedent and abstractly would have seemed obviously harsh, it could properly have been objected that it was seeking to alienate the loyal people in order to excuse severity. But it did not do this. Its first proposition was of a modernization wholly unprecedented. It declared that the States in question should not have actually gained political power by the rebellion, but should lose representation in the degree that they unlawfully excluded the loyal citizens. This proposition was rejected. Then, in deference to the plain wish of the country that reconstruction should not be delayed, Congress proposed that the State organization should be founded upon a vote of all the people, excepting a certain class of those who were not only rebels but violators of the laws of war and of institution. But the disqualification was removable by Congress. The voters were registered, and a convention assembled, in Alabama, adopted a constitution that upon its submission to the people has probably received less than the required number of votes, and is rejected. Congress could not do more than allowing the old voters in the States concerned to do as they chose; and second, for enfranchising the colored population. The reply to the objections is conclusive. If Congress had followed the counsel of the objectors the political power in the States in question would have been entrusted entirely to the rebel element, which would have gained an increase of power by emancipation; while the loyal citizens, and especially the late slaves, would have been wholly in the power of their foes. Such a course would have been no less wicked than absurd.

There is no reasonable doubt that the majority which voted for the Constitution in Alabama approve the Constitution and have been prevented from voting by the terrorism of which we have spoken. The votes cast, almost without exception, were in favor of the Constitution. They should of course have decided the question. But the provision of the ACT OF CONGRESS forbids. The registration of voters should be repealed. Then if any State act a fair election prefers the immediate military supervision of the United States to a State government founded upon the consent of only a small mass of the population it can abide by its choice. Now that we have learned that it is possible to get on, although slowly and through much trouble, without all the States practically in the Union, it is unnecessary to depart from the sound principle of reconstruction. Remove the present unwise restriction of the law that rejected citizens' votes will vote. If they refuse reconstruction, they will find General MEADE and General SCHOFIELD and other military governors more kind and conservative Governors. But if Alabama be brought in by Act of Congress ought not every State to be restored in the same manner?

THE LEGAL-TENDER ACT.—OUR BONDS PAYABLE IN COIN.

THE question—what the General Government promised to pay when it issued its Five-Twenty bonds, whether coin or paper, and what is the true meaning of the Legal-Tender act—is one of great importance at this time, which new theories have been started on the subject, and made the basis of party action in portions of the Union, injurious to the credit of the Government and the business of the country. The position that, by the Legal-Tender acts, all the Five-Twenty bonds issued subsequently to their passage are payable in paper, arises from a misconception of the true object of such local regulations, and of the nature and character of public loans. Such loans are offered to the capitalists of the world, who treat them universally as payable in coin. A large portion of this debt—contracted at a time of great peril, to preserve our national existence, is now held abroad by foreigners—sold to them by agents of the Government, who represented that it was payable in gold and silver. We should forfeit the confidence of commercial nations, and lose the priceless advantage of national character, if we attempted to apply a local and temporary currency, forced upon us by war for our local objects, to the payment of such a loan. The wants of the Government in process of time can have no limits assigned to them. It is a great State, whose resources and credit should be equally unlimited. The clause in Art. 6 of the Constitution that all debts incurred by the old Confederation shall be binding upon the United States "may have been inserted" (says Mr. MADISON, in the Federalist), "among other reasons, to satisfy the foreign creditors of the United States." It was especially jealous of our honor, the patriotic of PENDLETON and BUTLER will have no weight with the country. The Legal-Tender Act, on which they generally base the position that the bonds are payable in paper, has no application to the principal of the loan.

Ever since the Second Congress Legal-Tender acts have been in operation, enacted in performance of the duty to make general regulations as to the medium in which debts shall be paid by individuals. There are no State acts on that subject, and if a national and general provision had not been made, different rules would prevail in different States. Under the old Articles of Confederation the authority of Congress was limited to the regulation of its own coins and those struck by the several States, and did not include the regulation of the value of foreign coins. This latter was left to the States themselves. To prevent diversity on this subject, the Constitution provided that Congress shall have power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin," and it restrained the States from making any thing else a tender. The new duty thus imposed upon and Articles of Confederation the authority of Congress was limited to the regulation of its own coins and those struck by the several States, and did not include the regulation of the value of foreign coins. This latter was left to the States themselves. To prevent diversity on this subject, the Constitution provided that Congress shall have power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin," and it restrained the States from making any thing else a tender. The new duty thus imposed upon the National Government from time to time by laws which prescribe the value of such coins. They include the coins of Great Britain, France, Spain, Portugal, Brazil, Central America, Bolivia, Portugal, Brazil, Columbia, and other powers. A single case, it is said, illustrates a principle. The act of April 10, 1806, is prefaced by a long preamble and effect of which local regulations intended to apply to our own citizens. This is its language:

"Spanish milled dollars, at the rate of one hundred cents for each grain of pure silver thereof shall not be less than seventeen pennyweights and seven grains, and proportionally for a dollar, and pieces coined from current as money within the United States, and be a legal tender for the payment of debts and demands."

No statesman, no financier, no pettifogger ever supposed that these acts related to the public debt of the United States, or that our bonds, payable in coin, were to be paid in Mexican or foreign creditors in the dollars of Mexico, or Peru, or Chili, or Bolivia, although thus made lawful money and a legal tender for all debts within the United States. The Act of 1792, February 9, provided that "All foreign gold and silver coins (except Spanish milled dollars and parts of such dollars) which shall be received in payment for moneys due to the United States, after the time when the coining of gold and silver dollars shall begin at the mint of the United States, shall be received only in their being issued in circulation, be coined anew." Such money was not therefore to be paid by the Government, but was to be lawful money and a legal tender for the private debts of individuals, and the public debts of public corporations within the jurisdiction of the Government. Such is the position of the Legal-Tender Act of 1862, which declares that the Treasury notes of the United States shall "be lawful money and a legal tender for all debts, public and private, within the United States."

The power of the General Government to make its notes lawful money and a legal tender for the private debts of individuals or the public debt of public corporations, grows out of the necessity of providing the rule in war by which its courts of justice and the courts of the several States shall enforce the collection of debts. The collection of debts through means of the courts and marshal of the United States is an act of force, which must be accommodated to the necessities of the country. Its forces are employed in war in a different way; and whoever invokes the aid of the Government to collect his debt must accept its aid in the pursuit of his remedy, as the Government may elect. Enforcing the collection of debts in Gold and Silver in such a time, when the Government needs for its use all the precious metals it can obtain, would require an army, in this service, equal to its army in the field. Instead of enforcing the collection of debts entirely during war, it mitigates the rigor of their enforced collection by the substitution of a different medium for payment from the Gold and Silver which its action had either expelled or had turned away from the channels of trade. But although the Government may in war suspend the writ of Habeas Corpus; provide for quartering soldiers in any house without the owner's consent; and suspend the right of trial by jury as to all persons in the army and navy —these are conceded rights specified in the Constitution; yet it is contended that it must stop with all its grand and mighty machinery of war to collect the debts of its citizens in the Gold and Silver which its own wants require for its own Treasury. SHYLOCK could in that case elevate himself above the whole power of the Government—as the central and important figure —and turn the public force in the direction of his debtors. On the contrary, all who are creditors, and who are debtors, and all who are jurors, may be torn from their civil pursuits and made to fight the battles of the country. This is war. Life, liberty and property—those of the nation and those of individuals—are all at stake; and in the authority conferred on Congress with respect to war is embraced the same power, in their discretion, which other nations employ for offense or defense in the great struggle for existence. Great Britain and France—nations first at loggerheads—resorted to legal-tender acts—substituting paper for coin as a local currency—and thus proved that the policy was necessary for a great war. If necessary and proper for them, it was "necessary and proper" for us, and, being an ordinary means appurtenant to war, is thus brought directly within the scope of the granted powers.

There would be no pretense for applying our Legal-Tender Act to the public debt were it not that it specifies that these Treasury notes shall be "receivable for" all claims and demands against the United States except for interest upon bonds, notes, and certificates of debt or deposit." The ground that this exception, construing interest, shows that the principal of the bonds is included in the general language, fails utterly as an argument, because it would apply equally to the principal of its certificates of deposit. These are certificates of gold deposits, which no one ever pretended may be paid in paper. The rule invoked that the exceptions include what is not in terms exclude, being thus inapplicable, it is a fair inference that the exceptions were stated from motives, common to legislation, of abundant caution and to remove no doubt. The public debt of the United States is never referred to under the head of claims and demands, but this language is used to include the claims and demands of a floating character connected with the war, as to the payment of which there is no special agreement. That arrangement is proper, and leaves those who make sales of supplies to the Government receive its paper, which is temporarily issued for the temporary purposes of the war. The power to make or declare paper a legal tender for the private debts of individuals, or the public debts of corporations, does not exist under our Constitution. To exercise it would create the greatest panic and alarm and expose us to the censure of all civilized nations. The duty is, therefore, imperative upon the United States to follow the example of European nations which make a making paper money a tender during war within their own limits, returned to specie payments as soon as the distress of their internal affairs would permit. To adopt the paper L gal-Tender Act as the permanent policy of the United States is an impossibility, unless we intend to sink down to the demoralizing scale of degradation to the level of Mexico, and expect to be blotted out from the list of established commercial nations.

The standard of gold and silver coins is not changed by the Legal-Tender Act of 1862 or by those Acts which in nearly the same language followed it, but the previous Acts fixing the quantity of standard silver and gold the dollar shall contain, remain unchanged and in full force and effect. This is what the Government promised to pay, and will pay, with promptness and integrity, for the decision of this question embraces the deeper one, whether the Union itself shall be preserved.

FREE LIQUOR.

THE first considerable act of the Democratic majority in the New York Assembly is the repeal of the Metropolitan Excise Law; and the first proposition of the same majority, whose chief cry against the law has been that it is special legislation, is to vest the metropolitan license power exclusively in the mayors of New York and Brooklyn, subject to the regulation of the Common Councils of those cities. The debate in the House was very earnest and interesting. The Democrats insisted upon "the sovereign right of New York city to govern itself," and complained of the arbitrary enforcement of the law. The Republicans, with admirable temper, declared their willingness to amend the really objectionable parts of any law. Mr. PRINCE took this ground. Mr. ALLEN wished to regard, as far as possible, the peculiar habits of the Germans. Mr. LA BAU, yielding to no man in devotion to the city of New York, thought that her best days were when the State took even a more direct interest in the city government than now. Mr. PITTS said the law would like to leave the question of repeal to the tax-payers, and to the mothers, wives, and daughters of the city.

There can be no doubt what their verdict would be, but the Assembly passed the bill by a vote of 65 to 46. Its fate in the Senate, which is almost tied between the parties, is uncertain. But whatever it be, there can be no doubt of the advantage of the law to the good order of the city. Should the Democratic policy prevail, Sunday must become the most disorderly of all days in the metropolis. Our German friends think it very hard that they can not drink lager in public on Sundays as they do in the gardens and lokals of the Fatherland, but they know how difficult the discrimination is between the sale of malt and ardent liquors. In Germany they have the liberty of drinking on Sundays, but they have little of that higher liberty which they enjoy here, and which may be well considered worth some little sacrifice. Let us look at some of the facts in which even with all good citizens are interested.

The Excise Board was constituted on the 14th of April, 1866. For six months afterward its operations were paralyzed by the CARDOZO injunctions. Then the Court of Appeals affirmed the constitutionality of the law, and since that time it has been enforced. The whole amount collected to the 1st of December, 1867, during the nineteen months, including the CARDOZO paralysis, is $2,000,451 53, and the cost of collection has been less than three per cent. In that time the retail liquor-shops have been reduced in New York and Brooklyn from 2970 to 6845—a reduction in number of 2425 shops, and the release of some 10 or 15,000 persons in attendance upon them to different and probably more orderly pursuits. The number of hours during the week in which liquor is publicly sold has been reduced from 168 to 108; the hours between midnight and sunrise and all Sundays being wholly free from the traffic.

Meanwhile the public order upon election days is unprecedented; the deposits in the Savings Banks have greatly increased; and arrests for disorder and crime upon Sunday, which were formerly more, are now fewer than on any other day in the week. In the year 1865, during the eight months from May to November, there were 3515 of the arrests made on Sundays, and but 3380 on Tuesdays; while in the thirteen months of the full enforcement of the law the arrests on the days succeeding from drunkenness were 2514, while on the Tuesdays of the same months it was 6021—6 more than double on the Sunday arrests. There are still 6845 liquor and beer shops open at the time except in the hours mentioned; and the present system is merely one of regulation, which is the policy approved by the general experience.

Of course nobody doubts that a license system intrusted to the elective political authorities of the city would be practically to restrain whatever upon the sale of ardent spirits every where and at all times. The increase of disorder and crime would necessarily be enormous, and the increase of taxation in proportion. Under the old system, which the Metropolitan law supplanted, there were annually some $12,000 paid into the treasury against $1,300,000 under the new. These are facts which every sober tax-paying man will ponder; and whatever errors there may be in the administration of the present law, he can hardly fail to prefer it to the system which the Democratic majority of the Assembly would introduce would turn Sunday, in New York and its neighborhood, into a Saturnalia.

INTERNATIONAL COINAGE.

On the 15th of February instant the Governments of the nineteen different nations of the earth which were represented at the late "International Monetary Conference" held at Paris were, by agreement, to have answered whether they would unite in placing their respective monetary systems on the basis indicated by that Conference, and thereby accomplish a result vitally important to the world's commercial interests and the general advancement of mankind. The decision which they were invited to not yet made public; but, as a spirit of harmony and compromise of individual preference characterized their deliberations, it is reasonable to anticipate a more successful issue than has heretofore followed the efforts of "Universal Peace Societies," or the attempts to establish an international exchange, an international copyright, or a universal language.

It is the generally received opinion, we believe, that the world is to move steadily on, under the universal law of ascension, until a complete unification of races takes place, and the climax of human perfection is reached in the Millennium. Certainly the world's history shows a marked progress in this direction since the "confusion of tongues" at Babel, when the world's population was scattered like chaff, and divided up into petty tribes, sovereignties, and states. Under the central authority of the Roman Empire a long stride was made toward a united political and monetary organism; but with its downfall the fabric was again broken into fragments, and it has taken twelve centuries of reconstruction to reintegrate the elements and reach the present gratifying status of the present era—a result so practically exemplified in the Monetary Conference at Paris.

The political changes in the Old World, with the consequent diminution in the number of coining nations, together with the commercial intercourse which has been secured between nations hitherto persistently exclusive, have at last enabled the principal intelligent sovereignties to do what has hitherto been impossible within the history of man—meet face to face in friendly conference for the promotion of the general weal.

That a union of the coinage of the Eastern and Western continents would be of inestimable importance in its moral, political, and commercial effects is incontestable. Its attainment has been long sought for, and the shars of influence which the United States, even in its earliest infancy, has exerted in securing what has thus far been accomplished must be ever gratifying to the national pride; for, by the adoption of the metric system in 1786, it was the only nation that led in the cause of monetary unification, but forever firmly established the monetary unity and the monetary sovereignty of the Republic from ocean to ocean. Six years afterward Denmark followed the example by decimalizing her coin, and other nations have fallen into the system successively. In 1821 JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, in the United States Senate, made the first official proposition to unify the civil history for a general monetary convention such as has now been assembled.

All the most interesting and important facts bearing upon this subject and upon the proceedings of the Paris Conference are embodied in the comprehensive Report presented to the State Department by Mr. HENRY R. REGGLES, the delegate from the United States.

The aggregate population of the European and American nations represented a little exceeds 326,000,000, and that of the nations not in Asia, 190,000,000. The plan of unification agreed to embraces: A single standard, exclusively of precious metals, whose weight and fineness; coins of equal quality (or five), nine tenths fine; the weight of the present five-franc piece (6612.70 milligrams) to be the unit, with its multiples and fractions. It accordingly unanimously recommended the issue of a coin of the weight and value of twenty-five francs, specimens of which have already been struck, with the necessary modifications to the tastes and languages of the different nations; for it is not proposed that any shall change their local names which are familiar to the people, but only the coins shall be legal tenders, public and private, by all. Thus, the specimen coin of Austria is inscribed, "Or, Essai Monetaire," encircling "4½ francs, 1½ florins, 1867." That of the United States has inscribed on its reverse, "5 Dollars, 25 Francs, 1867;" suitable national emblems to be added according to election. The intrinsic value of coin a little exceeds that of the present half-eagle.

The adoption of this unit compels a reduction of seven-eighths of a cent in the values of the United States half-eagle, and of four cents in the British sovereign. The coins of other countries approximate quite as nearly to the required standard. The loss in the case of assimilation is not a difficult task, especially when aided by the alacrity with which the contracting parties have manifested their desire, as for instance the Emperor of Austria, who has already signed a preliminary treaty with the French Emperor.

Broad as is the basis upon which this new monetary fabric is to rest, it is likely to receive large accessions from Asia; for China is even now upon the point of coining gold coins of similar weight and value to those of France, while the coinage of Japan resembles that of France in some essential features. Persia, Turkey, and the Governments of Egypt have expressed their interest in the monetary reform. It is more than probable that South America will throw in her adhesion to the new alliance, and thereby complete the monetary unification of the American hemisphere.

In view of the rapidly increasing product of gold throughout the world, the present movement, especially to the gold-producing United States, to secure the proposed reform at once; otherwise the cost and difficulty of recoinage will rapidly increase with the years. The value of coin in circulation now in Continental Europe is estimated at $22,000,000,000.

In Mr. REGGLES'S Report he very justly considers the intermediate importance of the Western Hemisphere, not only as a producer of gold, but as the stepping-stone between Western Europe and Eastern Asia, which is much enhanced in importance by steam navigation on the Pacific, and to be still more by the completion of the Pacific Railroad. The entire subject is as exhaustless as the illimitable future, which it concerns more than any other philanthropic scheme for the unification of races and their interests. It is destined to be a far more powerful agent than conquest ever was.

MR. DISRAELI AND PARLIAMENT.

The British Parliament has reassembled, and we shall now see what Mr. DISRAELI proposes to do upon the subjects of Ireland and of popular education. When he has stated his plan he will wait and see what Parliament proposes; and if it is wholly antagonistic to his own plan, he will say "Gentlemen, I have no more suggestions under the table, and obey Parliament. It is in this quiet way that Mr. DISRAELI has revolutionized the traditions of his government. Hitherto there has been a sense of political and party honor among the chief British statesmen which compelled them, when in the ministry, after proposing and defending their policy, and submitting it to the judgment of Parliament, to abide by its decision. If it were accepted, the result was very grateful to the ministry, who retained office. But if it were rejected, the Prime Minister advised the sovereign to send for the representative leader of the victorious Opposition, and he formed the new ministry.

The present ministry, of which Mr. DISRAELI is the strongest member, abide by the decision, also, but in quite another way. They carry out the doctrine of instructions to its logical result. The ministry being, as Mr. BAGSHOT explains in his lively and clever book upon the English Constitution, merely a Committee of the House of Commons, Mr. DISRAELI evidently holds that it is the business of the Committee to execute the will of the appointing power. In his judgment the ministerial function is exclusively executive. The ministers may, if they choose, propose measures, but if they are not adopted that is the end of it. They would execute their own policy if it were the Parliamentary will. As it is not, they will execute that which is. This evidently simplifies matters extremely, and leaves Mr. DISRAELI and his friends permanently in office.

Nor do we see how they are to be compelled to retire so long as they are influenced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Lord DERBY and Lord STANLEY, as genuine Englishmen, we can fancy very important in the anomalous and distinct sense in which they are so often shown by Mr. DISRAELI'S dexterity. An English statesman and gentleman, honoring the venerable traditions of his Government, must feel instinctively that when the policy of the ministry of which he is a member is defeated. But the master of the present ministry is disciple of the "Young England" party. Such inscrutable face is one in which it is very hard to discern those qualities which are most characteristic of the best Englishmen and decrest to their hearts. Mr. DISRAELI'S tact and that of Tory constituencies should astonish and alarm the sobriety of England as much as JOHN WILKES did the good sense of the last century. The only political system which DISRAELI ever seemed truly to favor is a medieval reminiscence; a system in which the aristocracy are leaders and the followers of the people. It seems to be his hope now to effect a union between the higher and the lowest class in order to hold the Liberals in check, as the old Southern leaders held the democracy in the days when allied themselves with the ignorance and prejudice of the free States to check the party of free labor and free men.

Every body acknowledges Mr. DISRAELI'S extraordinary versatility and ability, but nobody seems to believe that he has any principle. The Tory party distrusted and applaud and defend him. It is evident that they feel him to be in some vague way an adventurer. He has taken the measure of their fears and secured a franchise, but nobody believes him to be a reformer. He went beyond GLADSTONE and JOHN BRIGHT, but nobody doubts their sincere devotion to the Established Church. Meanwhile it is impossible to foretell the course of the Ministry upon the Irish and education question. Lord STANLEY recently intimated in a public speech that no serious measure would be proposed in Ireland, and the permission demanded of Parliament to suspend the habeas corpus in that unhappy country was a genuine necessitation, although, of course, it is not necessarily inconsistent with it. We shall be surprised, however, if Mr. DISRAELI does not propose some comprehensive and satisfactory measure. We taken if he does not abandon it and retain his office should Parliament disapprove.

A LITTLE BRICK-DUST.

The letter from Virginia which we published last week stated that the LA CROSSE Democrat is the only paper in that widely-read of newspapers in the late rebel States. Some Democrats are trying to shake off VALLANDIGHAM, but we have heard of none who object to the LA CROSSE Democrat. Indeed, the New York World feebly attempts to imitate its ribald insults to the memory of Mr. LINCOLN. We quote two specimens of the spirit of this organ of Democracy. In the first it is speaking of MRS. LINCOLN, and in the second of reconstruction:

"Really, we don't believe more than one good thing ever happened to the poor woman, and that was the night she was aroused at the late Lamented to the Washington play-house by the devil over the left hand. That was a great relief to the poor thing, as it also was to the millions of oppressed, tyranny-ridden people of the country."

"By making this, as God and its founders intended it should be, a white man's government, by diminishing the hordes of thieving tyrants who are devastating the fairest portion of our common country; by driving from power the bastard members of the bogus Congress; by repudiating the gigantic debt contracted by a fraction of the people, during a period of monetary insanity and wickedness, imposed on the whole people."

Under such sound Democratic influences we may naturally anticipate the most harmonious reconstruction at the earliest moment.

LITERARY.

The American News Company have just published a "Hand-book for Havana, and Guide-book for Travelers in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and St. Thomas," which is full of the most necessary information, and is prepared with an admirable sense of the requirements of travelers and invalids. It is the things most familiar that the traveler wants explained, and this is what he will find in this compact and convenient little volume called "The Stranger in the Tropics," or the Hand-book, etc. Thus he is reminded that the habit of the island of Cuba, founded upon experience, is to eat copiously every day of the fruit of the season; that he must not drink spirituous liquors when he eats bananas; and the whole intercourse of smoking is accurately set forth. The advice to invalids is the work of a medical man; and whoever goes to Havana for health or business or pleasure will find this book the most useful of pocket companions.

In "Ohio in the War" Mr. WHITELAW REID has done for his State what each State which was prominently engaged in the suppression of the rebellion should do for itself. In two handsome volumes of eight or nine hundred pages each he has preserved all the military records of the Ohio troops during the war for the Union, and preserved them in such a manner that they will be equally interesting to the general reader and valuable to future generations. The work really contains a record of the military career of every officer and every organization sent out by Ohio from 1861 to 1865. The first volume contains a great number of elaborate biographies of the principal Union officers from all parts. Their absolutely perhaps in conclusions and criticisms, but carefully compiled as regards the facts, and for that reason valuable. The second volume is filled chiefly with rosters of the hundred and fifty odd Ohio regiments, and an account of the actions, numbers, losses, etc., in which they engaged. Pennsylvania, and we believe some few other States, have authorized and aided similar works to that of MR. REID; but we have seen none in which the labor has been so clearly and completely done as in this instance. Every State should take steps not only to preserve its official records of the war, but to do so in such a manner as to place them within the reach of the people of the State and the whole country. MR. REID has furnished in "Ohio in the War" a perfect model for such works.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

Legislation in Congress for the week ending February 18 was confined to matters of minor importance. In the Senate a bill was admitted as a State in the Union, and a bill to that effect was reported in the Senate on the 17th.

Alabama asks readmission to the Union in conformity with the provisions of the reconstruction act. Pending Bill, and a bill to restore her to her rights of representation was introduced in the Senate on February 13, and the House on February 17. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee of both Houses.

The House, on February 12, considered bills to prevent foreign vessels from carrying the United States mail, and to protect citizens abroad; but action was taken upon neither.

The Senate, on February 13, received a bill creating the Territory of Montana, passing on the 14th to the House.

The Senate, on February 11, considered a memorial from a number of citizens of Georgia, for the abolition of the Presidency as a copy of royalty and dangerous to the republic.

In the same body a bill was reported providing that a majority vote shall be necessary to decide elections under the Reconstruction Acts. This is to avoid and counteract the effect of rebels in defeat the Constitution, as in Alabama, by largely registering and then refusing to vote.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

The State Legislature has wisely taken steps to examine rivers and streams of the State with a view to rendering them more productive of fish, and a bill to that effect passed the Senate and House. Resolutions of Fisheries was introduced into the Senate on the 17th.

NEWS ITEMS.

According to Italian journals (not the best authority on Spanish matters), Admiral Farragut, who was commissioned by Mr. Seward or the American Government to purchase a fine port of Spezia for the benefit of the Mediterranean squadron.

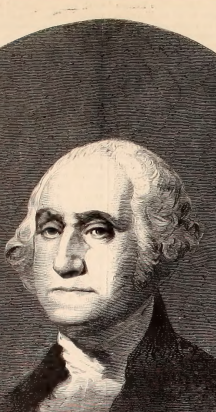
Arkansas has adopted a State to act in the matter of adopting a new Constitution. On February 11 the Constitutional Convention of that State adopted a plan providing, among other things, for female and negro suffrage, and fixing the 14th June as the day for the election which is to ratify or reject it.

The Bay State Horses, of the Boston Stable, were purchased, for $380,000, a site to Washington Street, opposite the Old State House. It is proposed to erect a newspaper office which will be at once an ornament and a benefit to Boston.

Twenty-five years ago the Plains of the West were the home of the buffalo and Indian. Now railroad, and the Rocky and Sierra Nevada Mountains were considered impassable in winter. Three winter travels thousand men are laying railroad tracks on the summit of the mountains, and "Old Pacific" is forced daily by the trains.

It appears to be the order of the day in Europe to protest against the arming of nations. Russia has protested that the membership of the Swiss, and a complaining of the warlike attitude of Servia and Bulgaria to the Porte, which would find a counterpart exactly in that of the United States against the present attitude of Hayti and St. Domingo.

FOREIGN NEWS



The opposition of the Japanese nobles to the opening of the ports to foreign trade has led to disturbances, reported on January 18 in a serious revolt which resulted in the temporary overthrow of the government. Several months since Soto-Bashi, the Tycoon who made the Treaties, abdicated, and has been appointed to reign in favor of another Prince of the Dolinos, or royal family. The new Tycoon has not been able to equally conciliate to the other Princes—Satsuma, and Tosa—and the latter have been active in the war in person and assumed the reins of government. Soto-Bashi fled to Osaka, where he endeavored to raise a force to put down the rebellion. The foreign ministers in Japan have declined to interfere in the quarrel, although foreign interests are much involved in it.

The Turks are much distressed at the appearance of the United States steamer Powhatan on the coast of Crete, and have it that the whole squadron of Admiral Farragut is to rendezvous in the Grecian Archipelago. "Farragut's flag" is the Mediterranean, it seems, is giving great trouble to both Papacy and Turk.

Sir David Brewster, Inventor of the kaleidoscope, and many years scientific correspondent as a savant, died on February 10, 1868, aged 87 years.

STUART'S WASHINGTON.

A YEAR since we presented to the readers of the Weekly a large engraving of the head of MARTHA WASHINGTON, by GILBERT CHARLES STUART; we now give, as its companion picture, an exact representation of the head of WASHINGTON by the same artist. The original paintings from which these engravings were made now hang in the Boston Athenæum, and form a principal attraction of that place. These portraits are really the basis for all the likenesses which we have of WASHINGTON and his wife, and, as the standard portraits of the illustrious pair, they are of course invaluable.

STUART'S PORTRAIT OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WHIPPLE, BOSTON.]

RELIEVING THE POOR.

WE said a few weeks ago that there was no real necessity for reminding our readers of the great distress among the poor of the city and country, for our citizens appear to be alive to it. The engravings on this page are not, therefore, intended as reminders, but are chronicles of what the charitable are doing. They illustrate the good works of the Young Men's Christian Association. The first shows the appearance of the crowd which is to be seen daily in front of the head-quarters of the Association at No. 69 Ludlow Street. They are entering the building to partake of the meal which is daily set for the benefit of such worthy poor people as need a dinner. About 500 persons are fed daily at this institution. The second cut shows the scene within the house at the hour for distributing soup to families.—Large numbers of children attend at the building at this time, and soup is served out to them by the pailful, which they carry home to their parents.

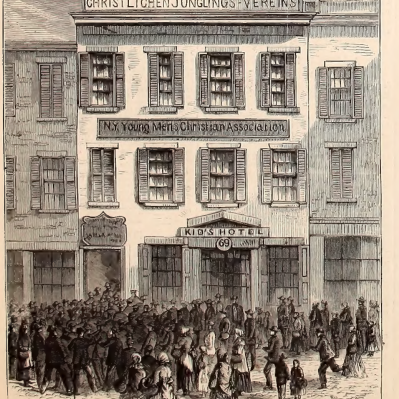
THE LAST OF MAXIMILIAN.

JUST four years ago MAXIMILIAN of Miramar received with great honors and magnificence, at his castle near Trieste, the Mexican deputation which came to offer him the crown of Mexico; and when, on April 10, he accepted, in a brief speech, he was greeted with shouts of "God save the Emperor MAXIMILIAN I." and with salvos of artillery from the Castle of Miramar and the town of Trieste. The body of the unfortunate Prince was received at Trieste on January 16 last, with equal pomp, but of a less joyous character. Our engraving on page 137 illustrates the last of these memorable receptions, and completes the story of the chief victim of LOUIS NAPOLEON:

"The town of Trieste was clad in mourning," writes an eye-witness of the scene; "the stores were closed, funeral knells were rung from all the churches, salvos of artillery were fired at the port, the castle, and the vessels, and a concourse of the people flocked to the mole where the body was to be landed. The civil and military authorities, the dignitaries of the empire, the deputies of the Diet of Agram, with the Bishop of Sebe at their head, and other officials, were at their post. On the arrival of the Imperial family, represented by the Archdukes CHARLES, LOUIS VICTOR, LEOPOLD, and ERNEST, the shallop that bore the coffin cast off from the Novara at 8.30 A.M., and, towed by a small tug-boat, moved silently toward the mole of SAN CARLO.

"All eyes were fixed on the floating coffin. The shallop measured sixty feet in length, and fourteen feet in width. It was ornamented with a silver angel holding two crowns, and a lion couchant. A canopy of black cloth, trimmed with silver fringe and adorned with the crown, covered the catafalque whereon the body reposed. The Mexican coffin had been inclosed in a copper coffin, over which was spread a red velvet pall, embroidered with gold. The Imperial family placed on the coffin a crown with the three inscriptions:

TO THE VALIANT HERO!
TO THE BELOVED BROTHER!
TO THE GOOD CHRISTIAN!



"To the right and left of the coffin, on black velvet cushions embroidered with silver, rested the crown of Mexico, the hat of the Austrian Archduke, and the princely crown, together with the orders of St. Eugene, of the Imperial Eagle, of Guadalupe, and other dignities. Three other crowns also adorned the coffin of the unfortunate Prince; the one presented by the garrison of Queretero to its Emperor; another presented by the Governor of the Fortress of Gibraltar, and a third given by the officers of the fleet of Pola. Eight officers of the marines, with drawn swords, formed a guard of honor around the body.

"The funeral-boat was preceded by a boat covered with black cloth, carrying the staff officers, followed by other boats manned by the officers who had accompanied the victor of Lissa to Mexico.

"When the floating procession reached the pier the officers of the Imperial marine raised the coffin and placed it on the hurdles prepared for the purpose, after which it was deposited in the magnificent Court funeral-car, which was in waiting close by on the dock. The moment was solemn and affecting, and many eyes were filled with tears. The Bishop of Trieste gave the benediction of the Church, in the presence of an immense multitude, and the procession moved in the following order: The officers of the body-guard surrounding the coffin, with the servants of the Castle of Miramar; then, after the car, came the municipal council, the clergy, the Archduke, the Vice-Admiral Tegetthoff, and the Governor, M. de Bach. At the railroad depôt a new benediction was given the mortal remains of the Prince, and the cars started for Vienna, where the obsequies were to be celebrated."

BALTIMORE ART SCHOOL.

IT appears from some correspondence elicited by our late illustrated article on the Art Schools of New York that Schools of Design are more general all over the country than is usually supposed. One of these in Baltimore, attached to the Maryland Institute—a most valuable adjunct to the school system of that State—has at this time four hundred and forty-five pupils, male and female. Already forty-four of the graduates of the Baltimore School of Design have received appointments as assistant engineers in the National navy, while others are occupying positions in which they are enabled to give enlightened direction to several of the mechanical arts. But unfortunately Baltimore has no PETER COOPER, alive to the interests of civilization and the necessities of art education, and as enlightened and generous as he is wealthy; and its Institute is at this time compelled to ask support from the State Legislature, which will not, it is hoped, unwisely refuse.

RELIEVING THE POOR—THE DINNER HOUR.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

RELIEVING THE POOR—SERVING SOUP.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.
RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER XV.

THE Sergeant remained silent, thinking his own thoughts, till we entered the plantation of firs which led to the quicksand. There he roused himself, like a man whose mind was made up, and spoke to me again.

"Mr. Betteredge," he said, "as you have honored me by taking an oar in my boat, and as you may, I think, be of some assistance to me before the evening is out, I see no use in our mystifying one another any longer. And I propose to set you an example of plain-speaking on my side. You are determined to give me no information in the prejudice of Rosanna Spearman, because she has been a good girl to you, and because you pity her heartily. Those humane considerations do you a world of credit, but they happen in this instance to be humane considerations clean thrown away. Rosanna Spearman is not in the slightest degree of getting into trouble—no, not if I fix her with being concerned in the disappearance of the Diamond, on evidence which is as plain as the nose on your face!"

"Do you mean that my lady won't prosecute?" I asked.

"I mean that your lady can't prosecute," said the Sergeant. "Rosanna Spearman is simply an instrument in the hands of another person, and Rosanna Spearman will be held harmless for that other person's sake."

He spoke like a man in earnest—there was no denying that. Still, I felt something stirring uneasily against him in my mind. "Can't you give that other person a name?" I said.

"Can't you, Mr. Betteredge?"

"No."

Sergeant Cuff stood stock-still, and surveyed me with a look of melancholy interest.

"It's always a pleasure to me to be tender toward human infirmity," he said. "I feel particularly tender at the present moment, Mr. Betteredge, toward you. And you, with the same excellent motive, feel particularly tender toward Rosanna Spearman, don't you? Do you happen to know whether she has had a new outfit of linen lately?"

What he meant by slipping in this extraordinary question unawares I was at a total loss to imagine. Seeing no possible injury to Rosanna if I owned the truth, I answered that the girl had come to us rather sparely provided with linen, and that my lady, in recompense for her good conduct (I said a stress on her good conduct), had given her a new outfit not a fortnight since.

"This is a miserable world," says the Sergeant. "Human life, Mr. Betteredge, is a sort of tragi—misfortune is always firing at it, and always hitting the mark. But for that outfit we should have discovered a new night-gown or petticoat among Rosanna's things, and have nailed her in that way. You're not at a loss to follow me, are you? You have examined the servants yourself, and you know what discoveries two of them made outside Rosanna's door. Surely you know what the girl was about yesterday, after she was taken ill? You can't guess? Oh, dear me, it's as plain as that strip of light there at the end of the trees. At eleven, on Thursday morning, Superintendent Seegrave (who is a mass of human infirmity) points out to all the women servants the smear on the door. Rosanna has her own reasons for suspecting her own things; she takes the first opportunity of getting to her room, finds the paint-stain on her night-gown, or petticoat, or what not, shams ill, and slips away to the town, gets the materials for making a new petticoat or night-gown, makes it alone in her room on the Thursday night, lights a fire (not to destroy it; two of her fellow-servants are prying outside her door, and she knows better than to make a smell of burning, and to have a lot of tinder to get rid of)—lights a fire, I say, to dry and iron the substitute dress after wringing it out, keeps the stained dress hidden (probably on her), and is at this moment occupied in making away with it, in some convenient place, on that lonely bit of beach ahead of us. I have traced her this evening to your fishing village, and to one particular cottage which we may possibly have to visit before we go back. She stopped in the cottage for some time, and she came out with (as I believe) something hidden under her cloak. A cloak (on a woman's back) is an emblem of charity—it covers a multitude of sins. I saw her set off northward along the coast, after leaving the cottage. Is your sea-shore here considered a fine specimen of misdirected mercy, Mr. Betteredge?"

I answered, "Yes," as shortly as might be.

"Taken differ," says Sergeant Cuff. "Looking at it from my point of view, I never saw a marine landscape that I admired less. If you happen to be following another person along your sea-coast, and if that person happens to look round, there isn't a drop of cover to hide you anywhere. I had to choose between taking Rosanna in custody on suspicion, or leaving her, for the time being, with her dress on her own hands. For reasons, which I won't trouble you with, I decided on making any sacrifice rather than give the alarm as soon as we might in a certain person who shall be nameless between us. I came back to the house to ask you to take me to the north end of the beach by another way. Sand—in respect of its printing off people's footsteps—is one of the best detective officers I know. If we don't meet with Rosanna Spearman by coming round on her this way, the sand may tell us what she has been at, if the light only lasts long enough. Here is the end of it, you will excuse my suggesting it—suppose you hold your tongue, and let me go first?"

If there is such a thing known at the doctor's shop as a detective-fever, that disease had now got fast hold of your humble servant. Sergeant Cuff went on between the hillocks of sand down to the beach. I followed him (with my heart in my mouth); and waited at a little distance for what was to happen next.

As is turned out, I found myself standing nearly in the same place where Rosanna Spearman and I had been talking together with Mr. Franklin suddenly appeared before us, on arriving at our house from London. While my eyes were watching the ground, my memory wandered off in spite of me to what had passed on that former occasion between Rosanna and me. I declare I almost felt the gentle touch of her hand again into mine, and give it a little grateful squeeze to thank me for speaking kindly to her. I declare I almost heard her voice telling me again that the Shivering Sand seemed to draw her to it, against her own will, whenever she went out—almost set her face brighten again, as it brightened when she first set eyes upon Mr. Franklin coming briskly over the sea from among the hills. My spirits fell lower and lower as I thought of these things—and the view of the lonesome little bay, when I looked about to rouse myself, only served to make me feel more uneasy still.

The last of the evening light was fading away, and over all the desolate place there hung a still and awful calm. The heave of the main ocean on the great sand-bank out in the bay, was a heave that made no sound. The inner sea lay lost and dim, without a breath of wind to stir it. Patches of nasty ooze floated, yellow-white, on the dead surface of the water. Scum and slime shone faintly in certain places, where the last of the light still caught them on the two great spits of rock jutting out, north and south, into the sea. It was now the time of the turn of the tide; and even as I stood there waiting, the broad brown face of the quicksand began to dimple and quiver —the only moving thing in all the horrid place.

I saw the Sergeant start as the shiver of the sand caught his eye. After looking at it for a minute or so he turned and came back to me.

"A treacherous place, Mr. Betteredge," he said; "and no signs of Rosanna Spearman any where on the beach, look where you may."

He took me down lower on the shore, and I saw for myself that his footsteps and mine were the only footsteps printed off on the sand.

"How does the fishing village bear, standing where we are now?" asked Sergeant Cuff.

"Cobb's Hole," I answered (that being the name of the place), "bears as near as may be due south."

"I saw the girl this evening, walking northward along the shore, from Cobb's Hole," said the Sergeant. "Consequently, she must have been walking toward this place. Is Cobb's Hole on the other side of that point of land there? And can we get to it—now it's low-water—by the beach?"

I answered, "Yes," to both those questions.

"If you'll excuse my suggesting it, we'll step out briskly," says the Sergeant. "I want to find the place where she left the shore before it gets dark."

We had walked, I should say, a couple of hundred yards toward Cobb's Hole, when Sergeant Cuff suddenly went down on his knees on the beach, to all appearance seized with a sudden frenzy for saying his prayers.

"There's something to be said for your marine landscape here, after all," remarked the Sergeant.

"Here are a woman's footsteps, Mr. Betteredge! Let us call them Rosanna's footsteps, until we find evidence to the contrary that we can't resist. Very confused footsteps, you will please to observe—purposely confused, I should say. Ah, poor soul, she understands the detective virtues of sand as well as I do! But hasn't she been in rather too great a hurry to tread out the marks thoroughly? I think she has. Here's one footstep going from Cobb's Hole; and here is another going back to it. Isn't that the toe of her shoe pointing straight to the water's edge? And don't I see two heel-marks further down the beach, close at the water's edge also? I don't want to hurt your feelings, but I'm afraid Rosanna is sly. It looks as if she had determined to get to that place you and I have just come from, without leaving any marks on the sand to trace her by. Shall we say that she walked through the water from this point till she got to that ledge of rocks behind us, and came back the same way, and then took to the beach again where those two heel-marks are still left? Yes, we'll say that. It seems to fit in with my notion that she had something under her cloak when she left the cottage. No! not something to destroy—for, in that case, where would have been the need of all these precautions to prevent my tracing the place at which her walk ended? Something to hide it, I think, the better guess of the two. Perhaps, if we go on to the cottage, we may find out what that something is!"

At this proposal my detective-fever suddenly cooled. "You don't want me," I said. "What good can I do?"

"The longer I know you, Mr. Betteredge," said the Sergeant, "the more virtues I discover. Modesty—oh, dear me, how rare modesty is in this world! and how much of that rarity you possess! If I go alone to the cottage the people's tongues will be tied at the first question I put to them. If I go with you I go introduced by a justly respected neighbor, and a flow of conversation is the necessary result. It strikes me in that light; how does it strike you?"

Not having an answer of the needful smartness as ready as I could have wished, I tried to gain time by asking him what cottage he wanted to go to.

On the Sergeant describing the place I recognized it as a cottage inhabited by a fisherman named Yolland, with his wife and two grown-up children, a son and a daughter. If you will look back, you will find that, in first presenting Rosanna Spearman to your notice, I have described her as occasionally varying her walk to the Shivering Sand by a visit to some friends of hers at Cobb's Hole. Those friends were the Yollands—respectable, worthy people, a credit to the neighborhood. Rosanna's acquaintance with them had begun by means of the daughter, who was afflicted with a misshapen foot, and who was known in our parts by the name of Limping Lucy. The two deformed girls had, I suppose, a kind of fellow-feeling for each other. Any way, the Yollands and Rosanna always appeared to get on together, at the few chances they had of meeting, in a pleasant and friendly manner. The fact of Sergeant Cuff having traced the girl to their cottage set the matter of my helping his inquiries in quite a new light. Rosanna had merely gone where she was in the habit of going; and to show that she had been in company with the fisherman and his family was as good as to prove that she had been innocently occupied, so far, at any rate. It would be doing that girl a service, therefore, instead of an injury, if I allowed myself to be convinced by Sergeant Cuff's logic. I professed myself convinced by it accordingly.

We went on to Cobb's Hole, seeing the footsteps on the sand, as long as the light lasted.

On reaching the cottage, the fisherman and his son proved to be out in the boat; and Limping Lucy, always weak and weary, was resting on the bed up stairs. Good Mrs. Yolland received us alone in her kitchen. When she heard that Sergeant Cuff was a celebrated character in London, she clapped a bottle of Dutch gin and a couple of clean pipes on the table, and stared as if she could never see enough of him.

I sat quiet in a corner, waiting to hear how the Sergeant would find his way to the subject of Rosanna Spearman. His usual roundabout manner of going to work proved, on this occasion, to be more roundabout than ever. How he managed it is more than I could tell at the time, and more than I can tell now. But this is certain, he began with the Royal Family, the Primitive Methodists, and the price of fish; and he got from that (in his dismal, underground way) to the loss of the Moonstone, the spitefulness of our first house-maid, and the hard behavior of the women-servants generally toward Rosanna Spearman. Having reached his subject in this fashion, he described himself as making his inquiries about the lost Diamond, partly with a view to find it, and partly for the purpose of clearing Rosanna from the unjust suspicions of her enemies in the house. In about a quarter of an hour from the time when we entered the kitchen good Mrs. Yolland was persuaded that she was talking to Rosanna's best friend, and was pressing Sergeant Cuff to comfort his stomach and revive his spirits out of the Dutch bottle.

Being firmly persuaded that the Sergeant was wasting his breath to no purpose on Mrs. Yolland, I sat enjoying the talk between them, much as I have sat, in my time, enjoying a stage play. The great Cuff showed a wonderful patience; trying his ideal, dreamily like any land, that way, and firing shot after shot, as it were, at random, on the chance of hitting the mark. Every thing to Rosanna's credit, nothing to Rosanna's prejudice—that was how it ended, try as he might; with Mrs. Yolland talking nineteen to the dozen, and placing the most entire confidence in him. His last effort was made, when we had looked at our watches, and had got on our legs previous to taking leave.

"I shall now wish you good-night, ma'am," says the Sergeant. "And I shall only say, at parting, that Rosanna Spearman has a sincere well-wisher in myself, your obedient servant. But, oh dear me! she will never get on in her present place; and my advice to her is—leave it."

"WEIGH IT IN YOUR HAND, SIR," SHE SAID TO THE SERGEANT.

"Bless your heart alive! she is going to leave it!" cries Mrs. Yolland. (Nota Bene—I translate Mrs. Yolland out of the Yorkshire language into the English language. When I tell you that the all-accomplished Cuff was every now and then puzzled to understand her until I helped him, you will draw your own conclusions as to what your state of mind would be if I reported her in her native tongue.)

Rosanna Spearman going to leave us! I pricked up my ears at that. It seemed strange, to say the least of it, that she should have given no warning, in the first place, to my lady or to me. A certain doubt came up in my mind whether Sergeant Cuff's last random shot might not have hit the mark. I began to question whether my share in the proceedings was quite as harmless a one as I had thought it. It might be all in the way of the Sergeant's business to mystify an honest woman by wrapping her round in a network of lies; but it was my duty to have remembered, as a good Protestant, that the father of lies is the Devil—and that mischief and the Devil are never far apart. Beginning to smell mischief in the air, I tried to take Sergeant Cuff out. He sat down again instantly, and asked for a last little drop of comfort out of the Dutch bottle. Mrs. Yolland sat down opposite to him, and gave him his nip. I went on to the door, excessively uncomfortable, and said I thought I must bid them good-night—and yet I didn't go.

"So she means to leave?" says the Sergeant. "What is she to do when she does leave? Sad, sad! The poor creature has got no friends in the world except you and me."

"Ah, but she has though!" says Mrs. Yolland. "She came in here, as I told you, this evening; and, after sitting and talking a little with my girl Lucy and me, she asked to go up stairs by herself into Lucy's room. It's the only room in our place where there's pen and ink. 'I want to write a letter to a friend,' she says, 'and I can't do it for the prying and the peeping of the servants up at the house.' Who the letter was written to I can't tell you: it must have been a mortal long one, judging by the time she stopped up stairs over it. I offered her a postage stamp when she came down. She hadn't got the letter in her hand, and she didn't accept the stamp. A little close, poor soul (as you know), about herself and her doings. But a friend she has got somewhere, I can tell you; and to that friend, you may depend upon it, she will go."

"Soon?" asked the Sergeant.

"As soon as she can," says Mrs. Yolland.

Here I stepped in again from the door. As chief of my lady's establishment I couldn't allow this sort of loose talk about a servant of ours going or not going to proceed any longer in my presence without noticing it.

"You must be mistaken about Rosanna Spearman," I said. "If she had been going to leave her present situation she would have mentioned it, in the first place, to me."

"Mistaken?" cries Mrs. Yolland. "Why, only an hour ago she bought some things she wanted for traveling—of my own self, Mr. Betteredge, in this very room. And that reminds me," says the wearisome woman, suddenly beginning to feel in her pocket, "of something I've got it on my mind to say about Rosanna and her money. Are you either of you likely to see her when you go back to the house?"

"I'll take a message to the poor thing, with the greatest pleasure," answered Sergeant Cuff, before I could put in a word edgewise.

Mrs. Yolland produced out of her pocket a few shillings and sixpences, and counted them out with a most particular and exasperating carefulness in the palm of her hand. She offered the money to the Sergeant, looking mighty loth to part with it all the while.

"Might I ask you to give this back to Rosanna, with my love and respects?" says Mrs. Yolland. "She insisted on paying me for the one or two things she took a fancy to this evening—and money's welcome enough in our house, I don't deny it. Still, I'm not easy in my mind about taking the poor thing's little savings. And to tell you the truth, I don't think my man would like to hear that I had taken Rosanna Spearman's money when he comes back to-morrow morning from his work. Please say she's heartily welcome to the things she bought of me—as a gift. And don't leave the money on the table," says Mrs. Yolland, putting it down suddenly before the Sergeant, as if it burnt her fingers—"don't, there's a good man! For times are hard, and flesh is weak; and I might feel tempted to put it back in my pocket again."

"Come along!" I said. "I can't wait any longer; I must go back to the house."

"I'll follow you directly," says Sergeant Cuff.

For the second time I went to the door; and, for the second time, try as I might, I couldn't cross the threshold.

"It's a delicate matter, ma'am," I heard the Sergeant say, "giving money back. You charged her cheap for the things, I'm sure?"

"Cheap!" says Mrs. Yolland. "Come and judge for yourself."

She took up the candle and led the Sergeant to a corner of the kitchen. For the life of me I couldn't help following them. Shaken down in the corner was a heap of odds and ends (mostly old metal) which the fisherman had picked up at different times from wrecked ships, and which he hadn't found a market for yet to his own mind. Mrs. Yolland dived into this rubbish, and brought up an old japanned tin case, with a cover to it, and a hasp to hang it up by—the sort of thing they use on board ship for keeping their maps and charts, and such like, from the wet.

"There!" says she. "When Rosanna came in this evening, she bought the fellow to that. 'It will just do,' she says, 'to put my cuffs and collars in, and keep them from being crumpled in my box.' One and ninepence, Mr. Cuff. As I live by bread, not a half-penny more!"

"Dirt cheap!" says the Sergeant, with a heavy sigh.

He weighed the case in his hand. I thought I heard a note or two of The Last Rose of Summer as he looked at it. There was no doubt now! He had made another discovery to the prejudice of Rosanna Spearman in the place of all others where I thought her character was safest, and all through me! I leave you to imagine what I felt, and how sincerely I repented having been the medium of introduction between Mrs. Yolland and Sergeant Cuff.

"That will do," I said. "We really must go."

Without paying the least attention to me Mrs. Yolland took another dive into the rubbish, and came up out of it, this time, with a dog chain.

"Weigh it in your hand, Sir," she said, to the Sergeant. "We had three of these; and Rosanna has taken two of them. 'What can you want, my dear, with a couple of dog's chains?' says I. 'If I join them together they'll go round my box nicely,' says she. 'Rope's cheapest,' says I. 'Chain's surest,' says she. 'Who ever heard of a box corded with chain?' says I. 'Oh, Mrs. Yolland, don't make objections!' says she; 'let me have my chains!' A strange girl, Mr. Cuff—good as gold, and kinder than a sister to my Lucy—but always a little strange. There! I humored her. Three and sixpence. On the word of an honest woman, three and sixpence, Mr. Cuff!"

"Each?" says the Sergeant.

"Both together!" says Mrs. Yolland. "Three and sixpence for the two."

"Given away, ma'am," says the Sergeant, shaking his head. "Clean given away!"

"There's the money," says Mrs. Yolland, getting back sideways to the little heap of silver on the table, as if it drew her in spite of herself. "The tin case and the dog chains were all she bought, and all she took away. One and ninepence and three and sixpence—total, five and three. With my love and respects—and I can't find it in my conscience to take a poor girl's savings, when she may want them herself."

"I can't find it in my conscience, ma'am, to give the money back," says Sergeant Cuff. "You have as good as made her a present of the things—you have indeed."

"Is that your sincere opinion, Sir?" says Mrs. Yolland, brightening up wonderfully.

"There can't be a doubt about it," answered the Sergeant. "Ask Mr. Betteredge."

It was no use asking me. All they got out of me was, "Good-night."

"Bother the money!" says Mrs. Yolland. With those words she appeared to lose all command over herself; and, making a sudden snatch at the heap of silver, put it back, holus-bolus, in her pocket. "It upsets one's temper, it does, to see it lying there, and nobody taking it," cries this unreasonable woman, sitting down with a thump, and looking at Sergeant Cuff, as much as to say, "It's in my pocket again now—get it out if you can!"

This time I not only went to the door but went fairly out on the road back. Explain it how you may, I felt as if one or both of them had mortally offended me. Before I had taken three steps down the village I heard the Sergeant behind me.

"Thank you for your introduction, Mr. Betteredge," he said. "I am indebted to the fisherman's wife for an entirely new sensation. Mrs. Yolland has puzzled me."

It was on the tip of my tongue to have given him a sharp answer, for no better reason than this—that I was out of temper with him, because I was out of temper with myself. But when he owned to being puzzled, a comforting doubt crossed my mind whether any great harm had been done after all. I waited in discreet silence to hear more.

"Yes," says the Sergeant, as if he was actually reading my thoughts in the dark. "Instead of putting me on the scent, it may console you to know, Mr. Betteredge (with your interest in Rosanna), that you have been the means of throwing me off. What the girl has done to-night is clear enough, of course. She has joined the two chains, and has fastened them to the hasp in the tin case. She has sunk the case, in the water or in the quicksand. She has made the loose end of the chain fast to some place under the rocks, known only to herself. And she will leave the case secure at its anchorage till the present proceedings have come to an end; after which she can privately pull it up again out of its hiding-place, at her own leisure and convenience. All perfectly plain, so far. But," says the Sergeant, with the first tone of impatience in his voice that I had heard yet, "the mystery is—what the devil has she hidden in the tin case?"

I thought to myself, "The Moonstone!" But I only said to Sergeant Cuff, "Can't you guess?"

"It's not the Diamond," says the Sergeant. "The whole experience of my life is at fault if Rosanna Spearman has got the Diamond."

On hearing those words the infernal detective-fever began, I suppose, to burn in me again. At any rate, I forgot myself in the interest of guessing this new riddle. I said rashly, "The stained dress!"

Sergeant Cuff stopped short in the dark, and laid his hand on my arm.

"Is any thing thrown into that quicksand of yours ever thrown up on the surface again?" he asked.

"Never," I answered. "Light or heavy, whatever goes into the Shivering Sand is sucked down and seen no more."

"Does Rosanna Spearman know that?"

"She knows it as well as I do."

"Then," says the Sergeant, "what on earth has she got to do but to tie up a b... of stone in the stained dress and throw it into the quicksand? There isn't the shadow of a reason why she should have hidden it—and yet she must have hidden it. Query," says the Sergeant, walking on again, "is the paint-stained dress a petticoat or a night-gown? or is it something else which there is a reason for preserving at any risk? Mr. Betteredge, if nothing occurs to prevent it, I must go to Frizinghall to-morrow, and discover what she bought in the town, when she privately got the materials for making the substitute dress. It's a risk to leave the house as things are now—but it's a worse risk still to stir another step in this matter in the dark. Excuse my being a little out of temper; I'm degraded in my own estimation—I have let Rosanna Spearman puzzle me."

When we got back the servants were at supper. The first person we saw in the outer yard was the policeman whom Superintendent Seegrave had left at the Sergeant's disposal. The Sergeant asked if Rosanna Spearman had returned. Yes. When? Nearly an hour since. What had she done? She had gone up stairs to take off her bonnet and cloak—and she was now at supper quietly with the rest.

Without making any remark Sergeant Cuff walked on, sinking lower and lower in his own estimation, to the back of the house. Missing the entrance in the dark he went on (in spite of my calling to him) till he was stopped by a wicket-gate which led into the garden. When I joined him to bring him back by the right way I found that he was looking up attentively at one particular window, on the bedroom floor, at the back of the house.

Looking up in my turn I discovered that the object of his contemplation was the window of Miss Rachel's room, and that lights were passing backward and forward there as if something unusual was going on.

"Isn't that Miss Verinder's room?" asked Sergeant Cuff.

I replied that it was, and invited him to go in with me to supper. The Sergeant remained in his place, and said something about enjoying the smell of the garden at night. I left him to his enjoyment. Just as I was turning in at the door I heard The Last Rose of Summer at the wicket-gate. Sergeant Cuff had made another discovery! And my young lady's window was at the bottom of it this time!

That latter reflection took me back again to the Sergeant, with a polite intimation that I could not find it in my heart to leave him by himself. "Is there any thing you don't understand up there?" I added, pointing to Miss Rachel's window.

Judging by his voice, Sergeant Cuff had suddenly risen again to the right place in his own estimation. "You are great people for betting in Yorkshire, are you not?" he asked.

"Well?" I said. "Suppose we are?"

"If I was a Yorkshireman," proceeded the Sergeant, taking my arm, "I would lay you an even sovereign, Mr. Betteredge, that your young lady has suddenly resolved to leave the house. If I won on that event, I should offer to lay another sovereign that the idea has occurred to her within the last hour."

The first of the Sergeant's guesses startled me. The second mixed itself up somehow in my head with the report we had heard from the policeman, that Rosanna Spearman had returned from the sands within the last hour. The two together had a curious effect on me as we went in to supper. I shook off Sergeant Cuff's arm, and, forgetting my manners, pushed by him through the door to make my own inquiries for myself.

Samuel, the footman, was the first person I met in the passage.

"Her ladyship is waiting to see you and Sergeant Cuff," he said, before I could put any questions to him.

"How long has she been waiting?" asked the Sergeant's voice behind me.

"For the last hour, Sir."

There it was again! Rosanna had come back; Miss Rachel had taken some resolution out of the common; and my lady had been waiting to see the Sergeant—all within the last hour! It was not pleasant to find these very different persons and things linking themselves together in this way. I went on up stairs, without looking at Sergeant Cuff or speaking to him. My hand took a sudden fit of trembling as I lifted it to knock at my mistress's door.

"I shouldn't be surprised," whispered the Sergeant over my shoulder, "if a scandal was to burst up in the house to-night. Don't be alarmed! I have put the muzzle on worse family difficulties than this in my time."

As he said the words I heard my mistress's voice calling to us to come in.

MY VALENTINE'S STORY.

PART I.

HOW I MET MY VALENTINE.

I WAS at Combe Minor, which had been my home from my birth. My father had died seven years before last Valentine's Day, and left my mother, with a daughter by her first husband just ten years my senior, and myself. Seven years ago from last Valentine's Day I was sixteen years of age, and Julia Moore, my step-sister, was six-and-twenty. But my father had a son by an earlier marriage, and when this son came to take possession of Combe Minor he came as a widower, bringing Bertrand, Oliver, and Jack with him. A year after our father's death my half-brother married Julia Moore; and a year before the day when I stood, as I have said, on the door-step of Combe Minor, my mother had married her third husband, Sir Godfrey Selby, and they were keeping St. Valentine's Day in Northumberland, amidst wind and snow. No wonder that, on every account, I preferred the soft Devonshire air and the sweet flowers of our sunny home. So I was twenty-three and Bertrand was fifteen, and not my Valentine, because he was my nephew: and so we started on our early walk. There was a winding drive by the edge of the wood, where rock cropped out, and holly glittered, and the willow had begun to show golden buds. This drive led by the moss well and the old quarry, so picturesquely planted with larch, to the north lodge; and Bertie and I trod the way gayly, our steps making crisp echoing sounds in the clear, frosty air, and the birds singing in the sun that set all Nature sparkling.

The old fancy, that the first man we met was to be my Valentine for the ensuing year, made fun for Bertie, who, being a very merry-hearted, and also a very clever boy, kept me laughing in spite of the mock indignation with which I had to meet some of his most daring imaginations.

"You'll never be married this year. Oh, Gracey! 'Nobody coming to marry me, nobody coming to woo!' Eh! who's that?"

We had just caught sight of the lodge, and we saw a stranger standing, as if irresolute. The stranger then knocked at the lodge-door and walked in.

"Now, fair play, dear, good, unfortunate Aunt Gracey. It won't do unless he comes out, and walks on, and meets us honestly. The first you meet, not see. You are out of luck—you are—no!"

And here the stranger reappeared, and walked toward us quite as unwaveringly and with as much intention as could be expected of any Valentine under any circumstances throughout the whole "West Countrie."

"All right!" said Bertie, in a low voice; "don't flinch. Bear up bravely, Gracey. I'll stand by you. It will be all over in a moment. Look him in the face, that you may know him again."

I could have beaten the boy for the drollery he threw into his small impertinences, for I could not keep my face grave, and the stranger was a fine, tall, handsome-looking man, walking straight in the middle of the road, and inspecting us with very evident attention.

"Hold your tongue, Bertie!"

"Don't be agitated—keep your self-possession. Trust in me—guide, philosopher, and friend!"

Here we were brought to a stand suddenly by the stranger stopping close before us and saying, "Bertrand Lawrence! I know your name. I asked at the lodge." Then he took off his hat to me.

My Valentine looked five-and-thirty years of age, with a face a good deal bronzed, and very dark hair. He had a mustache but no whisker nor beard; he was what any body might call handsome, and he had an indescribable look of power about him. I don't mean bodily strength, though he had that too. But he had a certain sweetness of expression on his somewhat massive face, as if he was gentle with the gentleness of one who could play with life because he had tamed it into submission to him. All this struck me as he lifted his hat, and said, "Miss Lawrence." Then he went on, speaking to Bertie. "Is your father at home? I am called Deverel—James Deverel. Do you know my name?"

"Major Deverel is expected on a visit to my father next week."

"Yes. I wrote and said I would come. I was then engaged this week to the Robertsons, near Torquay. But they telegraphed to me at Lord Marston's to say they had illness in the house, and had been put in quarantine—couldn't have me. So I came here straight. It will be an early 'morning-call' if you can't take me in. I have left my luggage at the station."

By this time Major Deverel was walking with us toward the house. He soon said, "Do you always walk as early as this, Miss Lawrence?"

I could not help stammering; but Bertie spoke honestly. "It's the best joke in the world. We made an engagement last night to walk out together to-day early. Valentine's Day, you know. The first man Aunt Grace met was to be her Valentine. We west-country people believe all kinds of superstitions, and that is one. We promised to tell the truth to Oliver and Jack, which was but fair, as we had refused their company. Now we shall carry you back as proof positive; the Valentine not only seen, but captured and brought home. You are Grace's Valentine, Major Deverel, and I hope you will do your year's service properly."

Major Deverel stood still. He looked at Bertie, and he looked at me. "I had never thought of it!" he said. "Valentine's Day! Well, so it is! Valentine's Day—never thought of it once, even."

His manner was very strange. I saw that it was provocative of Bertie's mirth, so I began to talk to Major Deverel of Devonshire customs, and the odd fancies that we kept in remembrance in our old-fashioned place.

Major Deverel got as good a welcome as any man could have desired. He and my brother had been at school together. My brother had gone to Cambridge, then to the bar, and had been going the Western Circuit, when his friend, Frank Deverel, had been through hard fighting in India. They had seen each other but seldom, but had corresponded without intermission; and now it was pleasant to see my brother of forty years of age and his friend, a few years younger, standing with grasped hands, looking in each other's faces, recalling old memories, both very happy in the old friendship so faithfully cherished and so suddenly gratified by this pleasant appearance on Valentine's Day.

We had breakfast; and after breakfast I heard Major Deverel say how strangely fast my brother had seemed to run through life—only forty, and twice married; with three boys, and an eldest son shooting up into manhood. "Why, my life," he said, "has got to begin—my home life, I mean; at least, I hope so. After all," he said, "the great struggle of youth carried into battle-fields full of danger, failur of thought, and a responsibility that shuts self out of one's mind, is not the life that a man looks forward to. The patriarchal vine-and-fig-tree life advances upon one in a sort of vision, and claims one's sympathy. Yes," he added, thoughtfully, "and comes in some of one's best moments, I think." I felt quite touched. I confessed that my Valentine entertained some most admirable sentiments. "But I should not have dared to begin so early though," he said, with an honesty of tone and manner that made me hate him. In fact, before luncheon-time I should have had greatly preferred me, and I had said to myself, "There is something odd about him." He kept on betraying the drollest sort of interest in the Valentine's Day, and once, in the most unaccountable manner, wondered what would happen before the end of it.

"Nothing more extraordinary than an assemblage of friends in the evening," said Julia, with her pretty, confiding, sympathetic smile. I was pleased to see that Major Deverel admired her.

"Oh!" he exclaimed, "a party of friends would you call them all about there?"

And then he sat down by Julia's work-table, and cut open the leaves of a book in a peculiarly careful and deliberate way, which made me, once more, entertain a good opinion of my Valentine. He heard about Lawsons and Robertses, Fairviles, Bathursts, and Hepburns, and asked questions as to sex, age, family, fortune—once more he was growing unaccountably interesting—once more I listened, and took it all in, and added to Valentine's Day. "Valentine's Day! Never thought of it!" and when he ended his inquiries with every one, I remarked, "And eighteen hundred and sixty-six, too," I really thought him crazy.

Before dinner I had been both charmed and bewildered by our new guest several times. I liked, I disliked, I wondered; but with all I think I liked him.

When we had assembled for dinner in our smart clothes I thought Major Deverel the finest-looking man I had ever seen—by which I mean as a man to be proud of. We ladies left the dinner-table early, for we had some little arrangements to make for the entertainment of the gentlemen who were expected in the evening. We had not been many minutes out of the dining-room when the three boys came in, and joined us in the morning-room where our friends were to have tea on their arrival.

"Oh, Grace, he is the best fellow going. He will do any thing—every thing—we will have charades!"

I asked, "Did Major Deverel propose charades?"

"Oh no; you can't get him to propose any thing. He only with the utmost ease on Valentine's Day," he said.

Our boys were very fond of acting, and with very little help from others they said I had got up several successful charades that winter. They were all impromptu characters. We fixed upon a word and then the letters should be expressed, and then left all the acting and the dialogue to the inspiration of the moment. I knew that we wished for charades, and of course I knew they would have all their wishes as far as possible fulfilled. They had been brought up on the very first (not over) liberal principle, and were not the least spoilt by it. So charades we were to have, and Major Deverel was to act with us.

"Had he ever acted?" "Hundreds of times, no doubt." "Had he ever acted impromptu charades?" "Nobody knew." Hum! His readiness to every thing—says he would not advise, nor contradict, nor suggest, nor refuse, nor doubt, nor run away—and yet I want more than that. Don't be afraid, Gracey. Let us fix on a word.

But I was afraid. Our friends were arriving in a dozen people every five minutes, and somehow I had no idea of making an exhibition of myself with my Valentine, who had several times treated this Valentine's Day as being a serious epoch in his life, and as something to be endured with vague wonderings, and so odd anxiety which he tried to hide from the world; but which was something quite real, and, as it seemed to me, very plain to see, and altogether impossible to account for.

More carriages, more bell-ringing, more greetings, more tea! My battle with Bertie was lost. I was defeated. He went to the charades; and the first word to be acted was to be Fearful, out of compliment to me. "You are in that unreasonable state of agitation that you will scarcely need to act any thing, Gracey." I could only sit and smile; I was beaten, and very amiable under my misfortune.

Now the room in which we acted was a long drawing-room. Standing at the top of it (by means of your back) and the length of over thirty-three feet you saw two doors; one was at the end of the room on the right hand and led into a library, the other at the side, as far down as could be, and led into the hall. Our only preparation for our favorite pastime was to bring into the room two large screens. They were so placed as to divide off the end of the room which was to be our stage, and to hide the two doors by which we came on and went off. The middle space between the screens was marked off by a row of wax-lights on the floor, and a fence made to be made by throwing two rooms together, by which means there were two fire-places. One was at the end opposite our stage, the other in the centre of the left-hand side, and opposite the windows. They had grates and chimney-pieces exactly alike, and each had a looking-glass which reached up to the cornice of the room. The glass over the side chimney-piece could be seen perfectly by the actors, and when at the farther end of the stage our "situations" were reflected in it.

Before the charade began I spoke to Major Deverel. "The syllable four is to be a scene with bustit, you know; you are to be just entering the stage from the library. I and my friends, and our friends, are to be seated on the stage in a state of terror, the bandit having robbed us and turned us out of our carriage. I rush up to you to save me, and you, who was intending with the drollest half-smile on his attentive face. I know I looked alarmed for the success of any thing that he might be concerned in, and he read my thoughts exactly.

"Don't be frightened before the time," he said, "I will not spoil your acting. Whatever you may do I shall do exactly as I ought to do. I mean, as I should do if so placed in real life. Now give Bertie a leading part for you."

What outrageous, silly confidence! And yet he spoke so pleasantly that I could not scold.

Bertie was to be four; a blazing torch in the work to be begun instantly glowed in his handsome face, and he said, "Oh, Major, have you pistols? Ah, you have, you cool cock!" then saw that he had a cloak on, and pistols strapped round him. "Your father dressed us," he said. "I have not done any thing myself."

So with the stream this Valentine's Day, and make the best of the place on which the stream may land me; that is all I am going to do."

I can only add to this record of our conversation that I was more puzzled than ever by Major Deverel's words and manner, and found myself on the stage informing my audience, by means of a talk with my friends, that we had left our home in high-carriage for the luxury of an afternoon walk while proceeding toward Naples on an October day.

Off we went, and on came the banditti by the library door behind us. Their evil intentions were announced in the same fashion, and they passed off as we had. The stage was then occupied by Major Deverel, supposed to be on a walking expedition. From the wings I could see that a bunch of sunflowers women rushed back to the stage. The maid on her knees in a paroxysm of fright, the footman defending us to the last, and myself, and I rushing up to Major Deverel crying "Save us!"

Then in a moment a grand tableau was formed. I found myself within the Major's strong left arm; and I confess I struggled, for I had not intended my rush to be quite so violent. Every bit of my arm was feather compared to his strength. With a power which I don't forget he drew me closer to him, and held me against his left side of his iron arm. I glanced up to his face. What a face it was! His right arm was stretched out, and the pistol in his hand covered the head of the banditti, Master Bertie, who looked mesmerized under the earnest, glowing face, and steady, triumphant eye. I saw the light, the half-smile, the drollest half-smile, the attentive look. He put his pistol into his belt, and said, as it to himself, "The queerest thing in the world. I'm glad it's over in full dress."

"What is queer, and what is over?" I said—we were rearranging ourselves in the light-chairs—"what is queer?" I asked, trying and by.

The word "full" was acted by a busy post man delivering valentines to a crowd of the most fun, and from whose full bags they filled pockets, baskets, brown-paper parcels. It was made a very merry scene by the boys and girls, our friends, who made the gathering crowd till the stage was full, and the curtain dropped again.

The whole word was a recapitulation of the bandit dumb-show, and was badly excellently acted by Mary Drake, who really worked herself up to a very fearful state while I played the part of her in her power. Then came the petal interruptions, caused by the remedies she so constantly called for, permitted.

There were two more charades, but the Major's acting—the force, the interest, the expression he had put into his part—formed the topic of the night. Every body had "felt it so!" That was the general experience; it found expression in many forms. Every one was pleased, reached home of course. All the answer he made was, "I never acted in my life—never took part in any charade before."

PART II.

A SOLDIER'S WOOING.

WHEN all our friends had gone, and we were alone, standing about in the supper-room, my brother cold Major Deverel that he had never seen such acting as in that first charade, adding, "I am very glad we had you to do it."

"Yes," he said, "it was the best corner." But to me it was not acting. For one moment I saw, reflected in the great glass over the side fire-place, the whole scene. It was in every particular the counterpart of something I had seen before. I dare say I had forgotten it, I never had given it much solemnity stirred. I never wanted all the courage I could command more than at that moment when my self-charged and poised us. When the curtain dropped, by Jove! how glad I was!"

"Well now I am sure he is mad," was my whisper, as I refreshed myself with a glass of wine offered gallantly by Bertie; but Julia seemed to understand better.

"How strange!" she exclaimed. "May we not know all about it? Won't you tell us?" You know how often how real that moment seemed. Do tell us—tell us now."

"If you please," Major Deverel said. So we sat down, and he began.

"It is a very strange story, and I am not going to try to account for it. I shall leave you to do that if you choose to try. I shall tell facts in few words—so here I begin. Some years ago I was at Constantinople. I was with a party of friends, and others joined us. We were all 'on leave' of one sort or other and ready to enjoy ourselves; and we all messed together at a French tavern in the suburb called Pera, where we lived and enjoyed ourselves greatly. We were a party of nine as nearly as I can recollect; English, French, Irish, and Scotch; I was the only Englishman, I know.

"One day I was told that a very intelligent Scotchman was silent, and apparently distressed, at our dinner; and afterward I was told by a friend of his that the moment of your future life that you liked to ask for. But if you fixed on a moment in the future beyond the term of your life, you beheld only a hideous blank—I say hideous, because the blank had an effect of the most desponding description on all who beheld it. There was only darkness and nothingness. The end of the room seemed to be gone, and all things gone with it. The strongest young men had been said to have fainted when this revelation of utter loss had been made to them. Such a revelation had been made to this Scotch friend. He had asked to see what that moment would be on that day two years, and had been answered by the awful darkness I have mentioned. After a day or two I determined to go to this sorcerer myself. I told my French friend, who tried, but in vain, to dissuade me. I would not listen. He refused to go with me, so I took an Irishman, a general favorite, with me. We were called 'Paddy and Mick' know why I went. I think I felt it would do Patterson, the Scotchman, good if a few of us were in a similar predicament with himself. I know I had no belief whatever in these prophetic visions being true. O'Neil and I paid our visit to the 'Wise Man' on Valentine's Day, and we set out—or rather in the evening—in fact, just before nine o'clock. No difficulty of any kind was made. I got quite glad—half seriously, for I was going to do it as cheaply as I could. He said, 'Double that; you will require more than one vision.' I said 'Shortly that I required one;' and that O'Neil would be with me. He told me to take back the gold, for to have O'Neil with me was quite unnecessary. I agreed then to go by myself, and we went up stairs. The man lived in such a house as the more opulent Turks inhabit—built round a court, with a fountain playing in the middle. I remember that the drip of the water seemed to add to the strange silence in this man's dwelling, rather than to break it. Every drop was heard so perfectly, telling of the unnatural quiet, as the very ticking of a clock of the silent passage of time is heard through the court together, up a great marble staircase, and through a passage where the walls were painted and inlaid in places with ivory, jasper, and mother-of-pearl in the most tasteless, ignorant way. We got at last into a great empty hall or gallery, perfectly dark except for a circle of small lamps that burned about two feet from the floor in the centre of the room, a circle of which I could guess. In a moment I got accustomed to the dim light, and then I saw that the 'Wise Man' was standing at the very farthest point from me, hiding out his arm in the dark.

He had before told me only to speak when he spoke to me. Presently he said, 'Ask for the information you require.' I said, 'Tell me time next year.' I felt the room grow warmer. I perceived a highly fragrant scent as of some rare perfume coming from the end of the room grew brighter and brighter, something as you may see at sunrise, though the light was less startling, and the room grew, like a thing being revealed out of the wavy light and the receding darkness, I saw a distinct scene—a scene which I can see for its permanence, no one could have distinguished from real life. There were two men on the ground; one was dead—I knew that, even him. Himself, my own self, apparently dying. An Indian was on his knees trying to stanch the blood that flowed from a wound which I could not see. I looked at it steadily. I took in every particular—more people appeared in hazy outlines, and a horse—then the illusion was over, and the room was gone. The man was at my side before I knew that he had left the place where I had been. He said, 'Is it over?' I said, 'Ask for another?' I said, 'I don't know—wait.' 'Don't speak till you are spoken to.' I will ask you again soon.'

"In this silent interval I wondered with myself what it was wisest to do. The question, 'Did I die?' occurred. 'Did I die?' I suppose I ought to say—was so strong within me that I felt it would be best, at all risks, to answer it. If the next picture was to be the dismal blank I should know what I feared—if not, I should fear no more. It was best to know. So when I was asked, 'Will you see more?' I said, 'Yes.'

"What moment shall it be?' The voice came again from the farthest corner. I said, 'This same five years.' I said, 'Five years.'

"What came?' asked my brother.

"Why this night—the moment when I held her in with my left arm and pointed my pistol at Bertie."

"Did you see Bertie?"

"I saw only myself and a woman just as she was. I knew the cloak when you put it on me. As I covered the lad with the pistol I caught the flash of the lock in the looking-glass, and one glance gave me the scene complete, myself with my pistol pointed, and your sister in my left arm.

"When I had seen this scene, too, fade away, the sorcerer said, 'You will see another?' But I answered, 'That I shall carve out my life by myself in spite of you,' and I came away."

"And is this night the very night—the fifth anniversary?"

"Yes, it is. I never thought of it till I met you to-day in the drive, and Bertie said it was Valentine's Day."

"And what of the first scene—did that come to pass?" asked Julia.

"Yes. That very day year at the same hour. I was stationed at Quebec. We had been out on a hunting excursion with some friendly Indians. A hundred tribe knew of us, and some of them on horseback came upon us. One man was killed, and the flow of blood from withdrawing an arrow which killed I had been trying to make me so faint that, till an Indian stanched it by making a tourniquet with a handkerchief, I could not be moved. You will not wonder at my having betrayed my interest in all that to-day might bring to me, and in my saying I would do anything—that I would go with the stream. I really do believe that, in unbelieving matters, some sort of 'black art' is practiced still."

Here this strange story ended, and we went to bed, and some of us dreamed of it.

The next morning, which was as bright as the preceding one, I met Major Deverel in the hall. It was my office to make breakfast. He stood by me. The clock struck nine.

"About this hour yesterday I met you in the drive. It struck nine when I was making inquiries at the lodge."

There was something odd in his manner, I thought. I said, "My sister and brother are late this morning."

"Tired with my long story?" he said.

"Not very long, but very strange."

"I will tell it you as long as we can," he said—"till death us do part?"

And his pleasant, promising eyes were upon me.

"Oh, Major Deverel, it is only twenty-four hours! 'A soldier's wooing—'"

"I should like nothing so much in the world," said a voice—my sister's. My self had come in, and hearing the last words had answered them.

And certainly, before twelve o'clock, I had had a sort of "wooing," but balanced by as many "ifs" as I craftily thought would serve to make it "No" whenever I pleased. And now, as I look back, I remember that my sister Julia did not pay as much attention to those "ifs" as I intended. He afterward even denied that he had heard them at all.

PLEASANT TALK vs. GOOD LOOKS.

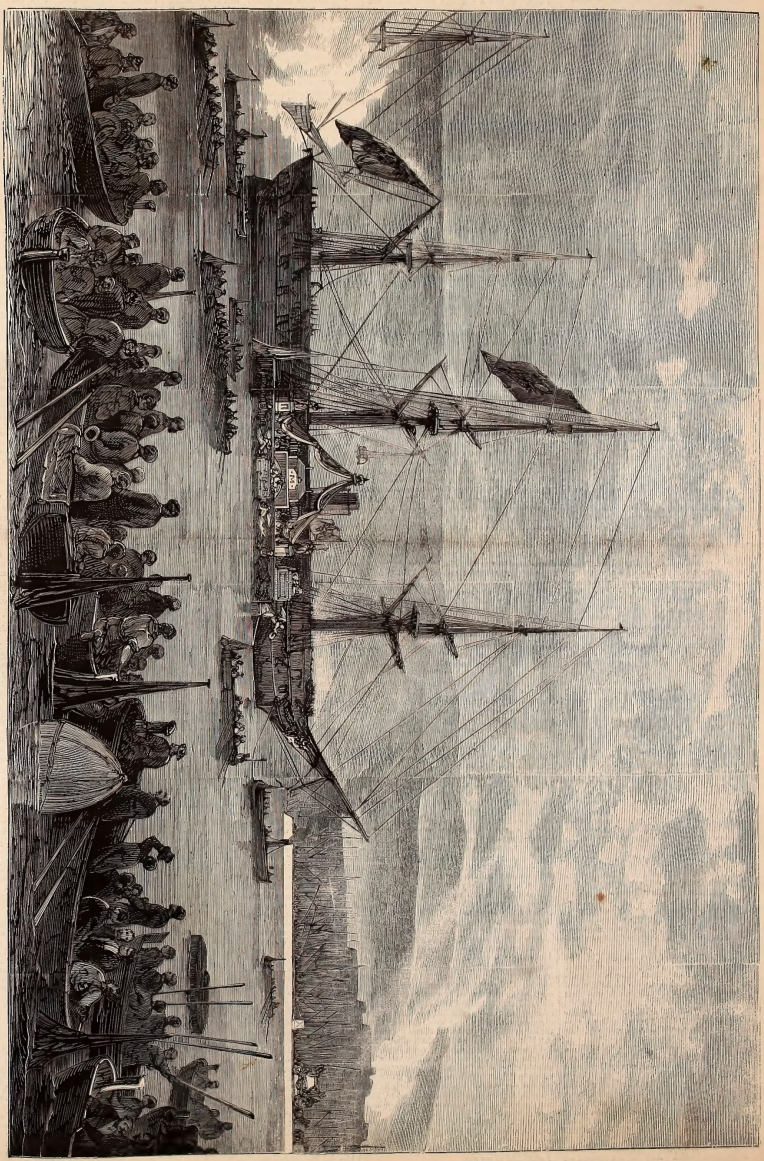
HOWEVER much Mr. Carlyle and others (who, by-the-by, are themselves rather voluminous in their literary works—and what author is not?) may belittle literary works—and what author is not?) may depreciate talk, it is certain that it is the possession of this faculty which places in the hands of orators and men of letters (and, writing?) may depreciate talk, it is certain that it is the possession of this faculty which places in the hands of orators and men of letters, even when they are not brilliant conversationists, which Mr. Darwin finds it most difficult to bridge over. It is talk which initiates all our social life. It is talk which makes it always the tongue which is the Gate-way. The preservation of a young woman from the pursuit of a mad troll, or the rescue of a fellow-creature from drowning, are opportunities that do not take place in real life so often as in novels. The mutually satisfactory proposition of an opinion, the eloquent eulogy of a pursuit, or the witty defence of a pastime; in short, a few pleasant words, well spoken, upon any subject, form the best introduction to our fellow-creatures, and do more to attract them to us than any material advantage, real estate, indeed, the personal beauty of a woman. It is the knowledge of the power of this latter class which makes Lecturers and women command such foolish Talkers. They have only to show their faces to win at once, not only the audiences, but the wits and witty, but (supposing at least they are of the masculine gender) the wise and witty themselves. Why, then, they argue, should we talk about the power of speech, when our eyes and lips are more eloquent than others' tongues? A question, however difficult it may be to answer conversationally, to which they will one day receive a terribly conclusive reply.



The good looks of a man, or a squinting Wilkes could, only avail him with a woman, against one better skilled in the art of conversation, for the first quarter of an hour; and if he be not a man of sex, it may be added, for a considerably less space of time. It was not by his pretty spots and gorgeous scales that the serpent persuaded Eve, but by the flicker of his forked tongue. It is much easier to captivate a woman's eyes than her ears, the favorable impression on men. The former have almost always some enthusiasm to be sympathized with, some accomplishment to be flattered, and they are eager to exhibit their likes and dislikes; the latter are often undemonstrative, and even argumentative. It is as difficult to please them as to tickle trout.

THE HOSPITAL FOR INCURABLES.

BLACKWELL'S ISLAND is at once a prison, an asylum, and a hospital; it has cells for criminals, a garden for the insane, and a temporary tomb for the diseased. When a man has paid the funeral penalty of dissipation, and is so bankrupt in health and pocket—incurably diseased and unexpectedly poor—that even Bellevue disdains to strike him, he is sent, at the city's expense, to Blackwell's Island Hospital for Incurables. Visitors dissipent and die at the "Hospital for Incurables." Several hundred poor shattered wrecks of humanity—male and female—are here provided with refuge—a sort of last half-way house between Vanity Fair and Potter's Field. The scene portrayed in our illustration will convey a correct idea of frequent occurrence. Visits on page 136 is one of frequent occurrence. Visits to the Hospital are numerous; and most of those who visit the Island carry provisions and other creature comforts for the afflicted residents.

SCENE IN THE HOSPITAL FOR INCURABLES ON BLACKWELL'S ISLAND.—SKETCHED BY W. S. L. JEWETT.—[SEE PAGE 135.]

ARRIVAL OF THE BODY OF PRINCE MAXIMILIAN OF MIRAMAR AT TRIESTE, JANUARY 16, 1868.—[See Page 132.]

THROUGH THE WORLD.

SOME hearts go lungering through the world
And never find the love they seek;
Some lips with pride or scorn are curled
To hide the pain they may not speak.
The eye may flash, the mouth may smile,
The voice in gladdest music thrill,
And yet beneath them all the while
The hungry heart be pining still.

These know their doom, and walk their way
With level steps and steadfast eyes,
Nor strive with Fate, nor weep, nor pray—
While others, seek so sadly wise,
Are mocked by phantoms evermore,
And lured by seemings of delight,
Fair to the last as the one
Holding but bitter dust and blight.

I see them gaze from wistful eyes,
I mark their sign on fading cheeks;
I hear them breathe in smothered sighs,
And note the grief that never speaks:
For them no might redresses wrong,
No cry with piety is impeached,
O misconstrued and suffering long,
O hearts that hunger through the world!

For you does life's dull desert hold
No fantasied shade, no date-grove fair,
No gush of waters clear and cold,
But sandy reaches wide and bare,
The foot may fail, the soul may faint,
And weigh to earth the weary frame,
Yet still ye make no weak complaint,
And speak no word of grief or blame.

O eager eyes which gaze afar!
O arms which clasp the empty air!
Not all unmarked your sorrows are,
Not all unpraised your despair,
Smile, patient lips so proudly dumb!
When life's frail tent at last is furled
Your glorious compensation shall come,
O hearts that hunger through the world!

MY NEIGHBOR NELLY.

By MISS THACKERAY.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART III.

NELLY paid her visit to her godmother, and came back; and every one went into mourning, and the trees were all in full foliage again in the Dingle, and the cricketers had returned to the Green; but still Captain Llewellyn was not completely detained. Nelly had come home looking much better than when she went away. His name still disturbed her sometimes; I could see, though I don't suppose a stranger who knew nothing of the circumstances would have found it out. And when Mrs. Mulgrave returned as well as ever, him her sister shrunk up into herself; but otherwise Nelly was much improved. She recovered her cheerful ways; she became the soul of all our friendly parties again. I said to myself that I had been a truer prophet than I had the least hope of, and that she was not the sort of girl to let herself be crushed in any such way. But she never spoke to me of her sister's marriage, nor of her sister's betrothal. I mentioned the matter one day when we were alone, cruelly and of set purpose, to see what she would say. "When your sister is married, and you are married," I said, "it will be very dull both for the Admiral and me."

"I shall never marry," said Nelly, with a sudden closing up and veiling of her brightness which was quite expressive than words. "I don't know about Sister; but you need not weave any such visions for me."

"All girls say so till their time comes," said I, with an attempt to be playful; "but why do you say you don't know about Martha? she must be married before me, of course."

"I suppose so," said Nelly, and then she stopped short; she would not add another word; but afterward, when we were all together, she broke out suddenly. Martha's conversation at this period was very much occupied with her marriage. I suppose it was quite natural that the young days girls were shy of talking much on that subject; but things are changed now. Martha talked of it continually: of what she would could come; of his probable desire that the wedding should take place at once; of her determination to have two months at least to go upon the trousseau; of where they would go after the marriage. She talked about one thing, without the smallest idea, poor girl, of what was passing in the minds of the listeners. At last, after hearing a great deal of this for a long time, Nelly suddenly burst forth with—

"How strange it would be, after all, if we were to turn out after a couple of old maids!" she cried, "and never to marry at all. The two old sisters! with chairs on each side of the fire, and great authorities in the village. How droll it would be! and not so very unlikely after all."

"Speak for yourself!" cried Martha, indignantly. "It is very unlikely so far as I am concerned. I am as good as married already. As for you, you can do what you please—"

"Yes, I can do what I please," said Nelly, with a curious ring in her voice; and then she added: "But I should not wonder if we were both old maids after all."

"She is very queer," Martha said to me when her sister had left the room, in an aggrieved tone. "She does not mean it, of course; but I don't like it, Mrs. Mulgrave. It does not seem lucky. Why should she take it into her head about our being old maids? I am as good as married now."

"Yes," I said, vaguely. I could not give any assent more cordial. And then she resumed her anticipations. But I saw in a moment what Nelly meant. This was how she thought it was to end. It was a romantic girl's notion, but happily she was too young to think how unlikely it was. No doubt she saw a vision of the two maiden sisters, and of one who would be their devoted friend, but who could never marry either. That was the explanation she had put in her heart upon his abrupt departure and his many delays. He had made a fatal mistake, and its consequences were to last all his life. They were all three, all their lives long, to continue in the same sense. He could never marry either of them; and neither of them, none of the three, were ever to be tempted to marry another. And thus, in a pathetic climax of faithfulness and delicate self-sacrifice, they were to grow old and die. Nelly was no longer miserable when she had framed this ideal in her mind. It seemed to her the most natural solution of the difficulty. The romance, instead of ending in a prosaic marriage, was to last all their lives. And the eldest of them, Llewellyn himself, was but seven-and-twenty! Poor Nelly thought it the most likely thing in the world.

If she had consulted me I could have told her of something much more likely—something which very soon started upon the stage of village people at Dinglefield Green. It was that a certain regiment had come back to the barracks which were not very far from our neighborhood. Before Captain Llewellyn made his appearance among us, there had been a Major Frost who "paid attention" to Martha; and he did not seem at all disinclined to pay attention to her now that he had come back. Though full of all of her engagement, the information seemed to have very little effect upon him. He came over perpetually, and was always at hand to ride, or walk, or drive, or flirt, as the young ladies felt disposed. Before he had been back a fortnight it seemed to me that Martha had begun to flirt with him as well as Ellis. By degrees she came the length of confessing that dear Ellis wrote very seldom. I had found out that fact for myself, but she had never made any reference to it before. I watched her with an interest which surpassed every other interest in my life at that moment. I forgot even Nelly, and took no notice of her in comparison. The older sister absorbed me altogether. By degrees she came to talking of her marriage, and of her wedding-dress, and where they were to live; and she began to talk of Major Frost. He seemed always to be hiding in her memory, which she had to repeat; and he told her very private details, with which she could have nothing to do. She told her that he was a brother of Ellis's when he was last at the Green. Somebody had died and had left him a great deal of money. He was thinking of leaving the army, and of living a place in our county, if possible. He asked Martha's advice where he should go. "It is odd that he should ask me, is it not?" I said to her one day, when she was re-confiding to me a great deal of Major Frost's personal affairs; and though she was not modest, there was a certain hesitation, something called upon Martha's cheek by the shadow of a blush.

"I think it is quite natural," she said; "we are such old friends; and then he knows I am engaged. I always thought he was very nice—didn't you? I don't think he will ever marry," Martha added, with a certain pathos. "He has so he could never be married to any one but Jean; and he can't have her now. He was poor when he was last here, you know."

"And who was the woman he could have married?" said I.

"Oh, of course I did not ask him," said Martha, with modest consciousness. "Poor fellow! it would have been cruel to ask him. It is hard that he should have got his money just after I—I mean after she was married."

"It is hard that money should always be at the bottom of every thing," said I. And though for the life of me I could not see how Martha should forget and give up Llewellyn, still I was angry with her for what she said. But that mode of evidence, from her bright, unconscious self I was not fool enough to think was wavering. She went on talking and talking with Major Frost, and seeing us all with him on the Parade-ground, till, for one, was sick of his very name. But she meant no treason. She never even thought of deserting her betrothed. If an accident had happened to bring him uppermost, she would have come back to him as of the same. She was not faithless nor fickle, not any thing but weak and wicked: she was chiefly stupid, or rather, stolid. And to think of her as a traitor was folly. The Admiral was not very quick-sighted, but evidently he had begun to notice how things were going. He came to me one day and asked me whether both the girls were out. I suppose they were at croquet somewhere. We elders found that afternoon hour, when they were busy with their balls and mallets, a very handy time for consulting about any thing which they were not intended to hear us say.

"I think I ought to write to Llewellyn," he said. "Things are in a very unsatisfactory state. I am not satisfied with Martha's manner to go away as he said. I think he might have come to see us before he tried. I have been consulting the little one about it, and she thinks with me."

"What does she think?" I asked, with breathless interest, to my Admiral's surprise.

"She thinks with me, that things are in an unsatisfactory state," he said, calmly; "that it would be far better to have it settled and over, one way or another. She is a very sensible little woman. I was just about to write to Llewellyn; but I thought it best to ask you first what your opinion was."

Should I speak and tell him all? Had I any right to tell him? The thought passed through my mind quick as lightning. I made a longer pause than I ought to have done. And then all I could find to say was,

"I think I should let things take their chance if I were you."

"What does that mean?" said the Admiral, quickly. "Take their chance! I think it is my duty to write to him, and let things be settled out of hand."

It was with this intention he left me. But he did not write; for the very next morning there came a letter from Llewellyn, not to Martha, but to her father, telling him that he was coming home. The ship had been paid off quite unexpectedly, I heard afterward. And I suppose that, unless he had been advantageous enough to give the true explanation of his conduct, he had no resource but to come back. It was a curious, abrupt sort of letter. Nelly, with a certain conscience, I think, had pricked him for his cowardice in running away; and either he had wound himself up to the point of carrying on his engagement in desperation, or else he was coming to tell his story, and ask for his release. I heard of it immediately from the Admiral himself, who was evidently not quite at ease in his mind on the subject. And a short time afterward Martha came in, dragging her sister with her, full of the news.

"I could scarcely get her to come," Martha said, "and I can't think what she always wants running after these village people. And when we have just got the news that Ellis is coming home!"

"Yes, I heard," said I. "I suppose I ought to congratulate you. Do you expect him soon? Does he say thing about—"

"Oh, he writes to papa," said Martha, interrupting my very hesitating and embarrassed speech; for my eyes were on Nelly, and I was in a moment. Only a whole experience had changed. "He could not be expected to say any thing particular to papa; but I suppose it must be very soon. I don't think he will wait to wait now he is free."

"I shall be very glad when it is all over," said Nelly, to my great surprise. It was the first time I had heard her make any comment on the subject. "I shall speak in a fuss and worry. It is very entertaining to them, I suppose, but it is rather tiresome to us. Mrs. Mulgrave, I am going to ask Molly Green; I can't bear all about the trousseau at home, you know."

"Nelly!" said I, as I kissed her; and I could not restrain a little sigh of relief. She flushed up, poor child, to her hair, but turned away with a sick impatience that went to my heart.

"If you have any thing of a night and day, as I shall have!" she said, under her breath, with an impatient sigh. And then she went away.

I knew after that what her mind as well as if she had told me. She had lost her temper and patience as well as her peace of mind. It is hard to keep one's self from a repeated pressure. She did it the first time; but she was not equal to it the second. She had no excuse to go away now. She had to sit down at every fresh visit and hear it all discussed, and go through in anticipation. She had to receive him as his future sister; to be his confidant for every thing, almost on the spot; a part of the bridal pageant, the first and closest spectator. And it was very hard to bear. As Nelly left me she sat down in a chair which she had herself worked for me, turning her fair countenance to the light. She saw nothing before her but the tempter, not any thing that happened to her. She sat waiting till I had taken my seat again, quite ready to go into the question of the trousseau. The sight of her placidity made me desperate. Suddenly there came before me the haggard looks of poor Llewellyn, and his fierce exasperation and heartsickness of my bright little Nelly's face. And then I looked at Martha, who was sitting, serene and cheerful, just in the same spot and the same attitude in which, a few days before, she had told me of Major Frost. She had left off Major Frost now and come back to her trousseau. What did it matter to her which of them it was? As for principle, or honor, or feeling, what was much or how long would she feel it? I became desperate. I fastened the door when I closed it after Nelly that she might not interrupt us; and then I came and sat down opposite to my visitor. Martha was utterly unconscious still. It never occurred to her that other people were suffering, nor to guess what was in any body's mind.

"You are quite pleased," said I, making my first assault coarsely, "that Captain Llewellyn is coming home?"

"Pleased!" said Martha. "Of course I am pleased. What a question you all are! every body might see that it is pleasanter to be settled and know what one is doing. I wish you would have some day fixed, for some day, Mrs. Mulgrave, and help me with Elise."

"My dear," said I, "in the first place, there is something else to consider. I mean Ellis and Major Frost. What do you mean to do with them?"

"I?" said Martha, opening her eyes. "He always knew I was engaged. Of course I am very sorry for him; but if he did not choose to come forward in time he could not expect that one was to wait."

"And is that how you mean to leave him," said I, severely, "after all the encouragement you have given him? Every day, for a month past, I have observed it. You say that you had made a mistake about Captain Llewellyn, and that it was the Major you liked best."

"Oh, Mrs. Mulgrave, how can you?" cried Martha, really roused. "after being engaged to Ellis a whole year. If he had come forward at the proper time, perhaps— But to make a change when every thing was settled. You never could have believed it of me—"

"If you like the other better, it is never too late to make a change," said I, carried away by my motive, which was good, and justified a little stretch of ethics. "You will be doing a dreadful injury to poor Captain Llewellyn if you marry him and like another man best."

Martha looked at me with a little simper of self-satisfaction. "I think I know my duty," she said. "I am engaged. I don't see that any thing else is of any consequence. Of course the gentleman I am engaged to is the one I shall like best."

"Do you mean that you are engaged to him because you like him best?" said I. "Martha, take care. You may be preparing great bitterness for yourself. I have no motive but your good." This was not true, but still it is a thing that every body says; and I was so much excited that I had to stop to take breath. "You may never have it in your power to make a choice again," I said, with solemnity. "You ought to pause and think seriously which of the two you love. You can not love them both. It is the most serious question you will ever have to settle in your life."

Martha looked at me with a calm surprise which drove me wild. "Dear Mrs. Mulgrave," she said, "I don't know why you should mean. I am engaged to Ellis—and Major Frost has never proposed even. He may have been only flirting, for any thing I can tell; and how foolish it would be to give up the one without any real hold on the other! but of course it is nonsense altogether. Why, Ellis is coming back on purpose; and as Major Frost did not come forward in time, I don't see how he can complain."

All this I said with the most perfect placidity, sitting opposite the window, lifting her serene countenance to the light. It was a practical concern to her, I saw. It did not seem a matter which it was; but to interfere with a thing fully arranged and settled, because of any mere question of liking! It was not to be thought of so cool as she was. Every thing seemed to me to depend upon this last throw, and I felt myself suddenly filled with the right to do it. It was not my business, to be sure; but to think of those two young creatures torn asunder and made miserable! I could not even think of the thinking of. Nelly would be free: she was young; she would not have her heart-break always kept before her, and time would lend her every help. But poor Llewellyn was bound and fettered. He could not escape nor forget. It was for him I made my last attempt.

"Martha, I have something still more serious to say to you," I said. "Do you remember, when you told me of Captain Llewellyn's proposal first, I asked you if it was not a mistake?"

"Yes, I remember very well," said Martha. "It was just like you. I never knew any one who asked such odd questions. I should have been angry if I had not known you."

"Perhaps you will be angry still," I said. "I know you will be vexed, but I can't help it. Oh, my dear, you must listen to me. It is not only your happiness that is concerned, but that of others. Martha, I have every reason to think that it was a mistake. Don't smile; I am in earnest. It was a mistake. Can't you trust yourself now little heart be puts into it? Martha, my dear, it is not too late for you. I could see you had never thought of him before he wrote to you. And it was not you he meant to write to. What am I to say to comfort you? It is true; it is not merely my idea. It was all a mistake."

"Mrs. Mulgrave," said Martha, a little moved out of her composure, "I am not angry. I might be; but I am sure you don't mean it. It is one of the fancies you take into your head. How could it be a mistake? It was not me he wrote to, not any body else. Of course I was not fond of him before; but when a man has any warm feeling for a person, how is it possible there can be any mistake?"

"Oh, Martha," I said, wringing my hands, "let me tell you all: only listen, and don't be vexed. Did you never notice all that summer how he followed Nelly about? Try and remember. He was always by her side wherever we went those two were together. Ask any body; ask Lady Denzil; ask your father. Oh, my dear child, I don't want to hurt your feelings. I want to save you from something you will be very sorry for. I want you to be happy. Can't you see what I mean without any more explanations from me?"

Martha had, notwithstanding her composure, grown pale. Her placid look had changed a little. "I do it is something about sister," she said. "Because you like her best you think every body else must like her best. I wonder why it is that you are so unkind to me!"

In speaking only because I love you all."

"You have never loved me," said Martha, weeping freely; "never, though I have been so fond of you. And now you come to make me ridiculous and miserable. How can I tell what you mean? What has sister to do with it? Ellis was civil to her, I suppose, as he was to me he proposed to. How can I tell what you are all plotting in your hearts? When people write letters to me, and ask me to marry them, am I not to believe what they say?"

"When he wrote he thought Nelly was the eldest," I said. "You know what I have always told you about your names. He wrote to her, and it came to you. Martha, believe me, it is not one of my fancies: it is true."

"How do you know it is true?" she cried, with a natural outburst of anger and indignation. "How do you dare to come and say all this now? Insulting Ellis, and sister, and me. Oh, I wish I had never known you! I wish I had never, never come into this house! I wish—"

Her voice died away in a storm of sobs and tears. She cried like a child—as a baby cries, violently, with temper, and not with grief: she was incapable of Nelly's suppressed passion and misery; neither did the blow strike deep enough for that; and she had no pride to restrain her. She cried noisily, turning her shoulder to me, making her eyes red and her cheeks blurred. When I got up and went to her she repulsed me, I had nothing to do but sit down again, and wait till the passion had worn itself out. And there she sat sobbing, crushing her pretty hat, and disfiguring her pretty face, with the bright light falling upon her, and revealing every heave of her shoulders. By degrees the paroxysm subsided; she dried her eyes, poor child, and put up her hair, which had got into disorder, with hasty and agitated hands. Then she turned her flushed tear-stained face upon me. It was almost prettier than usual in this childish passion.

"I don't believe you," she cried. "I don't believe it one bit! You only want to vex me. Oh, I wish I had never known you! I wish I might never see you again—you, and—all the rest! I wish I was dead! But I shall tell papa, Mrs. Mulgrave, and I know what he will think of you."

"Martha, I am very sorry—" I began, but Martha had rushed to the door.

"I don't want to hear any more!" she said. "I know every thing you can say. You are fond of sister, and want her to have every thing. And you always hated me!"

With these words she rushed out, shutting not only the door of the room behind her in her wrath, but the door of the house, which stood always open. She left me, I avow, in a state of very great agitation. I had not expected her to take it in this way. And it had been a great strain upon my nerves to speak at all. I trembled all over, and as soon as she was gone I cried too, from mere nervousness and agitation, not to speak of the terrible thought that weighed on my mind—had I done harm or good? What would the others say if they knew? Would they bless or curse me? Had I interfered out of season? Had I been officious? Heaven knows! The result only could show.

Most people know what a strange feeling it is when one has thus estranged, or parted in anger from, a daily and intimate companion; how one sits in a vague fever of excitement, thinking it over—wondering what else one could have said; wondering if the offended friend will come or send, or give any sign of reconciliation; wondering what one ought to do. I was so shaken by it altogether that I was good for nothing but lying down on the sofa. When my maid came to look for me she was utterly dismayed by my appearance. "Them young ladies are too much for you, ma'am," she said, indignantly. "It's as bad as daughters of your own." I think that little speech was the last touch that was wanted to make me break down. As bad as daughters of my own, but not as good; very different. When I thought how those girls would cling round their father it was more than I could bear. Not that I envied him. But I was ready to do more for them than he was; to risk their very love, in order to serve them; and how different was their affection for me!

All day long I staid indoors, recovering slowly, but feeling very miserable. Nobody came near me. The girls, who were generally flitting out and in twenty times in a day, never appeared again. The very door which Martha shut in her passion remained closed all day. When it came to be evening I could bear it no longer; I could not let the sun go down upon such a quarrel; I was so lonely I could not afford to be proud. I drew my shawl round me, though I was still trembling, and went softly in at the Admiral's gate. It was dusk, and every thing was very sweet. It had been a lovely autumn day, very warm for the season, and the twilight lingered as if it was loth to make an end of it. I thought the girls would probably be in the drawing-room by themselves, and that I might invent some excuse for sending Nelly away, and try to make my peace with her sister. I did not love Martha as I loved Nelly, but I was fond of her all the same, as one is fond of a girl one has seen grow up, and watched over every day; and I could not bear that she should be estranged from me. When I went in, however, Nelly was all alone in the drawing-room. She was sitting in a low chair by the fire, for they always had a fire earlier than other people. She was sitting over it, with her face resting in her hands, almost crouching toward the friendly blaze. And yet it was a warm evening, very warm for the time of the year. She started when she heard my step, and turned round, and for the moment I saw that I was not welcome to Nelly either. Her thoughts had been better company, or was it possible that Martha could have told her? I did not think, however, that this could be the case, when she drew forward my favorite chair for me, and we began to talk. Nelly had not passed through any crisis such as that which Martha and I had made for ourselves. She told me her sister had a headache, and had been lying down before dinner, but that now she had gone out for a little air.

"Only in the garden," Nelly said. And then she added, "Major Frost is here. He is with her—and I don't think he ought to come so often—now—"

"Major Frost!" I said, and my heart began to beat; I don't know what I feared or hoped, for at this moment the Admiral came in from the dining-room and joined us, and we got into ordinary conversation. What a strange thing ordinary conversation is! We sat in the dark, with only the fire-light making rosy gleams about the room, and wavering in the great mirror over the mantle-piece, where we were all dimly reflected—and talked about every sort of indifferent subject. But I wonder if Nelly was thinking of what she was saying? or if her heart was away, like mine, hovering over the heads of these two in the garden, or with poor Llewellyn who was creeping home an unwilling bridegroom? Even the Admiral, I believe, had something on his mind different from all our chit-chat. For my own part I sat well back in my corner, with my heart thumping so against my breast that it affected my breathing. I had to speak in gasps, making up the shortest sentences I could think of. And we talked about public affairs, and what was likely to be the result of the new measures; and the Admiral, who was a man of the old school, shook his head, and declared I was a great deal too much of an optimist, and thought more hopefully than reasonably of the national affairs. Heaven help me! I was thinking of nothing at that moment but of Martha and Major Frost.

Then there was a little stir outside in the hall. The fire-light, and the darkness, and the suspense, and my own feelings generally, recalled to my mind so strongly the evening on which Llewellyn arrived, that I should not have been surprised had he walked in when the door opened. But it was only Martha who came in. The fire-light caught her as she entered, and showed me for one brief moment a different creature from the Martha I had parted with that morning in sobs and storms. I don't know what she wore; but I know that she was more elaborately dressed than usual, and had sparkling ornaments about her which caught the light. I almost think, though I never could be sure, that it was her poor mother's diamond brooch which she had put on, though they were alone. She came in lightly, with something of the triumphant air I had noticed in her a year ago, before Captain Llewellyn's Christmas visit. It was evident, at all events, that my remonstrance had not broken her spirit. I could see her give a little glance to my corner, and I know that she saw I was there.

"Are you here, papa?" she said. "You always sit, like crows, in the dark, and nobody can see you." Then she drew a chair into the circle. She took no notice of me or any one, but placed herself directly in the light of the fire.

"Yes, my dear," said her father. "I am glad you have come in. It begins to get cold."

"We did not feel it cold," said Martha, and then she laughed—a short, little, disconnected laugh, which indicated some disturbance of her calm; then she went on, with a tendency to short, broken sentences, like myself. "Papa," she said, "I may as well tell you at once. When the Major was here last he was poor, and could not speak—now he's well off. And he wants me to marry him. I like him better than—Ellis Llewellyn. I always—liked him better—and he loves me!"

Upon which Martha burst into tears.

If I were to try to describe the consternation produced by this unlooked-for speech I should only prolong my story without making it more clear. The want of light heightened it, and confused us all doubly. If a bomb had burst in the peaceful place I don't think it could have produced a greater commotion. It was only the Admiral, however, who could say a word, and of course he was the proper person. Martha very soon came out of her tears to reply to him. He was angry, he was bewildered, he was wild for the moment. What was he to say to Llewellyn? What did she mean? How did Major Frost dare—? I confess that I was crying in my corner—I could not help it. When the Admiral began to storm, I put my hand on his arm, and made him come to me, and whispered a word in his ear. Then the good man subsided into a bewildered silence. And after a while he went to the library, where Major Frost was waiting to know his fate.

It is unnecessary to follow out the story further. Llewellyn, poor fellow, had to wait a long time after all before Nelly would look at him. I never knew such a proud little creature. And she never would own to me that any spark of human feeling had been in her during that painful year. They were a proud family altogether. Martha met me ever after with her old affectionateness and composure—never asked pardon, nor said I was right, but at the same time never resented nor betrayed my interference. I believe she forgot it even, with the happy faculty that belonged to her nature, and has not an idea now that it was any thing but the influence of love and preference which made her cast off Llewellyn and choose Major Frost.

Sometimes, however, in the gray of the summer evenings, or the long, long winter nights, I think I might just as well have let things alone. There are two bright households the more in the world, no doubt. But the Admiral and I are both dull enough sometimes, now the girls are gone. He comes and sits with me, which is always company, and it is not his fault I have not changed my residence and my lonely condition. But I say to him, why should we change? and give the world occasion to laugh, and make a talk of us, at our age? Things are very well as they are. I believe we are better company to each other living next door than if we were more closely allied; and our neighbors know us too well to make any talk about our friendship. But still it often happens, even when we are together—in the still evenings, and in the fire-light, and when all the world is abroad of summer nights—that we both of us lament a little in silence, and feel that it is very dull without the girls.

HOLY LAND EXPLORATIONS.

THE Palestine Exploration Fund Committee of England, at the head of which is A. H. ("Babylon") Layard, has lately been exposing our great ignorance in regard to the Land of the Book. We know far less that is reliable of Palestine than we do of Egypt, and while this ignorance exists much of the significance of the Bible must remain more or less obscure. Mr. Layard's Committee represents that our maps of Palestine are inaccurate, the names being confused in application and orthography; the archæology rests on no sufficient basis; the geology is all conjectural; and the natural history imperfectly investigated.

Two exploring expeditions have been sent out by this Committee, under the direction of Captain Wilson and Lieutenant Anderson, Royal Engineers. They landed, with a force consisting of a corporal of sappers, an expert photographer, and a practical surveyor, at Beyrout, in December, 1865, and occupied six months in determining the exact positions of places, recording the features of the ground, taking heights, examining ruined sites, photographing, and generally investigating every thing that came in their way. They fixed for the first time the exact latitude and longitude of nearly fifty places between Damascus and Jerusalem, and obtained accurate detailed maps of the whole centre line of the country, with several outlying districts. They also took 170 photographs, and made carefully-measured drawings of between thirty and forty structures—temples, synagogues, and churches—which had never before been taken. In 1867, in organizing the second expedition, Jerusalem was made the head-quarters. For the topographical and excavation department Lieutenant Warren, an officer of much experience and great energy, was selected. He started early in January last, and is now in Jerusalem, with two sappers, actively engaged in excavating and exploring. He has already been rewarded by a discovery in relation to the south wall of the sacred inclosure, which, without going into details—which would be unintelligible without illustration—we imagine to be one of the most important yet made there. In addition to his labor in Jerusalem, Mr. Warren has carefully surveyed much of the Philistine plain, a considerable portion of the highlands of Judea, and the valley of the Jordan, for about sixteen miles north of the Dead Sea. These surveys, combined with those of Wilson and Anderson, give us for the first time the materials for a correct map of more than three-fourths of the Holy Land. Most valuable discoveries have been also made in geology, zoology, botany, and natural history generally, which to all students of the Bible can not fail to be productive of attention and interest.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

AN uncommonly severe winter—so every body says—sleigh-rides and skating carnivals have been the popular amusements from Maine to Maryland at least, and, to some extent, even farther South. In Washington the "skatorial art" has had an unprecedented "run," and practical performers as well as sympathizing spectators have experienced a rare season of enjoyment. And nowadays, even the most artistic fancy-skating does not satisfy amateurs or connoisseurs—something more novel is demanded; and blindfold skating, playing base-ball on skates, and numerous other devices to exhibit special skill are unfolded in answer to the popular feeling. Before long we suppose it will be the style to hold the fashionable balls of the season upon the skating parks. "Fair women and brave men" will trip the "light, fantastic toe," and glide with easy grace through all the mazes of the dance on runners. Trains will be abolished, and gentlemen can devote themselves to their partners instead of being absorbed seven-eighths of the time, as is now needful, in the too often vain attempt to avoid treading upon the voluminous masses of delicate dry-goods which adorn the ball-room floor.

This cold weather, by-the-way, has proved, beyond controversy, the endurance and hardihood of woman! Never again need it be insinuated that she is weak and feeble and inferior to man, even physically. While men have been muffled in fur caps, have not women, bravely despising the rigors of the season, walked through the streets bareheaded—or next to it—unflinchingly and uncomplainingly? The fragments of ribbon and velvet with which their hair has been adorned have only served to draw admiring attention to their unexampled fortitude. Nevertheless some smothered emotions of pity rise in the mind at the sight of red ears and blue noses; and though women are so much tougher and stronger, and better able to bear exposure than men, one has a fancy for seeing them looking warm and comfortable, and well wrapped up, when out of doors in freezing weather! In old-time winters one needed to take a little trouble, and look under a bonnet or hood for any special pair of bright eyes and rosy lips he wanted to see more fully. No such pains is necessary nowadays—the exhibition is "open to the public"—which, to be sure, may be advantageous in some respects.

A singular freak of the snow and wind has recently been witnessed by numerous people on the eastern side of Seneca Lake. In a large field great numbers of small bunches of snow are scattered about, each with a hole through it, like a muff. They vary in size, being from three to [illegible] inches in diameter. They present the appearance of a vast number of white fur muffs scattered about.

There is now on exhibition in the Congressional Library at Washington a valuable "Record" of the Rebellion, collected and classified by Mr. Thomas S. Townsend. The "Record" proper consists of seventy-five huge historical scrap-books, composed of printed extracts cut from newspapers and magazines, relative to the political, social, and military events of the rebellion. Fifteen more volumes of a similar kind are yet to be added to the set. Every fact contained in these articles in the scrap-books is also recorded separately in order of time, in what is called the "Journal;" each one of the seventy-five volumes requiring a journal of some six hundred pages, wherein each fact is distinctly stated. In addition to the journals there is what is designated the "Encyclopædia of the Rebellion," consisting of twenty volumes of twelve hundred pages each, written in legible handwriting. Here each fact is entered under its general alphabetic head, such as battles, blockades, captures, generals, etc. To complete the value of the collection there is an excellent Index, which gives the reference to the various accounts of any fact or person in the Encyclopædia, the Journal, or the Record.

A "live gorilla" has at length been captured for the British Museum. He is only a year or two old, hearty and healthy, with a tremendous appetite. His captor, who has not yet sent him to England on account of the cold weather, writes that he is shy and playful, but in no wise ferocious. He also seems distressed at losing his parents; when first caught, his grief was quite touching to witness; he could scarcely bear to be looked at, and if at all annoyed by the presence of many people around him, would lie on the ground, with his face buried in his hands, and sway his head from side to side, as if in an agony of sorrow.

The "spirits" continue to take charge of the "gold diggings" in the vicinity of Hazardville, Connecticut. Every day a letter is received by the superintendent of operations from the directing medium in Boston, containing special instructions what to do. Whether the secret cave and the two iron chests containing the buried treasure will be discovered remains to be seen.

The famine-stricken people of Sweden continue to suffer the pangs of hunger. For three years past the crops, in the northern parts of Sweden, have been very poor; last year they were an utter failure in consequence of the unusually early frosts. Even in the summer and autumn many of the poorer people were obliged to mix the lichens of the ground and the bark and leaves of the trees, nay, even straw, with a handful of rye meal to make up their wretched food. And now more than two hundred thousand people are reduced to the necessity of subsisting on this miserable bark bread, with a long winter staring them in the face. They sit helpless in their cheerless huts and die. The heavy frosts began in the region chiefly afflicted before the close of August: and as the intense rigor of the last winter kept the northern harbors ice-bound until nearly the close of June, it is not strange that there is great dearth of bread-stuffs.

Throughout Europe there seems to be much distress among the poorer classes in consequence of bad harvests. In Russia the government has had to make liberal appropriations to supply the peasantry with subsistence. In eastern Prussia there has been much destitution; and, according to accounts from Algeria (one of the French African colonies), a hundred thousand people have died within eight months from starvation. In London and all the principal towns of Great Britain poverty is very extreme. A great many laborers who were employed during the American war have been thrown out of employment, and their sufferings are described to be lamentable.

A singular instance of mechanical skill is given in a Paris journal. A young man about eighteen years old, not long ago, was sentenced to five years' imprisonment for theft. He belonged to a respectable family, and his conduct in prison was exemplary. A few weeks since he begged the director, one day, to tell him what o'clock it was that he might set his watch. "You have a watch, then?" asked the director. "Only since yesterday, Sir," said the prisoner, and, to the astonishment of the director, produced one made of straw! The little master-piece is two and a half inches in diameter, about one-half of an inch thick, and will go for three hours without winding up. The dial-plate is of paper, and a pretty little straw chain is attached to the whole. The instruments the prisoner had at his command were two needles, a pin, a little straw, and thread. Several persons of distinction, moved by his surprising genius for mechanics, are now endeavoring to obtain his liberation.

Accidents from the use of coal oil continue to be distressingly frequent. Doubtless they usually occur by carelessness; but that does not diminish the attendant horrors. Two or three weeks since two young ladies in Chattanooga were burned to death. A few details respecting the cause of their untimely end may prove a warning to others. It was a cold evening, and the fire in the stove had apparently gone out. The young ladies attempted to rekindle it: and to make it burn better they concluded to pour some oil on the wood before lighting it. One of them procured a large can of "Aurora Oil," containing about one gallon; she took the cork out of the can and held it over the top of the stove, and commenced pouring the oil. Unfortunately, the apparently dead coals were merely blackened on the surface; below the red fire felt the touch of the oil, and in an instant leaped out to meet it. In a moment of time the stream of flame had reached the can of oil, and the latter exploded, dashing the fiery liquid all over the room, enveloping the ladies in flames, and setting fire to every thing in the room. In vain were all their efforts to escape the flames which enveloped them; and when outside help came it was too late—they both died the next day.

Still more recently a sad accident occurred in Ohio, by which six persons were killed and four dangerously injured. A man attempted to fill a lamp in which what is called non-explosive Aurora oil was burned. It was evening, and he extinguished the light for the purpose of filling the lamp. His son, a child of about nine years, was holding the candle while the father filled the lamp from a two-gallon jug; and by some mishap lighted the oil, which exploded, blowing the jug to pieces and immediately enveloping the room in flames, ten persons being in the room at the time. All were immediately made helpless except one, who exerted himself to the utmost to save the others from death. But six were fatally injured, so that death ensued, and it is feared the others will not survive.

From these two instances—two out of many similar ones—two plain and simple deductions may be drawn; not new ones, but old—well known to most persons, often repeated, but often disregarded. Let them be kept in mind and heeded. They are: never use coal oil for the purpose of kindling a fire; and never attempt to fill a lamp with coal oil in the evening, or when another light must be held in the vicinity of the inflammable substance.

According to the latest official statements, on the island of Java, in a single year, the tigers devoured 148 persons, the crocodiles ate up about 50, and the serpents swallowed about 40. Pleasant, very!

An exchange says: "Rats can not live in Aliaska—because their holes freeze up solid as fast as the rats dig them. Naturally the rats get discouraged. At St. Thomas the earthquakes turn their holes wrong side out forty-three times a minute. This surprises the rats, and they leave on the first steamer.

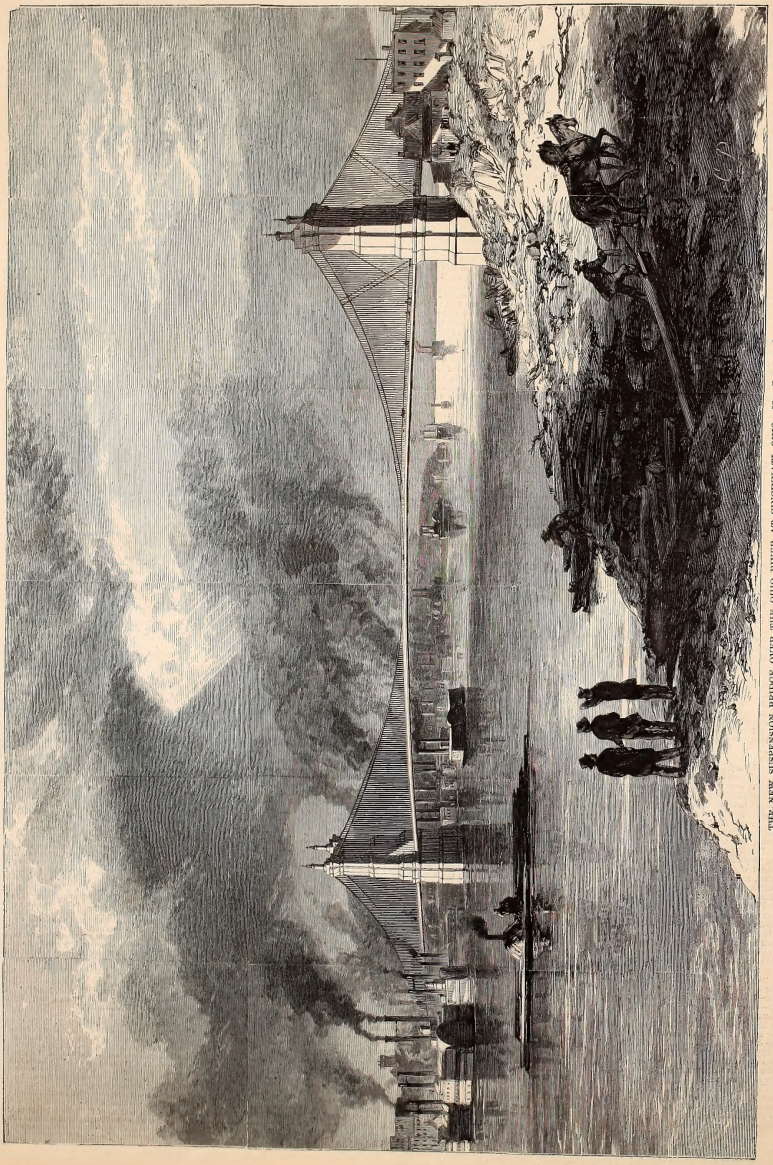
There is a hotel proprietor near Jackson, Mississippi, who adopts a unique method of recovering any valuables which have been taken from the rooms of his guests by the servants. The following incident explains the method. He received a letter from a young lady who had stopped at his house recently, in which letter she requested that her pocket-book, left behind under her pillow, should be forwarded by express. The landlord had previously heard nothing of the pocket-book, but, looking dreadfully sleepy, he went to the colored chamber-maid, and said:

"Pretty cold, Mandy."

"Yes, Sah." [Pause.]

"Have to have a new broom soon, Mandy?"

"Guess so—next week." [Pause again.]



"Swept No. 5 yet, Mandy?"

"Yes, Sah."

"That young lady's pocket-book, Mandy—fetch it to me," this being drawled out in a tone of quiet indifference, but with an air of precisely knowing the history of the missing article. Mandy looked at him with a pale face and frightened grin. He whistled, looked at the sky, and yawned. "No hurry, Mandy; fetch it to me in ten minutes; that'll do; h-e-i-g-h-o."

Mandy was routed. She was gone five minutes to a neighboring hut, and returned with the pocket-book as if she had just found it. The landlord took it with two yawns and never a word.

In certain sections of Kentucky it is said to be regarded as a breach of hospitality to refuse an offer of marriage; and a case is on record of a young lady who during the last few years has been engaged to fifty different officers. She has finally married a farmer and settled down comfortably in life.

THE NEW SUSPENSION BRIDGE OVER THE OHIO RIVER AT CINCINNATI, OHIO.—[See Page 141.]

REAR-ADMIRAL BELL.

LATE advices from Japan bring intelligence of the deaths, on January 11, of Rear-Admiral HENRY H. BELL, commanding the Asiatic squadron of our navy, Lieutenant-Commander J. H. REED, and ten seamen, by drowning in the Osaka River. It appears that the mouth of the river had been closed by a sand-bar, which had formed during a heavy storm. While the Admiral was passing over the bar from his flag-ship, the Hartford, to the shore, the boat was capsized, and all on board, except three sailors, were drowned. The bodies were recovered and buried near the shore.

Rear-Admiral BELL was a native of North Carolina, from which State he entered the naval service August 4, 1823. Passing through the grades of Midshipman, Passed-Midshipman, and Lieutenant, he was made a Commander in 1854, and was soon after ordered to the United States ship Sea Jacinto, destined for the East Indies, as the flag-ship of Commodore JAMES ARMSTRONG.

During the service of the Sea Jacinto on the China station the English managed to improvise a quarrel with the Chinese authorities, and in conjunction with their French allies were waging war upon that people. Pending these vexatious and irritating hostilities, a boat from the United States ship Portsmouth, proceeding up the Canton River, was fired upon from the Barrier Forts. Commodore ARMSTRONG determined very promptly to punish this insult to our flag, and an attack was made upon the forts by the United States sloops of war Portsmouth and Levant, Commanders FOOTE and SMITH, and the boats of the Sea Jacinto, Commander BELL. Considering the strength of the works, the number of the guns and of the garrison, and the smallness of the assailing party, the result was almost incredible. After long and obstinate fighting the Chinese troops were routed, their works captured and thoroughly destroyed. Throughout this operation Commander BELL, as testified to by the lamented FOOTE, was conspicuous for his cool, deliberate gallantry, exhibiting always the sterling qualities of an accomplished officer.

When the rebellion broke out Commander BELL, although a Southerner, promptly offered his services to the National Government, and sought active duty. When Admiral (then Commodore) FARRAGUT was ordered to the command of the West Gulf squadron, he selected Commodore BELL as his Fleet Captain. In this confidential and responsible position he was a prominent participant in the destruction of the rebel fleet, the capture of New Orleans, and the opening of the Mississippi. When Admiral FARRAGUT came North to recruit his health and prepare for the next and final struggle with the enemy in Mobile Bay, he left the command of the West Gulf squadron with Commodore BELL.

Rear-Admiral BELL received the command of the Asiatic squadron in August, 1865; and from that time until his untimely death had remained in active discharge of his duties.

THE LATE REAR-ADMIRAL H. H. BELL, U.S.N.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE MONT CENIS RAILWAY.

A DESCRIPTION of the proposed railway over the Alps at Mont Cenis, between Savoy and Piedmont, was given in this journal for October 12, 1867, with views showing the mountain scenery and the situation of a train ascending the incline. The entire length of this line, from St. Michel to Susa, is forty-eight miles, passing, for the most part, along the ordinary high-road. When opened for traffic, in conjunction with the railways through the Italian peninsula to Brindisi, it will be the quickest route to India. There is no doubt of the usefulness of the mechanical system, invented by Mr. FELL, the managing director, for enabling the locomotive engines to ascend and descend with perfect safety and facility the steepest gradients on this line. The principle of Mr. FELL'S system may be described as follows: The motive force or power of an engine consists of two elements, the amount of steam it can evaporate, and the amount of adhesion or bite its wheels can apply to the rails. Were a railway constructed on the level, or nearly so, the engine need only be of the weight required to give it strength and solidity to do its work efficiently; but as such a railway does not here exist it is necessary to increase the weight according as the gradients are steep. The steepest incline that an engine on the ordinary system of railway can ascend is 1 in 23, or 211 feet in the mile, but then its weight becomes so great that it becomes practically useless. Mr. Fell adopts a third or centre rail, upon which wheels so obtained by the pressure of horizontal wheels, worked by the engine in conjunction with the ordinary perpendicular wheels. This plan enables the weight of the engine to be reduced to a minimum in consequence of the extraordinary increase of power developed by the action of the horizontal wheels on the centre rail. Mr. Fell's engines are able to mount with ease grade of 1 in 12, or twice as steep, as the steepest gradient that an ordinary engine can surmount. This plan adds also to safety, as it is impossible for the engine or train ever to get off the line. Our engraving represents an engine and train going round a curve of forty yards. This it is able to do with perfect ease and safety, while on the ordinary system it would not be safe to go round, at any thing like speed, curves of less than 400 yards radius.

THE MONT CENIS RAILROAD—LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE, WITH HORIZONTAL EXTRA WHEELS, ILLUSTRATING THE FELL SYSTEM.

BRIDGE OVER THE OHIO.

New York is peculiarly unfortunate in her bridges. Lorw's bridge is a decided failure, and the East River bridge project has resolved itself into an impracticable tunnel scheme; and for some time to come it is likely that Broadway and East River will be spanned only by bridges of ice. They are more fortunate with their bridges elsewhere. St. Louis is building a splendid structure over the Missisippi. Louisville is spanning the falls of the Ohio with another, while Cincinnati has lately finished the bridge which we illustrate. This bridge was begun in 1856 and finished in 1867. The cost was $1,750,000. The total length is 2252 feet, 1057 of which are from tower to tower, and the floor is 100 feet above the "low-water-mark."

A man that has seen "better days."

Two's company—three's none.

After "Dark."

Drunkard. "You are no gentleman to follow me," etc.

A business that would "soot" any one.

"Never too late to mend."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Advice to Old Bachelors who Dye their Hair—"Keep it dark."

"Come home, my son," said a parent to one who had been absent from home for some time; "come home, and your mother will kill the fatted calf for you." "Tell her not to do it, father," replied the offspring; "for I love to wait over meat's better than beef. Tell her to kill a quarter of a pig instead."

A dandy of twenty-six having been termed an "old bachelor," appealed to an elderly gentleman as to the age when he should be called old or not, giving his age, "Twenty-six?" said the elderly gentleman, "I'll swallow you if you take it. Now, for a man it is young enough; but for a goose it is rather old."

When are shipping lambs like library volumes? When they are bonnibil sheep.

Centre of Gravity—A Judge in Court.

A seven-year-old boy was lately heard to use profane language. On being reproved by his parent, and directed to ask God's forgiveness, he refused in his room and was overheard to say: "Oh, God, I am very sorry. I said that naughty word, and won't say so any more; but please hurry and make me grow up to be a man, and then I can swear as much as I want to, like pa, and nobody will notice it."

A Real Textual Curiosity—A pair of water-tight boots.

Leap Year.

Leap year, isn't it? Well, let me sing to it.
Does any one fear for the maiden's year,
Long wished-for promises ever will ring
And bind a little gold privilege ring to it?
Come! don't look innocent, Mary, dear!

Isn't it leap year? Millicent merry-eyed!
You've half prepared for a pounce, you puss!
For a score of times you've the mischief to berry-eyed.
If it weren't that I'm bashful and reticent very, I'd Snatch up your wedges and strike you—thus!

Leap year, isn't it? Tidy tyrannical!
What a pity it wasn't a year ago,
When over the bridge leading toward the Botanical,
In tones which I scarcely should think were mechanical,
You gave me a very broad hint, you know.

Isn't it sep year? That, for the height of it,
Your high-mettled spirits will take the bar,
When you come to the bough, if you catch but the sight of it,
There's not in the world such a girl to make light of it,
You'd really win in a canter, Car!

Leap year, isn't it. While I am singing now
I wonder if Violet's ears will burn,
To a spar of the past I can hover her clinging now,
As half Forgotten a song is unclose now
To words which she wouldn't object to learn.

Isn't it leap year? Maidens be pitiful,
Beware at the whirligig wheels of Fate,
Around you of bachelor boys there's a pity full,
And maybe they'll sing you of sorrow a ditty full,
But here I sit on my cushion and wait!

The Clerical Paradox—Parsonbown.

An old divine said to a young preacher who had just preached a sermon of the intensely horrible order, "Yes, you are too severe, and your hearers are all the flowers of sulphur."

A circular Letter—O.

ON A LADY WITH RED HAIR.

So coy and cruel was the lady Jane,
That, in revenge for slighting all his darts,
Cupid, all heedless of her prayer or pain,
Dyed her red tresses in her victim's hearts.

Why do stewed chickens resemble fire-arms?—Because they are fowl-in-pieces.

An editor heads his list of marriages "noose Items," another calls them "feats of the rig."

The first bus in America was Columbus.

A Getting to Windward.—A man in Kentucky killed a stick cow a few days since in whose stomach was found a large brass pin, a hat-pin, and a quantity of hooks and eyes. A jury of the neighbors, formally summoned for the occasion, returned an oral verdict that the unfortunate deceased (cow) had probably swallowed a milkmaid or a waterfall, at some period of his adult life.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Aeolian Piano-forte.—Patented. Highest premium awarded over all, even the renowned World's Exposition Pianos. Send for descriptive pamphlet, price-list, &c. Manufactory and wareroome, 107 and 109 Bowery. MANNER & CO.

ARCHITECTURAL IRON WORKS,

FOURTEENTH STREET, BETWEEN AVENUES B AND C, NEW YORK.

D. D. BADGER, President.
N. CHENEY, Vice-President.

Fire-proof Buildings of every description, and every kind of Iron Work for Building Purposes, also for Bridges.

Jackson & Co., established 1850. (Licensed by the United States. GREAT ONE DOLLAR SALE of rich and valuable goods, consisting of Dry-Goods, Gold and Silver Watches, Carpets, Furniture, Silver-plated Ware, Fine Jewelry, Sewing Machines, &c., comprising a great variety of useful articles, and each and every article will be sold for $1. We purchase our goods for cash from importers, manufacturers, and bankrupt merchants or their assignees. Our method of doing business is as follows: To any one sending us their address by mail, and $1 cents, we will forward by mail a certificate giving the name and description of the article we will sell for $1, and then, by returning this certificate with $1, we will forward to the article named in their address. We offer the following terms to agents:

5	Certificates of Articles for	$1 00
12	" "	2 00
35	" "	5 00
50	" "	7 00
100	" "	10 00

With extra inducements to Agents. Agents wanted in every town in the United States. Send for our circular. JACKSON & CO., 89 Court St., Boston, Mass

100 Photographs of Dalon Generals sent postpaid for 25 cts.; 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cts.; 100 Female Beauties for 25 cts.; 20 Actors for 25 cts. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

Du Chaillu's Gorilla Country. Stories of the Gorilla Country. Narrated for Young People. By Paul B. Du Chaillu, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa." Profusely Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

It would be hard to find a more interesting book for boys than Mr. Du Chaillu's.—Spectator.

Children will obtain from it a very considerable amount of information touching the manners, customs, wars, and means of Africans, and of Gorillas in great amusement in the accounts of the gorilla. The book is really a meritorious work.—Athenæum.

It is the best contribution of the year to juvenile, as are Motley's volumes to historical literature.—Boston Transcript.

This work will prove exceedingly interesting, as much so as "Robinson Crusoe" ever was, not only to young people on account of its striking narrative of thrilling and natural style, but to the aged and learned as well.—New York Herald.

Published by Harper & Brothers, New York.

Sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 75.

NEW BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS.

I.

THE COMPLETION OF MOTLEY'S HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS. A History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce—1609. By J. Lothrop Motley, D.C.L. Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In Four Volumes. With Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

The Volumes sold separately at $3 50 each.

II.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1862. Edited by William Smith, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

III.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by Arthur Helps. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 75.

IV.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of His Royal Highness, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey. Portraits. New Edition. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, Beveled Edges, $6 75.

V.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By Samuel Smiles, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 75.

VI.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAIRY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Girls and Children. By Lucy Rawdall Comfort. With Engravings. Square 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

VII.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 21 to February 21, 1867, on the "Ely Foundation" of the Union Theological Seminary. By Albert Barnes, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 75.

VIII.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas, Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $3 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

IX.

THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By Goldwin Smith, Author of "Lectures on the Study of History," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the prices.

THE NEW NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS,

NEW YORK.

"Novels are sweets. All people with healthy literary appetites love them—almost all women; a vast number of clever, hard-headed men. Judges, bishops, chancellors, mathematicians, are notorious novel readers, as well as young boys and sweet girls, and their kind, tender mothers."—Wm. M. Thackeray.

"It is idle to say that our young people shall not read novels. They do and will. We must substitute good novels for bad ones, just as in our gardens we substitute choice fruits and vegetables for worthless weeds. The deepest lessons in life have been embodied in the narrative fo. a."—Springfield Republican.

Sooner or Later.

By Shirley Brooks, Author of "The Silver Cord," &c. Illustrated by Du Maurier. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A French Country Family.

By Madame De Witt, nee Guizot. Translated by Dinah Mulock Craik, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

The Huguenot Family.

By Sarah Tytler. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

My Husband's Crime.

By M. R. Housekeeper. Illustrated by Gaston Fay. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

One of the Family.

By the Author of "Carlyon's Year." 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

Brownlows.

By Mrs. Oliphant, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "Life of Edward Irving," "Agnes," "The Days of My Life," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 37 cents.

Five Hundred Pounds Reward.

By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Margaret's Engagement.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Guild Court.

By George Mac Donald, Author of "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," "Alec Forbes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Playing for High Stakes.

By Miss Annie Thomas, Author of "Denis Donne," "Theo Leigh," "On Guard," "Played Out," "Walter Goring," "Called to Account," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

The Brothers' Bet;

Or, Within Six Weeks. By Emilie Flygare Carlen, Author of "Ivar; or, The Skjuts-Boy," "The Lover's Stratagem," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

Mabel's Progress.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The Waterdale Neighbors.

By the Author of "Paul Massie." 8vo, Paper 50 cents.

Stone Edge.

A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

Cruc;

Or, Three Acts in the Life of an Artist. By Babington White. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The Tenants of Malory.

By J. Sheridan Le Fanu, Author of "Uncle Silas," "Guy Deverell," "All in the Dark," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Birds of Prey.

By Miss M. E. Braddon, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

The Curate's Discipline.

By Mrs. Eiloart. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Caste.

By the Author of "Mr. Arle." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

No Man's Friend.

By F. W. Robinson, Author of "Grandmother's Money," "Milly's Hero," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

Raymond's Heroine.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Miss Ravenel's Conversion

From Secession to Loyalty. By J. W. De Forest, Author of "European Acquaintance." 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 50.

Mr. Wynyard's Ward.

By Holme Lee. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above Books by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Price.

A Brute will not SWALLOW DRUGS.

A human being ought to exercise at least as much wisdom as a beast, guided only by instinct. Take an apple in one hand, a spoonful of medicine in the other; approach a child, and see which it will choose. In most cases brute force is required to force medicine down the throat of any child. Men and women loathe and abhor the cursed dose; our natural instinct rises up in abhorrence to this worn-out, heathenish practice, handed down to us as a relic of the Dark Ages, conceived by the most superstitious men, composed of soothsayers and astrologers. We find some so ignorant at the present day, who believe that medicines act. Under this delusion they swallow pills, physic, cod-liver oil, bitters, soothing syrups, etc. The simpletons think this drug acts thus, and so gulp down another, expecting it to operate in a different manner, to reach this organ or that complaint. Folks possessed of common sense know that all drugs or medicines of any kind are simply dead, inert matter—have no life, but are chaos. If a dose will purge the bowels, it will physic the box or bottle from which it was taken. Pour a dose of it into a dead person: see now if your boasted relic of barbarism acts upon the corpse. Now try a dose of the detestable stuff; turn it down your own throat; the living system acts upon it and rejects it as an enemy, throws it out at nature's general outlet, or by the water through the action of the kidneys or at the pores; some doses most abominable are thrown with violence and disgust back again out of the mouth. Millions are committing slow (sometimes quick) suicide by taking medicine in opposition to their own instincts and better nature. The plea of ignorance can not save their health or life. Quacks flourish and prosper, and it is of vital importance to their purse to have dupes who will do their bidding with unshaken confidence, without asking questions, but meekly accept of their authority, do them reverence as to the Deity. People of sound judgment study natural laws, act with discretion, insist upon their right to reason and ask the why and the wherefore, accept of no man as authority, but exercise their own common sense, enjoy better health, longer life, expend less money; while ignorant fools, led about by their noses, invariably gulp down all kinds of nostrums. Life-long constipation, ill health, and misery are their constant companions. All who debauch and prostitute their stomachs by swallowing medicines deserve their fate; it is a sin against their better nature and all right reason, and it is impossible for such to escape the consequences. I will pledge my word and honor, knowing the truth of what I here assert by experience, that all who will swear eternal opposition to swallowing medicines will, in every case, enjoy better health, longer life, and possess more means, and be forever grateful for the timely advice here given. All physical pain arises from inflammation, be it a simple headache or toothache, neuralgic or rheumatic, pain in liver, lungs, or any internal organ, a simple itch or any breaking out on the surface, ulcers of every name and nature, be it a frightful cancer or a simple mosquito bite. Inflammation causes the pain in all and every instance. Inflammation is heat; put out the fire, and pain must cease absolutely. It can be done, and Wolcott's Pain Paint can do it. I don't ask you to believe it until you try it, free of cost, on any part of your body, whether pain be internal or external, acute or chronic, lameness or aches of the longest standing—I include all pain, of every name and nature, and promise relief within five minutes at the very first application of Pain Paint, and by following directions permanently cure millions who have been pronounced hopeless invalids. The way is clear, the road is plain, and a wayfaring man, though a fool or a skeptic, can try the remedy without money, without price, and without faith, at the following free offices that I have established: 170 Chatham Square, N. Y., general depot, or at the drug store of T. D. C. Miller, M.D., 1335 Third Avenue; 56 Market Street, or 756 Third Avenue; No. 11 Seventh Avenue; also 76 Cornhill, Boston; 622 Arch Street, Philadelphia; 33 South Pearl Street, Albany, N. Y.; 126 Superior Street, Cleveland; and 184 Vine Street, Cincinnati. Theo. D. C. Miller, M.D., 1335 Third Avenue, says: "Dr. Wolcott's Pain Paint is the cheapest and best pain curer under heaven, and is the greatest blessing to mankind for the relief from pain ever known." Dr. Miller is a graduate of Bellevue Hospital Medical College, N. Y.

D. Van Wart, M. D., Albany, N. Y., says: "I take pleasure in recommending Wolcott's Pain Paint to all who suffer, and would suggest the propriety of the medical profession adopting it in their practice."

David H. Shaffer, Esq., geologist and naturalist, of Cincinnati, Ohio, says: "I, as an individual, without fear of successful contradiction, pronounce Wolcott's Pain Paint one of the most wonderful wonders of the age for relieving those who suffer pain."

C. N. Crittenton, No. 38 Sixth Avenue, one of the largest and most respectable wholesale druggists in New York, says: "Since the introduction of Wolcott's Pain Paint, soothing syrups have fallen off in demand at my house at the rate of five gross per month. I sell less pills, not half the amount of bitters, only half the amount of R. Reliefs that I formerly sold. I sell more of Wolcott's Pain Paint than any other patent medicine, and I deal only in patent medicines, and keep a full supply of all kinds, and sell at the very lowest prices." Pain Paint has created more sensation than any remedy ever offered to the public. I discovered and invented it only six months ago, and it has already shaken false Relief Pills, Bitters, Soothing Syrups, and will sooner or later overturn the absurd and health-ruining practice of swallowing medicines. For farther information read Dr. Wolcott's Circular on Health. R. L. WOLCOTT,
No. 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

PATENTS.

PRACTICAL PATENTS SOLD FOR CASH, ON COMMISSION.

Address E. E. Tiffany & Co, 4 Wall St., N. Y.

References.—"We cheerfully recommend the above as a straightforward and reliable firm.
"E. D. Tiffany, Pres. First National Bank, Hartford, Conn.
"Stephen Crowell, Pres. Phenix Ins. Co., 139 Broadway, N. Y."

The Latest and Best Song and Chorus out!
"MOLLIE GRAEM," by J. H. M'Naughton.
Price 40 Cents. For sale at the Music Stores, or mailed post paid by COTTIER & DENTON, Buffalo.

Short-Hand without a Master, price 25 cts.; Ventriloquism without a Master, price 15 cts. Sent postpaid by O. A. Roorbach, 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

BUCKLEY'S BANJO GUIDE.

Containing Elementary Principles; New, Easy, and Progressive Exercises, Songs, Dances, and Melodies. Prepared by Mr. James Buckley, who has had twenty-six years' experience as a teacher and player, and will be found to be superior to all former publications of its class. It contains over one hundred of the very best pieces of music for the Banjo. Price, 75 cents.
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston; CHARLES H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

THE LITTLE JOKER—Full of Fun—and an exquisite PHOTOGRAPH, beautifully Colored, will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents, by
W. HEPBURNE, 102 Nassau St., New York.

INDISPENSABLE. THE NEW HAND-BOOK: How to Write, How to Talk, How to Behave, and How to do Business. By first post, $2 25. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted.

The GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

HAVE JUST RECEIVED

TWO FULL CARGOES

OF THE

FINEST NEW CROP TEAS

22,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship Golden State,
12,000 HALF CHESTS by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ℔ lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., best $1 ℔ lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 20 ℔ lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔ lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔ lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN 90c., $1, $1 10, best $1 25 ℔ lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 25, best $1 50 ℔ lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution—each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., Removed from 42 to 37 and 39 Nassau St., Opposite the P. O.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15 Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

STIMPSON'S SCIENTIFIC PEN and INK-RETAINING HOLDER.

One dozen Pens (assorted points) and a Holder mailed, prepaid, on receipt of Fifty cents.
A. S. BARNES & CO., N. Y.

THE GOLDEN SECRET (LADIES' BOOK)—PORTRAIT of Our Future President—Washington Time Indicator for 32 Cities—Perpetual Almanac—Ice Cream without Ice—Mysteries from the Spirit Land, by Madam Louise—$3000 Yearly Income—Seven Beautiful Fortune-telling Cards, and a neat little Gold-plated Charm-locket. A Catalogue of Wonderful Oddities, sent to any address on receipt of four bona-fide addresses of young men and four ladies for agents, and 10 cents inclosed with a return prepaid envelope. Address MATTHEW WESTBROOK, 135 Third Avenue, New York City. [Duplicate Orders Invited.]

CURLS! CURLS!

ONE application will curl your hair into beautiful curls, and last six months, in every case, or money refunded. Sent by mail, postage paid, for 50 cts. a package, or three for $1. Address M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

$10 A DAY FOR ALL. Stencil Tool samples free. Address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

PHOTOGRAPHS—All kinds. Samples, 25c. Address A. Seymour & Co., Box 27, Station A, New York.

Burnisher, Pencil Sharpener, Paper Cutter, and Pen Holder combined. Sells at sight. Agents wanted. Can make $10 a day. Samples sent by mail for 30c., or two styles for 50c. Address, MORSE ERASER CO., 404 Library Street, Philadelphia.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.
DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
26 Courtlandt Street, New York.

CORNS. BRIGGS'S CURATIVE for Corns, Bunions, Ingrowing Nails, Frosted Feet, &c., surpasses all other remedies. No more pain from Corns; no more sleepless nights from Bunions; no more limping from Ingrowing Nails. Briggs's Curative does not eat or burn, but soothes, softens, and heals all pedal ailments.
Sold by Druggists and sent by mail, 50c. and $1 00.
DR. J. BRIGGS & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

GREAT PREMIUM SALE of SHEET MUSIC. The largest catalogue published, and greatest inducements ever offered. 10,000 premiums, including 100 Pianos and 100 Organs. References of the highest order given. Send for circulars giving particulars.
MAHAN, SMITH & CO.,
S. OTT, Agent, 783 Broadway, New York. Extra inducements to agents and getters up of clubs.

MOTLEY'S NETHERLANDS COMPLETED.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS: From the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce. With a full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By John Lothrop Motley, LL.D., D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Portraits. Four Vols., 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

Fertile as the present has been in historical works of the highest merit, none of them can be ranked above these volumes in the grand qualities of interest, accuracy, and truth.—Edinburg Review.

Mr. Motley, the American historian of the United Netherlands—we owe him English homage.—London Times.

This story Dr. Motley has narrated with increase of his old brilliancy, power, and success. In its episodes and other by-ways the story is as glowing, nervous, and interesting as in the main details of the marvelous contest.—Athenæum.

This noble work.—Westminster Review.

One of the most fascinating, as well as important histories of the century.—Cor. N. Y. Evening Post.

Mr. Motley's prose epic.—London Spectator.

Its pages are pregnant with instruction.—London Literary Gazette.

His living and truthful picture of events.—London Quarterly Review.

His history is as interesting as a romance, and as reliable as a proposition of Euclid. Clio never had a more faithful disciple. We advise every reader whose means will permit to become the owner of these fascinating volumes, assuring him that he will never regret the investment.—Christian Intelligencer.

Harper & Brothers will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

All the Family Sewing.

BARTLETT'S Reversible SEWING MACHINES are the cheapest reliable machines. The style sold at $25 00 will do all the family sewing. Send stamp for circulars, or examine the different styles at the Bartlett Machine and Needle Depot, 569 Broadway, New York.

FUN! FUN!! FUN!!! Rich, rare, and racy is the "Star-Spangled Banner." Full of fun. A live, 32 column, 8 page paper. Comic Engravings. Poetry, Wit, Humor. It is unsurpassed. Nothing like it. Each Number will save $10 in doctor's bills to the reader. Only 50 cents for a whole year. A splendid gift to every subscricer. Satisfaction guaranteed. Specimens 10 cents. Subscribe now. Address
STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

MARCH, 1868.

Contents:

THE MINNESOTA PINERIES.
Illustrations.—In the Pine Forests.—Loggers' Camp.—Interior of Camp.—Loggers Nooning.—Camping Out.—Sawing into Logs.—Unloading Logs.—Landing Logs.—Preparing for the Drive.—On the Drive.—Breaking a Jam.—Sacking.
A MOSAIC.
THE RESTIGOUCHE.
Illustrations.—Ici on parle Français.—An uncertain View.—St. John, New Brunswick.—Perfect Equality.—Landing at Dalhousie.—Micmac Costumes.—Micmac Celebration.—Daniel Fraser.—Spearing Salmon.—The Catamaran.—Al Fresco.—The Upper Restigouche.—Hic Jacet.
THE NEW TIMOTHY. Part I.
CONSOLATION.
BEEF-TEA.
OUT AT SEA.
SURVIVORS OF CIVILIZATION.
A BROKER'S LOVE AFFAIR.
SHEFFIELD—A BATTLE-FIELD OF ENGLISH LABOR. Part I.
THE SHIPS.
HIGHLAND LIFE OF VICTORIA AND ALBERT.
Illustrations.—Queen Victoria in 1840.—Prince Albert in 1840.—Ferry of the Spey.—The Dead Stag.—Prince's Encampment at Feithort.—Welsh Woman.—The Dutchman's Cap.—Balmoral Castle from the Northwest.—Balmoral Castle from the Southeast.
THE WOMAN'S KINGDOM: A LOVE STORY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."
Illustrations.—Doctor Stedman.—Edna waiting.
KID GLOVES.
LENT.
THE GREAT GRUFFHAM ROBBERY.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: a Love Story," by Dinah Mulock Craik, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the first Number for 1868 was commenced the issue of "The Moonstone," a Novel, by Wilkie Collins, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in Harper's Weekly form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Cord and Creese," a Novel, by James De Mille.

The Bazar, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine, One Year......$4 00
Harper's Weekly, One Year...... 4 00
Harper's Bazar, One Year...... 4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

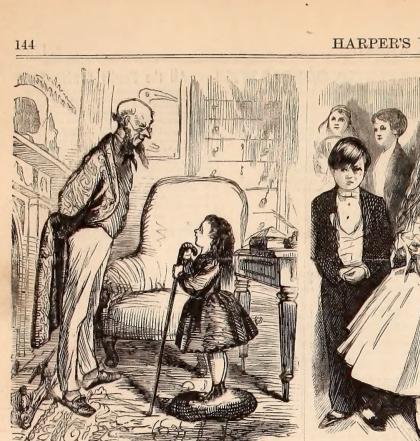
An Extra Copy of either the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the Magazine, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each containing the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the Magazine 24 cents a year, for the Weekly or Bazar 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the Magazine, the Weekly, or the Bazar, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.



In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of Harper & Brothers is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

Terms for Advertising in Harper's Periodicals.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

CURIOSITIES OF NATURAL HISTORY.

LIZZY. "Oh, Papa, what do you think George has caught?"
NATURALISTIC PAPA. "What, dear?"
LIZZY. "Why, a Ring-worm!"

DECIDEDLY UNREASONABLE.

BELLE OF THE JUVENILES. "Ma, dear, isn't it cross of George? He says if I dance with Clara's brother any more, it's all over between us, and he'll have all his presents back!!"

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO.,
479 BROADWAY, 4 doors below Broome St.
WHITE FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS, Second Choice, 141 Pieces, $30.
TEA SETS, some, 44 Pieces, $7.
FRENCH GOLD EDGE TEA SETS, $11.

A NEW KNIFE.
J. RUSSELL & CO.,
GREEN RIVER WORKS,
MANUFACTURERS OF FINE
TABLE CUTLERY
AND POCKET KNIVES,
OFFER TO THE TRADE
A NEW KNIFE
FOR
HOTELS, STEAMBOATS, AND RESTAURANTS.
This Knife is forged—Handle and Blade—from one bar of steel, is heavily plated with silver, and is the strongest, most durable, and cheapest knife in the market.
60 Beekman Street, New York.

DR. MARCHISI'S VIN. LE SOULOUQUE OR Universal Neuralgia PILL.
A SAFE, CERTAIN, AND Speedy Cure FOR NEURALGIA, AND ALL NERVOUS DISEASES.
Its Effects are Magical.
Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage. One package $1.00, postage 6 cts. Six packages $5 00; postage 36 cts.; twelve do., $9.00, postage 60 cts. Sold by all druggists.
TURNER & CO., 120 Tremont St., Boston.

UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway, New York,
Importer and Manufacturer of
Fashionable Furnishing Goods, Hosiery, Gloves, and Under Wear, For Ladies.
☞ Orders by mail will receive prompt attention.

CHICKERING & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
Grand, Square, & Upright Piano-Fortes,
were awarded at the Paris Exposition the First Grand Prize, the Legion of Honor and a Grand Gold Medal, making 63 first premiums during the past 44 years.
WAREROOMS, No. 652 BROADWAY.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others, should send to all parts of the United tates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 60 Broadway.

One Ounce of Gold
Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. BABBITT'S LYE COMPD." This Coffee is roasted, ground, and sealed "Aromatically," under letters patent from the "United States" Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than other pure "Coffee." One Can in every twenty contains a One Dollar Gold Piece. For sale every where. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the Factory.
B. T. BABBITT,
Nos. 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

DRUNKARD, STOP!
DR. REERS, 670 Washington St., Boston, Mass., has cured HUNDREDS of Inebriate persons. Send stamp for circular. The Medicine is Harmless, and can be given without the knowledge of the patient. FREE ADVICE.

TRY the PATENT LAUNDRY BLUEING BAG. A perfectly pure soluble Indigo Blue. Superior to all others in economy and convenience. Each Bag in a neat Box. Sold by 25 and 50 cents.
Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price, by the PLYMOUTH COLOR CO., Nos. 106 and 108 Fulton St., New York.

NOTICE.
TO
"ALL MEN WHO USE PLANE IRONS."
We hereby authorize all "HARDWARE DEALERS" to allow their customers to try our "CLOVER-LEAF PLANE IRONS," and, if not perfectly satisfied, take them back, refund price paid, and charge irons over to us.
WE WANT MECHANICS AND DEALERS TO SEE NO RISK in Buying our Plane Irons.
See that our
TRADE MARK
Is on each Iron.
REYNOLDS, BARBER & CO.,
STEEL TEMPERING WORKS,
AUBURN, N. Y.

PATENT OFFICES.
Inventors who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for over Twenty Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A Pamphlet containing full instructions to inventors, is sent gratis.
☞ A handsome Bound Volume, containing 150 Mechanical Engravings, and the United States Census by Counties, with Hints and Receipts for Mechanics, mailed on receipt of 25 cents. Address
MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum goods, 27 John St., near Nassau, and 691 Broadway, near 4th St. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5846.

WOODWARD'S SUBURBAN AND COUNTRY HOUSES.
New Designs, $1 by postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD,
ARCHITECT, 191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture

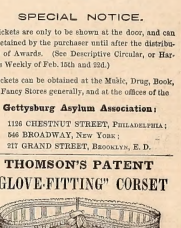
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure the Itch.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT will cure Salt Rheum.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures Old Sores. Skin.
WHEATON'S OINTMENT cures all Diseases of the Price 50 cts.—by mail 60 cts. All Druggists sell it.
WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Proprietors.

PRINCE & COS AUTOMATIC ORGANS AND MELODEONS.
Forty thousand are now in use
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

Stereopticons and Magic Lanterns,
With the improved Limet Light, and an assortment of several thousand artistically colored Photographic Views on Glass, to illustrate Art, Science, Religion, and History. Indispensable to academies and Sunday-schools—a refining parlor entertainment—an attractive public exhibition. The light is equal to that of 160 candles, at an expense of $1 for the materials. Priced and illustrated catalogue free by mail on application.
T. H. M'ALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

Send 25 Cents for your choice of 30 Useful Articles for ONE DOLLAR. Send for full particulars of the most popular sale in the world. Address TOWLE & CO., 7 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

Popular Revolution.
APPROVED BY THE MASSES.
PRICES HAVE BEEN UNREASONABLY HIGH.
The Universal Demand is met by
Baldwin the Clothier.
The People testify their appreciation. They throng the Store. They buy the Clothing. The Price tells, and every one tells the Price—the lowest in the city.
FABRICS CUT—WORKMANSHIP UNEQUALED.
FOLLER ATTENTION TO ALL.
The Price of Every Garment Marked in Plain Figures.
One Price—Cash on Delivery—no Deviation.
BALDWIN THE CLOTHIER,
GREAT SALES—WHOLESALE STOCK at RETAIL.
Cor. Broadway and Canal St.



PARIS,
1867.
Cheap, Useful, and Elegant.
"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINIUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"
(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "KOSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."
TRADE MARK.
The Improved Bronze Aluminium, of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of Scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by rescript of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacture of Church goods.
The rich color which it always retains is more pleasant to the eye than that of gold. It is therefore better adapted to the manufacture of watch-cases than any composition ever found. The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all hunting-case—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skillful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $16 00. None genuine unless bearing my trade-mark as above. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.
Goods sent by express C.O.D., with charges.
Not responsible for money sent enclosed in letters.
Address JULES D. JEQUIER VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

CONSUMPTION CURED.
Upham's Fresh Meat Cure for Consumption and Bronchial Affections, is unrestricted and recommended by Physicians all over the country, and is performing more cures than all other remedies combined. A trial will convince the most skeptical. $1 a bottle; six for $5. Sent by Express. Circulars free. Sold by C. Upham, 25 South Eighth St., Philada., and all Druggists.

Great Aches from Little Toe Corns Grow.
By using GEO. F. GANTZ & CO.'S PURE WHITE ROCK BUTASIL, and making your own Soap, you will have many a dollar in your pocket-book at the end of the year than would not be there otherwise.
Try the experiment. It is as easy as an old shoe. Your grocer will get it for you, or at 62 Pine Street, New York. One pound makes 16 pounds best hard soap.

Gettysburg Asylum.
GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL
IN AID OF THE GETTYSBURG ASYLUM
FOR
Invalid Soldiers,
TO BE HELD AT
HORTICULTURAL HALL, Philadelphia,
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22d.

SPECIAL NOTICE.
Tickets are only to be shown at the door, and can be retained by the purchaser until after the distribution of Awards. (See Descriptive Circular, or Harper's Weekly of Feb. 15th and 22d.)
Tickets can be obtained at the Music, Drug, Book, and Fancy Stores generally, and at the offices of the
Gettysburg Asylum Association:
1126 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA;
566 BROADWAY, New York:
217 GRAND STREET, Brooklyn, E. D.

THOMSON'S PATENT
"GLOVE-FITTING" CORSET

EXCELS ALL OTHERS
IN DURABILITY, ELEGANCE OF SHAPE, AND COMFORT TO THE WEARER.
At Retail by LORD & TAYLOR, and all first-class dealers. At Wholesale by THOMSON, LANGDON & CO.,
391 Broadway, New York.

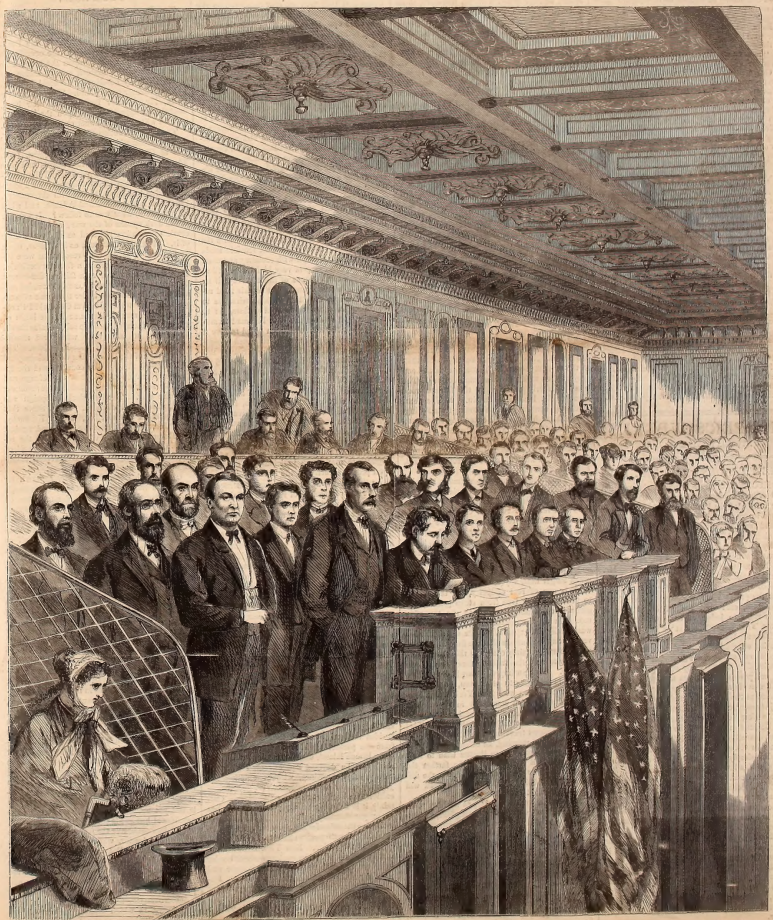
GOLD PENS.
Gold, Ivory, Pearl, and Rubber Pen and Pencils, at prices that defy competition. Send for circular giving exact sizes and prices. All goods warranted. Engraving at 50 cents each by mail. Manufactory 15 Maiden Lane. E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau Street, New York City.

ECONOMY IS WEALTH.
Fifty per cent. or more saved on Dry Goods of every description. Every package $1. Send for descriptive circular. SYMONDS & Co., 120 Chambers St., N.Y.

LYON'S
Ladies' Paper
COLLARS.
Splendid Imitation of Linen Embroidery and Needle-work in every variety. They are worn by ladies every where. We will send a dozen of either of the above, or of all of them, by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price. Try them. Address
Wm. L. Lyon & Son, P. O. Box 4461, N. Y.
N.B.—Merchants will be supplied on very liberal terms. Samples and Price-list by mail when desired.

JUSTICE to yourself and friends requires that you should use the article that will do you good when sick. The White Pine Compound will do you good in all cases of Lung, Throat, and Kidney Complaints. It is a true article, as all who have used it will testify.

£150,000,000,
Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1866. Fee to search any names, $1. Gun & Co., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.



THE WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINES Manufactured by the use of the Bruen Manufg Co.'s New Cloth Plate.
By substituting this Plate for the old one, three distinct and different stitches can be made, viz., the Lock, Double-Loop Elastic (or so-called Grover & Baker), and the newly-patented Three-Thread Embroidery Stitch.
Price of Machine, $10 00.
The Bruen Manufacturing Co.,
676 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 584.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE REPORTERS' GALLERY OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT."

VERY few persons have any distinct idea of a reporter, and those several American variations of the genus, yclept "War Correspondent," "Special Correspondent," and "Our Washington Correspondent." His social status is too often lower in the scale than his intellectual attainments would warrant him in taking; but this is less his fault and that of society than it is that of his profession. The nature of his labor makes him unobtrusive, though prying; quick, though busy; a listener rather than a talker; the observer rather than the observed; his identity is swallowed up in that of his journal; he is known less by his name than his title; and, finally, he is a night-bird sleeping when others sleep, and working and praying when others sleep. And yet what would society do without these unobtrusive, meddling spies upon itself? It would come to an end, or nearly so; for what would an American newspaper be without its reports of Congressional proceedings, its White House scandal, its army bulletin, its police news, its political "pow-wows," its sensational sermons, its appalling accidents, its harrowing disasters? And what would any American community be without its newspaper? And as society can not do without its newspaper, and as newspapers are dependent on the reporters, it follows, as logically as ever Polonius argued, that the world is greatly beholden to the reporters, "those gentlemen," as JOHN BRIGHT called them, "to whom the cause of liberty and good government is so greatly indebted."

Our engraving on the preceding page is of the Reporters' Gallery, House of Representatives, Washington; and in it the Washington representer of the present day will recognize the features of several of the best known of "Our Washington Correspondents." There are now on the official list of the House the names of more than fifty recognized reporters, though there are desks for only forty-seven. In bygone days the gallery was occupied by such editors then reporters as HON. HENRY J. RAYMOND, JAMES BROOKS, and W. E. WOODWARD, all of whom have since occupied desks on the floor of the House as honored Representatives; CARL SCHURZ, who subsequently ascended to Major-General in the army, and JAMES E. HARVEY, now United States Minister to Portugal. We believe that "the gallery" did not exist in its present shape in the early days of JAMES GORDON BENNETT, of the Herald, who was the great original "Washington Correspondent;" and in the many changes which have taken place only a few of the original occupants of the gallery are to be found in it at present. On the official register of the House will be enrolled papers of the country are represented by old and experienced reporters.

Besides the house in "the gallery" of the House, the reporters of the principal papers of the country, particularly those of New York, have offices in the Capital. The arrangements of these offices are located in Fourteenth Street, under the Ebbitt House—reporters have an intuitive knowledge of what good quarters are, whether for "taking notes" or lunches—and so numerous have these offices become that the block is familiarly known as a "Newspaper Row."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1868.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE LAW.

BEFORE this paper is issued the question of the impeachment will probably be decided. The offence of the President is plain. He assumes to not himself above the law, upon the ground that in his judgment the law is unconstitutional. His power to render proper cases can hardly be conceived, for if he be the judge of one law he is the judge of all, and no law will be executed until he approves it. Mr. JAMES BROOKS, in the very lowest and most slipshod speech which he made in the House upon the presentation of the resolution of impeachment, said that the President had as much right to judge of the constitutionality of the Tenure-of-Office Act as the Senate or the House. Undoubtedly he has; but the Constitution expressly declares that if the President objects to an act upon the ground of want of constitutionality, or upon any other ground, if he can not persuade Congress to agree with him, and the act is again passed by a two-thirds vote, it becomes the law of the land, notwithstanding the judgment of the President.

The NEW YORK TIMES echoes the remark of Mr. BROOKS in saying of the President: "But it can scarcely be unlawful for him to perform an act in vacation of an unconstitutional law, which is simply no law at all; and until the validity of this law shall have been decided by the Supreme Court the question of the President's guilt or innocence can scarcely be entertained." That is to say, if the President vetoes a bill, and it becomes a law despite the veto, the President may set it aside until the Supreme Court declares it to be valid. But if the President is not bound by the law, nobody else is; and the Times declares that no law is binding, even if passed by a two-thirds vote of Congress, until the Supreme Court has approved it. Such a theory reduces the function of the representatives of the people to the mere initiation of laws, and vests the real power of the Government exclusively in the Executive and Judiciary.

The Tenure-of-Office Act was passed by Congress, vetoed by the President, passed over his veto by the constitutional majority, and became the law. The President acknowledged it to be a law by conforming to its requirements, and explaining to the Senate why he had suspended the Secretary of War. The Senate did not approve the suspension, and there the matter should have ended. But by withholding and refusing to remove the Secretary the President deliberately and distinctly violates the law which forbids the removal of any civil officer appointed with the consent of the Senate without its concurrence if it be in session. There could not be a more flagrant defiance of law or usurpation of authority. If the President, as we have said, may do it in the case of one law, he may do it with all laws. The country could not be sure of the execution of any law, however constitutionally enacted, until the Supreme Court had passed upon it, and the consequent confusion and uncertainty would be intolerable. The assumption of Mr. BROOKS and of the New York Times that a law may be held unconstitutional until pronounced otherwise by the court is subversive of the government and of civil order, and the question ought, therefore, to be distinctly settled whether the President has the power of dispensing with the laws—a power which the two thousand years ago declothroned King JAMES II. for claiming.

The debate in the House need not have been so bitter. It was mere sound and fury, ending in taunts and threats of Mr. JAMES BROOKS. It was foolish in Mr. INGERSOLL to predict that Mr. WADE would be in the White House within ten days, and equally foolish in Mr. BROOKS to deny it. Mr. FARNSWORTH'S tirade against the Democratic party was elicited by Mr. BROOKS'S claim that the brute force was upon his side. The truth is, that Mr. FARNSWORTH, who vainly aspires to some kind of leadership in the last party to which he has joined himself, very feebly imitates the style of those to whom DAVIS, BENJAMIN, and the other conspirators played in the session of 1860–'61. His speech required no answer, and the orators of the majority should have confined themselves to the simple point at issue. Moreover, there should have been no attempt to restrict debate. There is no occasion for suspending the Rules. Conviction provides every method of proceeding. The President will not resist impeachment, and upon this simple point of deliberate violation of the law, the case will be soon and clearly tried, his trial, if ordered, need not last long.

RAILROADS ACROSS OUR STATE.

THE energy of Boston to reach the trade of the great West by railroads, extending through the State of New York, was never greater than at the present moment. Two plans have been projected on which work is being done: 1. The most northerly of these is the famous road from Boston to Hoosic Mountain. 2. The next, southerly, consists of the Boston and Albany Railroad, Massachusetts, and extending southwesterly into Connecticut, and thence, westerly, through the northern tier of counties in Connecticut to the Hudson River at Fishkill. 3. The third is known as the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad.

1. The northern line of communication with the Hudson through the Hoosic Mountain will be accomplished by a union of Massachusetts and also of Vermont charters. These charters form the roads known as the Troy and Fitchburg, and the Troy and Greenfield lines, which roads together, when completed, will constitute a continuous line from Boston to the Hudson. The tunnel which the Troy and Greenfield Road is obliged to construct is much longer than any on this continent. The work is one of vital importance to Boston, as it will to procure a line free from steep grades, and make it unnecessary to lift to the top of a mountain all the merchandise that go east or west justify the expense. There are now but very strong indications that the State of Massachusetts will certainly complete this tunnel with the view to a continuous road to the line of Lake Ontario. Such an improvement is deemed essential to the growth of Boston, and to that active competition with New York which Boston capitalists keep constantly in view. The policy which governs in adopting the most northerly line for crossing the Hudson is this: That passenger travelers, who, for the benefit at the point of crossing, be offered greater inducements to proceed to Boston than to New York, and it is supposed that the farther the distance to New York, and the greater the difficulty of reaching it, the more disposed will they be to select the Eastern route.

2. The line next southerly, as we have seen, is designed to extend from Springfield, Massachusetts, to Fishkill, on the Hudson, opposite the mouth of the Fishkill Creek. The several towns in Litchfield and Hartford counties which are interested in this road have voted to raise the proportionate expense applicable to their section, and in Dutchess County, in New York, through the enterprise of a few capitalists, an equal amount of liberality has been shown. The object of this route, so far as Massachusetts is concerned, is a connection with the Hudson in a manner to avoid the steep grades of the Western Railroad and easily reach the coal-mines of Pennsylvania and the productions of the Western Country. The Western road, constructed by Whistler, is, particularly on the eastern slope of the mountain, a grand monument of engineering skill. A stream, by which it finds its way to the plains, is crossed twenty-seven times, by means of arched masonry of considerable height and span; but the road is an expensive one to maintain and operate.

3. The third line, which is still farther south, and is designed to connect roads extending from Boston and Providence to Waterbury, by way of Hartford with Fishkill, or some point on the Hudson River which will also enable the interior towns of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and part of Massachusetts to reach in the most direct manner those coal-fields, and the productions which find a market by way of the Erie Railroad. The Secretary of the Boston Board of Trade says of this road, in his report made in January of this year, that "the Company has recently got rid of the lease from Boston to the Erie Railway under contract; the new portion is to be graded for a double track, and it is agreed that the iron shall be laid by July 1869. Upward of 100 men are now employed on the route, and the Company confidently expect the road to be open for traffic at the time stipulated in the contract."

The Danbury Times said of this road, in a recent Number, that the work is to be commenced early in the spring, that Messrs. DILLON & Co. are the contractors, and that it is the western course it is located to run through Danbury. We have no means which enable us to decide whether or not the road is thus located; but it is very certain that its location must be in or near that place. A large force of engineers is now engaged (February 21) at and near Poughkeepsie, on the Harlem Railroad, in experimental surveys to test the feasibility of a route through that portion of Westchester. The object of this survey is doubtless to ascertain if a better and cheaper route can be obtained by running to Peekskill than by running to Fishkill. An extent of country of not less than twenty miles in width, lying between Pawling's Station on the Harlem Railroad and Pawling's on the same road, has been examined with the closest scrutiny to find the most feasible mode of reaching Boston with economy and ease. A topographical map of very high value will at least be the consequence of these surveys if no road shall be constructed; but as this road received full credit for the large amount of assents to the extent of three millions of dollars, yet to be expended, and as the Erie Railroad immediately after the recent election voted to give it the necessary help, it can be supposed reasonably certain that it will be completed by the time mentioned. Before the State granted its aid in April, the Boston Board of Trade passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this Board the speedy completion of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad would be productive of vast benefit to the commerce of Boston, and would greatly promote the prosperity of New England; and they earnestly recommend that the State should grant to the enterprise such aid as the Legislature may deem judicious, by the loan, upon proper security, of the State aid."

As this route is likely to be soon constructed, we give the particulars of its lines acquired by purchase and union. One line starts at the foot of Summer Street, Boston, and proceeds southwesterly until it reaches Willimantic, Thompson, Putnam, Willimantic, Hartford, and Waterbury, thence it is to go to the Hudson. Another line runs from Providence to Willimantic, and from Thompson to Southbridge, and then from Brookline through Woonsocket, Willimantic, and Middletown to New Haven. The total amounts to 423 miles, of which 235 miles are constructed and leased.

The probability of the early completion of that portion of the road extending to the Hudson River, during the present year, has stimulated the enterprise of New Haven into the immediate location of a road extending by way of Derby, the Ousatonic Valley, Purdy's Station, and Peekskill on the Hudson, and thence down the river by an elevated bridge, so as to connect with the Erie Railroad at Sutton's Station.

This fortunate combination interest about these four several routes by which the Eastern States seek a passage way over the State of New York, besides the activity which they develop, arises from the prejudice which we felt in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut that these roads can be devised and executed with the speed of Congress, without exciting the jealousy of our own State, such as New Jersey exhibits with respect to such enterprises. Certainly it is a display on our part of a large but yet proper liberality. For the refined this accommodation the refusal would necessarily lead to the most bitter conflicts, and ultimately to the breaking up of the Union. New York must herself invoke the aid of States on her western border in her search for the coveted Western trade, and what she seeks she must grant to others. Besides, although Boston will be able by means of these new routes to reach the Hudson without ascending very high elevations, it will be impossible for it to interfere with the supremacy of New York, whether the river be navigated at or above Troy, or at Fishkill, or at Peekskill. Such supplies as reach those points from the West will float down the river to our great market, except for special reasons they are ordered to the Eastern States for local consumption. The quantity of supplies thus needed along all these lines will be immense, and doubtless support whatever roads may be laid down.

The Pacific Railroad has in great part excited this active competition, and as it will soon be running over the Rocky Mountains, freighted with the light articles of commerce furnished from the great hive of Asiatic industry, it becomes us as well to see that New York is ready for the mighty contest that is to rouse the energy of nations. An additional track parallel with the Central line, and running through the Alleghany at the opening which the Central uses at Little Falls, will doubtless be required to carry the productions which the Pacific roads and some of these Eastern lines will so largely increase.

PROSPECTS.

THE Democratic leaders have lately been in council at Washington to determine when and where the next Convention of the party should meet to nominate a candidate for the Presidency. The President seized the occasion to show his peculiar claims upon the nomination by a defiance of Congress, and to shelve one of his rivals by nominating General M'CLELLAN as Minister to England. The chiefs of the party, Mr. August Belmont and Mr. Seymour, doubtless compared notes upon the situation, and we will now take sweet counsel with them.

The last Convention of the Democratic party, as we all remember, and do not mean to forget, met at Chicago at the end of August, 1864. The campaign of GRANT in Virginia had been long; the weather was fine and hot, and the general disappointment at the failure of the Petersburg mine had cast a gloom over the country. SHERMAN had not reached Atlanta, and when he was there, what was to follow? It was the era of the dark epochs of the war; and the Democratic Convention resolved to make the most of it. ALEXANDER VALLANDIGHAM, ex-President, made an anti-war speech. The resolutions were reported by VALLANDIGHAM, a frank secessionist. They derided the war as a failure, denounced the acts of the Federal Government, and declared surrender to the rebellion under the name of compromise. Upon this platform General M'CLELLAN and GEORGE H. PENDLETON, the latter of whom had declared that the war ought not to be allowed to have their way, were nominated for President and Vice-President. The proceedings of the Convention were telegraphed with triumph through the country, and the orgasms and orators of the party in Chicago and elsewhere fiercely vituperated the Government and the war. The Democratic campaign was short, sharp, and decisive. Every State that took part in the election, except Kentucky, New Jersey, and Delaware, declared against the Democratic policy of surrender to the rebellion and consequent national ruin; and of the 233 electoral votes the Democratic candidates received but 21.

Upon the inauguration of Mr. LINCOLN for his second term the organs of the Democratic party devoted themselves to denunciation of the melancholy spectacle of Vice-President JOHNSON'S drunkenness. The New York World described his speech as "the spewings of a drunken boor," and the Vice-President himself as "this insolent drunken brute, in comparison with whom even Caligula's horse was respectable." He was also this "clownish drunkard," "betrayed by his own beastly habits and his boorish mind." Mr. LINCOLN was murdered, and Mr. JOHNSON became President. From that time to the present he endeavored in every way to defeat the will of the people as expressed by Congress, to surrender the late rebel States to the exclusive political supremacy of the rebels, and to abandon the freedmen wholly to the mercies of the late master class. In pursuing this policy, which undoes as far as possible the work of the war, which, if successful, would engage the country in another civil struggles, and which is repugnant to honor, reason, and patriotism, the President has ceased to be, in the eyes of the Democratic party, a drunken, an insolent brute, a man of beastly instincts, and a drunken boor, and has become a great constitutional statesman, whose words are no longer "spewings" but precious drops of conservative wisdom.

Under the necessary leadership of a man "with whom even Caligula's horse was respectable," the party is beginning its campaign. He is not yet nominated, and he may not be the candidate; but as his policy is that of the party, and as he commands the sympathy, as he is the position of leader, whether the other chiefs approve or not. But just here begin the difficulties. It is easy to name a place for the Convention to meet—but who shall be the candidate? The West pronounces loudly and in advance for PENDLETON—whose henchman is VALLANDIGHAM—and repudiation. The Eastern States, in which Democratic leaders are heavy bondholders, prefer SEYMOUR, and as they have succeeded in calling the Convention in the city of New York, the chances of SEY-

MOUR's nomination are increased. But the West will come full of hope and resolution for Pendleton and repudiation.

The great Generals of the war furnish no candidate, for they naturally have no sympathy with the party which in the hour of their peril and heroism declared the war a failure and its soldiers "Lincoln's hirelings." There is no man upon whom the party unites. When the candidate is nominated the party machinery will of course be put under high-pressure to produce a factitious enthusiasm, but the bondholding Democrats will not all agree to the repudiating philosophy of Pendleton as amiably as Mr. Curtius Belmont, and while they shout against the iniquity of not taxing bonds, will do all they can to save their bonds from taxation. Indeed there is but one point upon which the great Democratic party is a unit, and that is, hostility to the equal suffrage of colored citizens. Upon this sublime principle it takes its stand, and who, upon the whole, so proper a representative of it as the Nashville Moses?

But while the chiefs consult the battle begins. In New Hampshire, where the election takes place early in March, the spirit which is to inspire the Democratic campaign in the country is already manifested. One of the orators denounces the "miserable battle-flags" in the State House at Concord, and especially hates the memory of soldiers. "I do not know," he considerately suggests, "as I would hang one-legged and one-armed soldiers, but I would pray to God to get them out of our way as soon as possible." Mr. Henry Clay Dean, a representative Democratic patriot, seizes a cane in the midst of one of his speeches, and rushes at a dissenting auditor, threatening to beat out his brains. Mr. C. Chauncey Burr, another of the same kind, contemptuously asks of the men who served in the New Hampshire regiments, or sustained them, "Who are conquered—you or the South? I say you are conquered. You can never conquer the South, and I pray God you never may." This Democratic Ajax begins the campaign of 1868 precisely where his party began it at Chicago in 1864, by declaring the war a failure, and advising us to sue for terms. Mr. Franklin Pierce also takes an active interest in the election, and his activity naturally recalls his cheerful letter to Jefferson Davis in January, 1860, in which he wrote: "The fighting will not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely; it will be within our own borders, our own streets."

All this does not seem to be very promising for the Democratic party. To be sure Mr. Vallandigham is going to speak in Connecticut, and perhaps Mr. Fernando Wood and Mr. Brick Pomeroy can be persuaded to come over and help. But we remark with concern that the mass meeting of the "Prisoners of State"—that is, of men who were caught endeavoring to betray the country to the rebellion after the high Vallandigham manner, was indefinitely postponed. And amidst all this distraction and perplexity of the great party of reaction, of negro hate, and of special privilege, how exasperating to see the great party of equal rights—the party that did not believe the war a failure, nor invite national ruin—the party of national justice and patriotism, warmly uniting upon the wise and magnanimous chief of the army of loyal citizens as their candidate for the Presidency, and calmly insisting upon maintaining the national honor, and upon the consent not of a disaffected class but of the whole people, as their policy of reconstruction.

BUSINESS REVIVING.

There is cause for general congratulation that the country has escaped that avalanche of evils which it was predicted would overtake it during the winter just past. Instead of the prevailing distress and business stagnation of the autumn having been greatly aggravated by the lapse of time, we are able to note a marked improvement in nearly every department of industry, despite the numerous obstacles, political, financial, and otherwise, which have been interposed. We know not how much assurance of future benefit to build upon present indications, but we are disposed to make the most of them, and to take fresh courage in renewed efforts to lift our business interests out of the slough in which they have long been mired.

It is true that Congress has not shown itself particularly astute in its management of financial questions, nor has it adopted any decisive measures of positive relief. Nevertheless, what has been done is of a character to inspire confidence and effect an improvement in the business aspect of the country generally. It is now settled that there will be no disturbance of the volume of the currency for the present, one way or the other, either in the direction of expansion or contraction; repudiation is scotched, and the preservation of the public faith assured; the National Banking system will be fostered and protected; while in all that concerns taxation and expenditure progress in the right direction is perceptible.

This improvement in trade is specially noteworthy in the Southern States—due chiefly to the recent rise in the price of cotton from 15½ to 24 @ 25 cents. Under its magical influence the fleecy staple is being exhumed from dusty places of long concealment, and there is promise that the crop will exceed by 300,000 bales the highest estimate of the Fall. The local press speaks in cheerful tones of future prospects. Country merchants are generally meeting their obligations, contrary to the expectation some time ago, when cotton fell to so low a price; planters are paying up their indebtedness of 1867, and help is promised them to carry on the farming operations of the current year; negroes are inclined to make contracts; and the once despondent and apathetic are preparing to go to work to raise cotton and corn with as much animation as though they were just commencing life. In the culture of rice, too, very few have failed to make remunerative crops, while the profits of those who have held on for an advance have been very large. Under an impetus such as this land is rising in value, and tracts that have been abandoned for several years are now being taken up for cultivation. The press is most urgent in pressing upon Northern men the advantages which the present holds out to them, and there is an increasing disposition among capitalists to avail themselves of them. Within a few days past planters have been able to negotiate numerous loans here in New York.

Of course this activity at the South has its effect upon trade here, the more especially as Southern merchants are buying a fair bill of dry-goods and general merchandise for the Spring consumption. Cotton goods have materially advanced, and mills which had stopped or were running on short time are employing more hands. In the foreign Dry-Goods trade there is also a perceptible improvement, and the same is true of business generally, not only here, but in New England and the West. Down East there are signs of a disposition among the ship-builders to resume business, and several contracts have already been made. In Massachusetts the shoe business is looking up; the iron mills of Troy have started anew; locomotive works are increasing their scale of operations; the building trades here and at the West promise an amount of work for the coming season fully equal to that of last year. The Albany Board of Trade reports the business of that city as largely on the increase, and in the main prosperous. This is the pleasing information that comes to us piecemeal from various quarters. Let us hope that the promise of returning prosperity will not fail of the fulfillment; for the interests involved are of incalculable benefit to the country.

The expansion of our trade and the return of former commercial activity are indispensable to our continued vitality as a nation. Without it all legislative contrivances for reducing our burdens can avail nothing. We have heard the question of resumption and the schemes for adjusting the currency discussed from every conceivable stand-point of financial ingenuity; but any measure adopted, however wise, can never be one-half so potent as that simple productive power which grows with our annual growth and expands with the development of our resources. If we take the history of the past fifteen years as a guide, we shall readily perceive that time alone may accomplish all that is required to remedy present evils. Following the like ratio of progress, the present redundant volume of the currency will all be absorbed by the business of the country at the end of fifteen years. A nation, like an individual, can only work his way out of debt by the slow process of developing the value of his property. Fifteen years hence our greatly expanded resources, our increased productive power, and the greater volume of our products seeking exchange, will bring the value of gold and paper-money to a close approximation. Besides, our present annual gold product of $100,000,000 would of itself nearly suffice to pay off the national debt in fifteen years. The volume of our currency will rest upon no doubtful basis then, and resumption must come naturally and necessarily, if not accomplished sooner by extraneous means; but so long as the currency continues disproportionate to the commercial necessities of the country, we must suffer financial disturbance. Any decided improvement in trade is therefore to be hailed as a substantial advance made toward the final accomplishment of the great national purpose.

SYRACUSE.

The reactionary newspapers which have shouted loud and long over the result of some of the elections for supervisors in this State have not very vociferously called attention to the late city election in Syracuse. Last year the Democrats in that city elected their candidate for Mayor by some two hundred majority. This year they nominated, in eager accordance with the real tendency of the reaction, one of the most conspicuous Copperheads in the State, John A. Green, Jun. The Republicans nominated Charles Andrews, one of the delegates at large to the Republican National Convention; one of the most sagacious, able, and influential delegates in the Constitutional Convention; and a man whose personal character fitly represents the purity and humanity of his political principles. The Republicans also nominated Patrick Corbett as Justice; also a member of the Constitutional Convention, and one of the most eloquent and accomplished of the young Irishmen of New York. The contest was very warm, and was regarded with great interest as of peculiar significance. The result was the election of Mr. Andrews and his ticket by more than a hundred majority, a gain of some three hundred and sixty-four over the last spring.

This election shows that the reaction is spending itself; and it reminds the Republicans that their candidates must be both in character and ability really representative of the party, or the full vote can not be polled. If we nominate the best men we nominate the strongest. That is a truth which we hope all our Conventions, for greater or smaller nominations, will steadily bear in mind. If doubtful men are nominated from any questionable consideration their very names invite defeat, and their reputations deserve it. And the attempt of party papers, when such men are nominated, to dragoon all dissenters into supporting them, is merely a systematic demoralization of which any party will surely pay the penalty.

RAILROAD COMFORT AND SAFETY.

We have long since urged in these columns the construction of comfortable railroad cars. There seems to be no good reason why money should fail to buy that accommodation in the car which it can always secure in the hotel; and the experiment is now trying of a variety of cars. Upon the Hudson River and Central Roads there has been, during the last season, a carriage called the Palace car, which was attached to some of the through trains to Buffalo. Its movement was very steady and quiet. The car was divided into little rooms connecting by a passage along the side upon which the rooms opened. The wood was black-walnut, and the furnishing was luxurious. Mr. Vanderbilt is understood not to have smiled upon the Palace car; but we do not know for what reason. We do know, however, that many travelers found it exceedingly comfortable, and gladly paid the increase of fare which was demanded for the greater comfort.

The New Haven Road has recently placed some new cars upon the express trains to Boston, modeled upon the European car with improvements. Among these is the system of warming by hot pipes, which, upon trial on one of the coldest days of this cold season, was found to work well. Besides this convenience there is the usual bell-rope connecting with the locomotive; the closet in each apartment of the car, and the little space between the roof of the car and each partition, so that no part is absolutely separated from another. Somewhat similar carriages have been in use upon the Fall River and Boston Road for some time.

If now the same rigorous regard is shown for the safety as for the comfort of travelers, our roads should soon be the best in the world. But every body shudders in such frosty weather as we have lately seen in thinking of the horrible accidents from broken rails and wheels which the newspapers will surely unfold. Nor can public attention be too strenuously directed to the subject. There are hundreds of escapes and accidents with no fatal results which are never heard of. Even Mr. Vanderbilt discontinued some of the signal-men upon the Hudson River Road, but presently restored them. Yet there is no road in the country which is more exposed to danger, and upon every rod of which there should be such constant supervision. We hope that after the terrible experience of this winter, in which so many accidents have ended in the burning of the cars, that Mr. Vanderbilt will abolish all the stoves in his cars before another season. He has identified his name with several of the great roads that radiate from this city. If he will make them as safe as they will probably be profitable his fame will be enviable.

A correspondent who travels a great deal, and who has seen, he says, with pleasure the interest which Harper's Weekly takes in the welfare of travelers, writes us the following word upon "Wretched Railroads:"

"A correspondent in a late Number of your paper brings into favorable notice the management of a Vermont railroad; and justly, too, I think. But permit me to say a word of another road in the same State, but of a different nature, and that, too, upon which the sad disaster at Northfield bridge occurred only a few weeks since. But from no pecuniary interest in either of these roads, and such interest only as every traveler must have, willing or not; and that the demands of safety.

"A few weeks since, while riding over the Vermont Central, having become fatigued from the constant jolting of the cars, I arose from the seat and stood at the rear end of the car, which was also the rear of the train, and thought to vary the monotony of the long ride with views of the rugged mountain scenery exposed by the tortuous windings of the road. And here I discovered much of the cause for the severe jolting I had experienced. The tremendous freights which go thundering over this road have left their impression upon the rails in such a manner that if the officers of the Company ever pass over it, even with eyes shut, they must be reminded of neglected duty. A great part of the surface rail has become so crushed and splintered away as to certainly suggest accidents; and the ends fail so much of meeting in many instances that when the wheels sank and rebounded from those villainous spaces it required a firm grasp upon objects at either side to maintain a comparatively upright position. There are, perhaps, scores of roads in this country in equally bad condition, but is it wrong—or rather is it not right—to particularize roads even of this sort, when the safety of thousands of lives are daily at stake? If the short-sighted policy of railroad managers looks only to stock-dividends, have not the people, by whom, indirectly, corporate privileges are granted, also some interests which deserve consideration? There are thousands who think, with you, that they have, and among the number,

"Railer No. 2."

WASHINGTON COLLEGE, VIRGINIA.

A meeting called by Governor Fenton, the Rev. Drs. M'Clintock, Adams, Storrs, Hitchcock, Vinton, Prime, Dix, Tyng, Jun., Curry, Bishop Potter, Henry Ward Beecher, W. E. Dodge, Peter Cooper, A. A. Low, with many other leading clergymen and citizens, will be held on the evening of the 2d of March, in behalf of Washington College, Virginia. These gentlemen regard the situation and associations of the College as a peculiarly desirable point for creating an educational fund whose benefits shall be shared by all the Southern States. There is no subject more important, there is nothing more absolutely essential to peaceful reconstruction, than general education in those States. Mr. Beecher and other earnest and eloquent gentlemen are to address the meeting in aid of the College, of which General Lee is President. We trust that those who wish to do what they can to heal all national wounds will give the subject a candid and thoughtful attention.

THE JUNKER HOF OF KÖNIGSBERG.

It would be singular if in two such portly volumes as those in which William Hepworth Dixon, author of "the New America," gives the world his rhapsodical theories about "spiritual wives," there should not be at least one or two good ideas, or facts, or descriptions. The good ideas are few, and the "facts" very dubious; but there is a very good description of the Junker Hof of Königsberg, which is a German lecture hall, something after the order of the English Guildhall, and a happy mixture of the lecture-room of our Cooper Institute and the Atlantic Garden. It is a picture of a lecture-hall in a Prussian city "where the churches are government offices, the preachers are police magistrates, and the services are governed by rules as stern as the articles of war."

"The Junker Hof is not, under ordinary circumstances, a desert place. Here the great merchants hold their balls; the great bankers spread their boards. Here the political battles of the town and province are fought out. Here the Rev. Dr. Julius Rupp delights a fashionable audience by his eloquence; and Dr. Jolowicz discourses to a body of reforming Jews. Any great singer who may wander into Ost Preussen is heard in the Junker Hof. The hall belongs to the city, and the use of it is only to be obtained from the town-council; but, in fact, the use of it is seldom refused when the applicants are of standing in the place. In the same room Johann Jacoby dilates to the democracy on the rights of man; and Karl Rosenkranz whispers to the higher classes on the charms of philosophy and art. I have been invited to an evening party, given in this hall, by the foreign Consuls, to the cream of the cream, where the young ladies dance and flirt, while the older people drink tea and play at whist. In a word, every thing that happens in Königsberg happens in the Junker Hof. The room is large and nobly planned, as becomes the birth-place of German liberalism, the cradle (as it boasts) of the new Fatherland. The walls are rough with gods and nymphs, with busts of heroes, kings, and poets. Two large candelabra hang from the roof. Apollo smiles from the ceiling, on which he is reclining, in bright-red paint, his lyre in hand, with Mercury and Aurora in attendance on his godship."

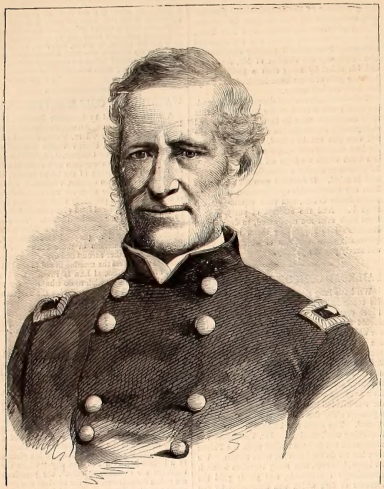
DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

On Friday, February 21, President Johnson transmitted to both Houses of Congress a Message announcing that he had removed Secretary of War Stanton, and had appointed Adjutant-General Lorenzo Thomas in his place. Great excitement ensued in both Houses. The Senate at once went into executive session to consider the extraordinary action of the President, and after due deliberation passed a resolution declaring that under the Constitution and laws of the United States, by virtue of whose authority Mr. Johnson claimed to have acted, the President had no power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other person to perform the duties of that officer ad interim.

In the House action was not less prompt. A resolution to the effect that Andrew Johnson be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors was offered, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. This resolution was reported back by the Committee on February 22, and the debate was begun with great spirit on the same day. It ended on Monday, February 24, at five o'clock P.M., when a vote was taken, and the resolution (which reads thus: "Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors") was adopted by a vote of 126 yeas to 47 nays.

In the mean time Adjutant-General Thomas had repeatedly demanded possession of the War-office, and had as repeatedly been refused by Secretary Stanton, who also caused his arrest for exercising or attempting to exercise the duties of the Secretary of War.



CONGRESS.

Senator Wilson's very important bill reducing the army by abolishing several grades, discharging bands, etc., passed the Senate on February 17. The Army Appropriation Bill was passed by the House on February 20. It appropriates $33,082,093 for the expenditures for the coming year.

The House on February 17 appropriated $50,000 for the relief of destitute citizens imprisoned abroad.

NEWS ITEM.

The Florida Convention adopted a Constitution on February 24, and it is to be submitted to the people on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of April. It declares universal suffrage; abolishes all proscription and test oaths; foreigners are made voters on a declaration of their intention to become citizens; and an educational suffrage qualification is provided for after the year 1880.

ADJUTANT GENERAL LORENZO THOMAS, U.S.A.

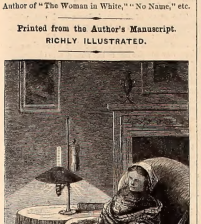
THE LOST ARM.—"I GAVE MY RIGHT ARM GLADLY."—[SEE POEM, PAGE 151.]

GENERAL LORENZO THOMAS.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL LORENZO THOMAS, lately appointed by President JOHNSON as acting Secretary of War, is not, as many supposed, the famous GEORGE H. THOMAS, who defeated ZOLLICOFFER at Mill Springs, Kentucky, saved ROSECRANS'S army at Chickamauga, and who held Chattanooga and Nashville. Adjutant-General LORENZO THOMAS held no command in the field during the war, but was at first employed in the War-office at Washington; he was relieved of that duty by Secretary STANTON, and ordered to the inspection and organization of the colored troops of the Southwest. Subsequently he was given charge of the national cemeteries. He is an old man, sixty-three years of age; has been in the army for forty-five years, and Adjutant-General since March 7, 1861. Our portrait above is a faithful representation of his countenance.

DOLLY'S SLEIGH-RIDE—AN ILLUSTRATION FOR THE JUVENILES.—[SEE PAGE 151.]

[Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]



THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER XVI.

We found my lady with no light in the room but the reading-lamp. The shade was screwed down so as to overshadow her face. Instead of looking up at us in her usual straightforward way, she sat close at the table, and kept her eyes fixed obstinately on an open book.

"Officer," she said, "is it important to the inquiry you are conducting to know beforehand if any person now in this house wishes to leave it?"

"Most important, my lady."

"I have to tell you, then, that Miss Verinder proposes going to stay with her aunt, Mrs. Ablewhite, of Frizinghall. She has arranged to leave us the first thing to-morrow morning."

Sergeant Cuff looked at me. I made a step forward to speak to my mistress—and, feeling my heart fail me (if I must own it), took a step back again, and said nothing.

"May I ask your ladyship when Miss Verinder first thought of going to her aunt's?" inquired the Sergeant.

"About an hour since," answered my mistress.

Sergeant Cuff looked at me once more. They say old people's hearts are not very easily moved. My heart couldn't have thumped much harder than it did now, if I had been five-and-twenty again!

"I have no claim, my lady," says the Sergeant, "to control Miss Verinder's actions. All I can ask you to do is to put off her departure, if possible, till later in the day. I must go to Frizinghall myself to-morrow morning—and I shall be back by two o'clock, if not before. If Miss Verinder can be kept here till that time, I should wish to say two words to her—unexpectedly—before she goes."

My lady directed me to give the coachman her orders that the carriage was not to come for Miss Rachel until two o'clock. "Have you more to say?" she asked of the Sergeant, when this had been done.

"Only one thing, your ladyship. If Miss Verinder is surprised at this change in the arrangements, please not to mention Me as being the cause of putting off her journey."

My mistress cried her head suddenly from her book as if she was going to say something—checked herself by a great effort—and, looking back again at the open page, dismissed us with a sign of her hand.

"That's a wonderful woman," said Sergeant Cuff, when we were out in the hall again. "But for her self-control the mystery that puzzles you, Mr. Betteredge, would have been at an end tonight.

At those words the truth rushed at last into my stupid old head. For the moment I suppose I must have gone clean out of my senses. I seized the Sergeant by the collar of his coat and jammed him against the wall.

"Damn you!" I cried out, "there's something wrong about Miss Rachel—and you have been hiding it from me all this time!"

Sergeant Cuff looked up at me—flat against the wall—without stirring a hand or moving a muscle of his melancholy face.

"Ah," he said, "you've guessed it at last!"

My hand dropped from his collar, and my head sunk on my breast. Please to remember, as some excuse for my breaking out as I did, that I had served the family for fifty years. Miss Rachel had climbed upon my knees, and pulled my whiskers, many and many a time when she was a child. Miss Rachel with all her faults, had been, to my mind, the dearest and prettiest and best young mistress that ever an old servant waited on, and loved. I begged Sergeant Cuff's pardon, but I am afraid I did it with watery eyes, and not in a very becoming way.

"Don't distress yourself, Mr. Betteredge," says the Sergeant, with more kindness than I had any right to expect from him. "In my line of life, if we were quick at taking offense we shouldn't be worth salt to our porridge. If it's any comfort to you, collar me again. You don't in the least know how to do it: but I'll overlook your awkwardness in consideration of your feelings."

He curled up at the corners of his lips, and, in his own dreary way, seemed to think he had delivered himself of a very good joke.

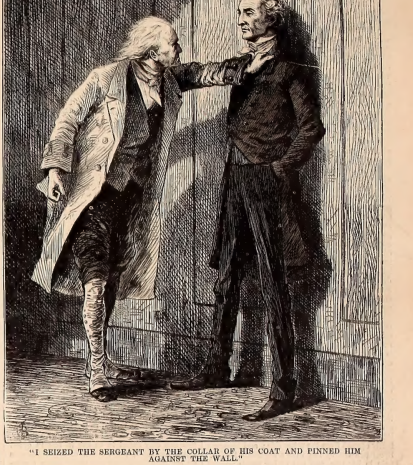
I led him into my own little sitting-room and closed the door.

"Tell me the truth, Sergeant," I said. "What do you suspect? It's no kindness to hide it from me now."

"I don't suspect," said Sergeant Cuff. "I know."

My unlucky temper began to get the better of me again.

"Do you mean to tell me in plain English," I said, "that Miss Rachel has stolen her own Diamond?"



"Yes," says the Sergeant; "that is what I mean to tell you in so many words. Miss Verinder has been in secret possession of the Moonstone from first to last; and she has taken Rosanna Spearman into her confidence because she has calculated on our suspecting Rosanna Spearman of the theft. There is the whole case in a nut-shell. Collar me again, Mr. Betteredge. If it's any vent to your feelings, collar me again."

God help me! my feelings were not to be relieved in that way. "Give me your reasons!" That was all I could say to him.

"You shall hear my reasons to-morrow," said the Sergeant. "If Miss Verinder refuses to put off her visit to her aunt (which you will find Miss Verinder will do), I shall be obliged to lay the whole case before your mistress to-morrow. And as I don't know what may come of it, I shall request you to be present and to hear what passes on both sides. Let the matter rest for to-night. No, Mr. Betteredge, you don't get a word more on the subject of the Moonstone out of me. There is your table spread for supper. That's one of the many human infirmities which I always treat tenderly. If you will ring the bell, I'll say grace. "For what we are going to receive—"

"I wish you a good appetite to it, Sergeant," I said. "My appetite is gone. I'll wait and see you served, and then I'll ask you to excuse me if I go away and try to get the better of this by myself."

I saw him served with the best of every thing—and I shouldn't have been sorry if the best of every thing had choked him. The head gardener (Mr. Begbie) came in at the same time with his weekly account. The Sergeant got on the subject of roses and the merits of grass walks and gravel walks immediately. I left the two together, and went out with a heavy heart. This was the first trouble I remember for many a long year which wasn't to be blown off by a whiff of tobacco, and which was even beyond the reach of Robinson Crusoe.

"I SEIZED THE SERGEANT BY THE COLLAR OF HIS COAT AND PINNED HIM AGAINST THE WALL."

Being restless and miserable, and having no particular room to go to, I took a turn on the terrace, and thought it over in peace and quietness by myself. It doesn't much matter what my thoughts were. I felt wretchedly old, and worn out, and unfit for my place—and began to wonder, for the first time in my life, when it would please God to take me. With all this I held firm, notwithstanding, to my belief in Miss Rachel. If Sergeant Cuff had been Solomon in all his glory, and had told me that my young lady had mixed herself up in a mean and guilty plot, I should have had but one answer for Solomon, wise as he was: "You don't know her, and I do."

My meditations were interrupted by Samuel. He brought me a written message from my mistress.

Going into the house to get a light to read it by, Samuel remarked that there seemed a change coming in the weather. My troubled mind had prevented me from noticing it before. But, now my attention was roused, I heard the dogs uneasy, and the wind moaning low. Looking up at the sky, I saw the rack of clouds getting blacker and blacker, and hurrying faster and faster over a watery moon. Wild weather coming—Samuel was right, wild weather coming.

The message from my lady informed me that the magistrate at Frizinghall had written to remind her about the three Indians. Early in the coming week the rogues must needs be released, and left free to follow their own devices. If we had my more questions to ask them, there was no time to lose. Having forgotten to mention this when she had last seen Sergeant Cuff, my mistress now desired me to supply the omission. The Indians had gone clean out of my head (as they have, no doubt, gone clean out of yours). I didn't see much use in stirring that subject again. However, I obeyed my orders on the spot, as a matter of course.

I found Sergeant Cuff and the gardener, with a bottle of Scotch whisky between them, head over ears in an argument on the growing of roses. The Sergeant was so deeply interested that he laid up his hand, and signed to me not to interrupt the discussion, when I came in. As far as I could understand it, the question between them was, whether the white moss-rose did, or did not, require to be budded on the dog-rose to make it grow well. Mr. Begbie said, Yes; and Sergeant Cuff said, No. They appealed to me to settle as a couple of boys. Knowing nothing whatever about the growing of roses, I steered a middle course—just as her majesty's judges do, when the scales of justice bother them by hanging, even to a hair. "Gentlemen," I remarked, "there is much to be said on both sides." In the temporary lull produced by that impartial sentence I laid my lady's written message on the table under the eyes of Sergeant Cuff.

I had got by this time as nearly as might be to hate the Sergeant. But truth compels me to acknowledge that, in respect of readiness of mind, he was a wonderful man.

In half a minute after he had read the message he had looked back into his memory for Superintendent Seegrave's report; had picked out that part of it in which the Indians were concerned: and was ready with his answer. A certain great traveler, who understood the Indians and their language, had figured in Mr. Seegrave's

"HE LOOKS AT THE BILLIARD-BALLS, I HEARD HER SAY, 'ANY THING RATHER THAN LOOK AT ME!'"

report, hadn't he? Very well. Did I know the gentleman's name and address? Very well again. Would I write them on the back of my lady's message? Much obliged to me. Sergeant Cuff would look that gentleman up when he went to Fryinghall in the morning.

"Do you expect any thing to come of it?" I asked.

"Superintendent Seegrave found the Indians as innocent as the babe unborn."

"Superintendent Seegrave has been proved wrong, my lady, in all his conclusions," answered the Sergeant. "It may be worth while to find out to-morrow whether Superintendent Seegrave was right about the Indians as well."

With that he turned to Mr. Begbie, and took up the argument again exactly at the place where it had left off. "This question between us is a question of soils and reasons, and pastures and joints, Mr. Gardener. Now let me put it to you from another point of view. You take your white moss-rose—"

By that time I had closed the door on them, and was out of hearing of the rest of the dispute.

In the passage I met Penelope hanging about, and asked what she was waiting for.

She was waiting for her young lady's bell, when her young lady chose to call her back to go on with the packing for the next day's journey. Further inquiry revealed to me that Miss Rachel had given it as a reason for wanting to go to her aunt at Fryinghall that the house was unendurable to her, and that she could bear the odious presence of a policeman under the same roof with her no longer. On being informed, half an hour since, that her departure would be delayed till ten in the afternoon she had flown into a violent passion. My lady, present at the time, had severely rebuked her, and then (having apparently some curiosity to say, which was not for her daughter's private ear) had sent Penelope out of the room. My girl was in wretchedly low spirits about the changed state of affairs in the house. "Nothing goes right, father; nothing is like what it used to be. I feel as if some dreadful misfortune was hanging over us both."

That was my feeling too. But I put a good face on it before my daughter. Miss Rachel's bell rang while we were talking. Penelope ran up the back stairs to go on with the packing. I went by the other way to the hall to see what the glass was for, the change in the weather threatened.

Just as I approached the swing-door leading into the hall from the servants' offices, it was violently opened by the other side; and Sergeant Sparman ran by me, with a miserable look of pain in her face, and one of her hands pressed hard over her ear, as if the pang were in that quarter. "What's the matter, my girl?" I asked, stopping her. "Are you ill?"

"For God's sake don't speak to me," she answered, twisted herself out of my hands, and ran on toward the servants' staircase. I called to the cook (who was still cooking) to look after the poor girl. Two other persons proved to be within hearing as well as the cook. Sergeant Cuff darted swiftly out of my room, and asked what was the matter. I answered, "Nothing." Mr. Franklin, on the other side, pulled open the swing-door, and beckoning me into the hall, inquired if I had seen any thing of Rosanna Spearman.

She has just passed me, Sir, with a very disturbed face, and in a very odd manner."

"I am afraid I am innocently the cause of that disturbance, Betteredge."

"You, Sir!"

"I can't explain it," says Mr. Franklin; "but if the girl is concerned in the loss of the Diamond I shall really believe she was on the point of confessing every thing—to me, of all the people in the world—when you came in."

Looking toward the swing-door, as he said these last words, I fancied I saw it opened a little way from the inner side.

Was there any body listening? The door fell to before I could get to it. Looking through, the moment after, I thought I saw the tip of Sergeant Cuff's respectable black coat disappearing round the corner of the passage. He knew as well as I did that he could expect no help from me now that I had discovered the turn which his investigations were really taking. Under those circumstances it was quite in character to help himself, and to do it by the underground way.

Not feeling sure that I had really seen the Sergeant—and not desiring to make needless mischief, where, Heaven knows, there was mischief enough going on already—I told Mr. Franklin that I thought one of the dogs had got into the house—and then begged him to describe what had happened between Rosanna and himself.

"Were you passing through the hall, Sir?" I asked. "Did you meet her accidentally, when she spoke to you?"

Mr. Franklin pointed to the billiard-table.

"I was knocking the balls about," he said, "and trying to get rid of this miserable bother of the Diamond out of my mind. I happened to look up—and there stood Rosanna Spearman at the side of me, like a ghost! Her standing at me in that way was so strange that I hardly knew what to do at first. Seeing a very anxious expression in her face, I asked her if she wished to speak to me. She answered, 'Yes, if I dare.' Knowing what sensitive attached to her I could only put one construction on such language as that. I confess it made me uncomfortable. I had no wish to invite the girl's confidence. At the same time, in the difficulties that now beset us, I could hardly feel justified in refusing to listen to her, if she was really bent on speaking to me. It was an awkward position; and I dare say I got out of it awkwardly enough. I said to her, 'I don't quite understand you. Is there any thing you want me to do?' Mind, Betteredge, I didn't speak unkindly! The poor girl can't help being ugly—I felt that at the time. The tears welled in my hand, and I went on knocking the balls about, to take off the awkwardness of the thing. As it turned out I only made matters worse still. I'm afraid I mortified her without meaning it! She suddenly turned away. 'Like them at the billiard-balls,' I heard her say. 'Any thing rather than look at me!' Before I could stop her she had left the hall. I think she was crying about it, Betteredge. Would you mind telling Rosanna that I meant no unkindness? I have been a little hard on her perhaps, in my own thoughts—I have almost hoped that the loss of the Diamond might be traced to her. Act from any ill-will to the poor girl; but—" He stopped there, and, going back to the billiard-table, began to knock the balls about once more.

After what had passed between the Sergeant and me I knew what it was that he had left unspoken as well as he knew it himself.

Nothing but the tracing of the Moonstone to our second house-maid could now raise Miss Rachel above the inhuman suspicion that rested on her in the mind of Sergeant Cuff. It was no longer a question of quieting my young lady's nervous excitement; it was a question of proving her innocence. If Rosanna had done nothing to compromise herself, the hope which Mr. Franklin confessed he had felt would have been hard enough on her in all conscience. But this was not the case. She had pretended to be ill, and had gone secretly to Fryinghall. She had been up all night, making something, or destroying something, in private. And she had been at the Shivering Sand—under circumstances which were highly suspicious, to say the least of them. For all these reasons (sorry as I was for Rosanna) I felt that I must tell Mr. Franklin's way of looking at the matter was neither unnatural nor unreasonable, in Mr. Franklin's position. I said a word in his ear to that effect.

"Yes, yes!" he said, in return. "But there is just a chance—very poor one, certainly—that Rosanna's conduct may admit of some explanation which we don't see at present. I have nothing a woman's heart to contend with. Tell the poor creature what I told you to tell her. And if she wants to speak to me—I don't care whether I get into a scrape or not—send her to me in the library." With those kind words he laid down the cue and left me.

Inquiry in the servants' offices informed me that Rosanna had retired to her own room. She had declined all offers of refreshment, and had not only asked to be left to rest in quiet. Here, therefore, was an end of my confession to Mr. Franklin (which was a relief to my conscience to make) for that night. I reported the result to Mr. Franklin, who, thereupon, left the library, and went to bed.

I was putting the lights out, and making the windows fast, when Samuel came in with news of the two guests whom I had left at the house. The argument about the white moss-rose had apparently come to an end at last. The gardener had gone home, and Sergeant Cuff was nowhere to be found in the lower regions of the house.

I looked into my room. Quite true—nothing was to be discovered there but a couple of empty tumblers and a strong smell of hot grog. Had the Sergeant gone to bed, and taken me by the chamber that was prepared for him? I went up stairs to see.

After reaching the second landing I thought I heard a sound of quiet and regular breathing on my left-hand side. My left-hand side led to the corridor which communicated with Miss Rachel's room. I looked in, and there, coiled up on three chairs placed right across the passage—with, well, it was hardly possible to see in the grizzled head, and his respectable black coat rolled up for a pillow, lay and slept Sergeant Cuff!

He woke, instantly and quietly, like a dog, the moment I approached him.

"Good-night, Betteredge," he said. "And mind, if you ever take to growing roses, the white moss-rose is all the better for a good watering-pot on the dog-rose, whatever the gardener may say to the contrary!"

"What are you doing here?" I asked. "Why are you not in your bed?"

"I am not in my proper bed," answered the Sergeant, "because I am one of the many people in this miserable world who have put their money honestly and easily at the same time. There was a certain thing, this evening, between the period of Rosanna Spearman's retreat from the Sands and the period when Miss Verinder took her resolution to leave the house. What I saw Rosanna may have hidden it's clear to my mind that your young lady couldn't go away unlike knew that it was hidden. Therefore I must have communicated privately once already to-night. If they try to communicate again, when the house is quiet, I must be in the way, and stop it. Don't blame me for upsetting your sleeping arrangements, Mr. Betteredge—blame the Diamond!"

"I wish to God the Diamond had never found its way into this house!" I broke out.

Sergeant Cuff looked with a curious face at the three chairs on which he had condemned himself to pass the night.

"So do I," he said, gravely.

CHAPTER XVII.

NOTHING happened in the night; and (I am happy to add) no attempt at communication between Miss Rachel and Rosanna rewarded the vigilance of Sergeant Cuff.

I had expected the Sergeant to set off for Fryinghall first thing in the morning. He went out about, however, as if he had something else to do first. I left him to his own devices; and going into the garden shortly after met Mr. Franklin on his favorite walk by the shrubbery side.

Before we had exchanged two words the Sergeant unexpectedly joined us. He made up to Mr. Franklin, who received him, I must own, haughtily enough. "Have you any thing to say to me?" was all the return he got for politely wishing Mr. Franklin good-morning.

"I have something to say to you, Sir," answered the Sergeant, "on the subject of the inquiry I am conducting here. You detected the man that inquiry was really taking yesterday. Naturally enough, in your position, you are shocked and distressed. Naturally enough, also, you visit your own angry sense of your own family scandal upon Me."

"What do you want?" Mr. Franklin broke in, sharply enough.

"I want to remind you, Sir, that I have at any rate, thus far, not been proved to be wrong. Bearing that in mind, I pressed to remember, at the same time, that I am an officer of the law acting here under the sanction of the mistress of the house. Under these circumstances, is it, or is it not, your duty as a good citizen to assist me with any special information which you may happen to possess?"

"I possess no special information," says Mr. Franklin.

Sergeant Cuff put that answer by him, as if no answer had been made.

"You may, or you may time, Sir, from being wasted on an inquiry at a distance," he went on, "if you choose to understand me and speak out."

"I don't understand you," answered Mr. Franklin; "and I have nothing to say."

"One of the female servants (I won't mention names) spoke to you privately, Sir, last night."

Once more Mr. Franklin cut him short; once more Mr. Franklin answered, "I have nothing to say."

Standing by in silence, I thought of the movement in the swing-door, and the previous evening, and of the time which I had seen disappearing down the passage. Sergeant Cuff had, no doubt, just heard enough before I interrupted him to make him suspect that Rosanna had relieved her mind by confessing something to Mr. Franklin. Right or wrong?

This notion had barely struck me—when who should appear at the end of the shrubbery walk but Rosanna herself, with her own property permission! She was followed by Penelope, who was evidently trying to make her retrace her steps to the house. Seeing that Mr. Franklin was not alone Rosanna came to a stand-still, evidently in great perplexity what to do next. Penelope availed herself of the opportunity to join the girls as soon as I saw them. The Sergeant, with his devilish cunning, took on not to have noticed them at all, and walked on as if nothing had happened. Before either Mr. Franklin or I could say a word Sergeant Cuff struck in smoothly, with an appearance of considerate politeness unparalleled.

"You needn't be afraid of harming the girl, Sir," he said, to Mr. Franklin, speaking in a loud voice, so that Rosanna might hear him. "On the contrary, I recommend you to honor me with your confidence, if you feel any interest in Rosanna Spearman."

Mr. Franklin instantly took on not to have noticed the girls either. He answered, speaking loudly on his side also:

"I take no interest whatever in Rosanna Spearman."

I looked toward the end of the walk. All I saw at the distance was that Rosanna suddenly turned round the moment Mr. Franklin had spoken. Penelope, with Miss Verinder's shawl, she had done the moment before, she now let my daughter take her by the arm and lead her back to the house.

The breakfast-bell rang as the two girls disappeared—and even Sergeant Cuff was now obliged to give it up as a bad job. He said to me, privately, "I shall go to Fryinghall, Mr. Betteredge; and I shall be back before two." He went his way without waiting for more—and for some few hours we were well rid of him.

"You must make it right with Rosanna, Mr. Franklin said to me, when we were alone. "I seem to be fated to say or do something awkward before that unlucky girl. You must have seen yourself that Penelope and I had a trap for both of us. If he could confuse me, or irritate her into breaking out, either she or I might have said something which would answer his purpose. On the spur of the moment I saw no better way out of it than the way I took. It stopped the girl from speaking, and it showed me that the Sergeant that I saw through him. He was evidently listening, Betteredge, when I was speaking to you last night."

He had done worse than listen, as I privately thought to myself. He had remembered my telling him that Rosanna was in love with Mr. Franklin; and he had calculated on that when he appealed to Mr. Franklin's interest in Rosanna—in Rosanna's favor, as he supposed.

"As to listening, Sir," I remarked (keeping the other point to myself), "we shall all be rowing in the same boat if this sort of thing goes on much longer. Prying and peeping and listening are the natural occupations of people situated as we are. In another day or two, Mr. Franklin, we shall all be struck dumb together—for this reason that we shall all be listening to say quite each other's secrets, and all know it."

"You haven't said any thing to her yet about last night, have you?" Mr. Franklin asked.

"No, Sir."

"Then say nothing now. I had better not invite the girl's confidence, with the Sergeant on the look-out to surprise us together. My conduct is not very consistent, Betteredge—is it? I see no way out of this business which isn't dreadful to think of unless the Diamond is traced to Rosanna. And yet I can't and won't help Sergeant Cuff to find the girl out."

Unreasonable enough, no doubt. But it was my state of mind as well. I thoroughly understood him. If you will, for once in your life, be unreasonable, you are most perhaps you will thoroughly understand him too.

The state of things, indoors and out, while Sergeant Cuff was on his way to Fryinghall, was briefly this:

Miss Rachel waited for the time when the carriage was to take her to her aunt's, still obstinately shut up in her own room. My lady and Mr. Franklin breakfasted together. After breakfast Mr. Franklin took one of his sudden resolutions and went out precipitately to quiet his mind by a long walk. I was the only person who saw him go; and he told me he should be back before the Sergeant returned. The change in the weather, foreshadowed overnight, had come. Heavy rain had been followed, soon after dawn, by high wind. It was blowing fresh as the day got on. But though the clouds threatened more than once the rain still held off. It was not a bad day for a walk, if you were young and strong, and could breast the great gusts of wind which came sweeping in from the sea.

I attended my lady after breakfast, and assisted her in the disinfectement of Rosanna's accounts. She only once alluded to the matter of the Moonstone, and that was in the way of forbidding me to recommend mention of it to her. "Wait till that man comes back," she said, meaning the Sergeant. "He must speak of it then: we are not obliged to speak of it now."

After leaving my mistress I found Penelope waiting for me in my room.

"I wish, father, you would come and speak to Rosanna," she said. "I am very uneasy about her."

I suspected what was the matter readily enough. But it is a maxim of mine that men (being superior creatures) are bound to improve women—if they can. I urged on a wounded sense to do any thing (my daughter or not it doesn't matter), I always insist on knowing why. The offender you make thus ruminate over his offense, is, as a rule, the more manageable you will find them in all the relations of life. It isn't their fault (poor wretches!) that they don't know better beforehand; it's the fault of the fools who humor them.

Penelope's reason why, on this occasion, may be given in her own words. "I am afraid, father," she said, "Mr. Franklin has hurt Rosanna cruelly without intending it."

"What took Rosanna into the shrubbery walk?" I asked.

"Her goodness," says Penelope; "I can call it nothing else. She was bent on speaking to Mr. Franklin this morning come what might of it. I don't know best to stop her; you know that. If I could only have got her away before she heard those dreadful words—"

"There! there!" I said, "don't lose your head. I can't call to mind that any thing happened to alarm Rosanna."

"Nothing to alarm her, father. But Mr. Franklin said he took no interest whatever in her —and, oh, he said it in such a cruel voice!"

"He said it to stop the Sergeant's mouth?" I answered.

"I told her that," says Penelope. "But you see, father (though Mr. Franklin isn't to blame), he's been mortified to the heart pretending for weeks and weeks past; and now this comes on the top of it all." She has no right, of course, to expect him to take any interest in her. The quiet monstrous that she should forget herself and her station in that way. But she seems to have lost pride and proper feeling and every thing. She frightened me, father, when Mr. Franklin said those words. She went as white as the stone.

A sudden quiet came over her, and she has gone about her work ever since like a woman in a dream."

I began to feel a little uneasy. There was something in the way Penelope put it which silenced my common sense. "Stuff and nonsense, now my thoughts were directed that way, what had passed between Mr. Franklin and Rosanna overnight. She had cried out to her heart on occasion; and now, as ill-luck would have it, she had been unavoidably sitting again, poor soul, on the tender spot. Said! said! I was sick and tired because the girl had no reason to justify her, and no right to feel it.

I had ordered Mr. Franklin to speak to Rosanna, and this seemed the fittest time for keeping my word.

We found the girl sweeping the corridor outside the bedrooms, pale and composed, and neat as ever in her modest print dress. I noticed a curious shyness and dullness in her eyes just as if she had been crying, but as if she had been looking at something too long. Possibly it was a misty something raised by over thoughts. There was certainly no object about her to look at which she had not seen already hundreds of hundreds of times.

"Cheer up, Rosanna!" I said. "You mustn't fret over your own fancies. I have got something to say to you from Mr. Franklin."

I thereupon put the matter in the right view before her, in the friendliest and most comforting words I could think of. My opinion, in regard to the other sex, are, as you may have noticed, very severe. But somehow or other when I come face to face with the women my practice (I own) is not conformable.

"Mr. Franklin is very kind and considerate, I dare say you think him." That was all the answer she made me.

My daughter had already noticed that Rosanna went about her work like a woman in a dream.

I now added to this observation that she also listened and spoke like a woman in a dream. I doubted if her mind was in a fit condition to take in what I had said to her.

"Are you quite sure, Rosanna, that you understand me?" I asked.

"Quite sure."

She echoed me, not like a living woman, but like a creature moved by machinery. She went on sweeping all the time. I took away the broom as gently and as kindly as I could.

"Come, come, my girl!" I said, "this is not like yourself. You have got something on your mind. I'm your friend—and I'll stand your friend, even if you have done wrong. Make a clean breast of it, Rosanna—make a clean breast of it!"

The time had been, when my speaking to her in that way would have brought the tears into her eyes. I could see no change in them now.

"Yes," she said, "I'll make a clean breast of it."

"To my lady?" I asked.

"No."

"To Mr. Franklin?"

"Yes; to Mr. Franklin."

I hardly knew what to say to that. She was in no condition to understand the caution against speaking to him in private, which Mr. Franklin had directed me to give her. Feeling my way, little by little, I only told her Mr. Franklin had gone out for a walk.

"It doesn't matter," she answered. "I sha'n't trouble Mr. Franklin to-day."

"Why not speak to my lady?" I said. "The way to relieve your mind is to speak to the merciful and Christian mistress who has always been kind to you."

She looked at me for a moment with a grave and steady attention, as if she was fixing what I said in her mind. Then she took the broom out of my hands, and moved off with it slowly, a little way down the corridor.

"No," she said, going on with her sweeping, and speaking to herself; "I know a better way of relieving my mind than that."

"What is it?"

"Please to let me go on with my work."

Penelope followed her, and offered to help her.

She answered, "No. I want to do my work. Thank you, Penelope." She looked round at me. "Thank you, Mr. Betteredge."

There was no moving her—there was nothing more to be said. I signed to Penelope to come away with me. We left her, as we had found her, sweeping the corridor like a woman in a dream.

"This is a matter for the doctor to look into," I said. "It's beyond me."

My daughter reminded me of Mr. Candy's illness, owing (as you may remember) to the chill he had caught on the night of the dinner-party. His assistant—a certain Mr. Ezra Jennings—was at our disposal, to be sure. But nobody knew much about him in our parts. He had been engaged by Mr. Candy under rather peculiar circumstances; and, right or wrong, we none of us liked him or trusted him. There were other doctors at Frizinghall. But they were strangers to our house; and Penelope doubted, in Rosanna's present state, whether strangers might not do her more harm than good.

I thought of speaking to my lady. But, remembering the heavy weight of anxiety which she already had on her mind, I hesitated to add to all the other vexations this new trouble. Still, there was a necessity for doing something. The girl's state was, to my thinking, downright alarming—and my mistress ought to be informed of it. Unwillingly enough I went to her sitting-room. No one was there. My lady was shut up with Miss Rachel. It was impossible for me to see her till she came out again.

I waited in vain till the clock on the front staircase struck the quarter to two. Five minutes afterward I heard my name called from the drive outside the house. I knew the voice directly. Sergeant Cuff had returned from Frizinghall.

DOLLY'S SLEIGH-RIDE.

OUR young friends, whose coasting days for the present season are now about ended, will not fail to enjoy the pleasing picture which we give on page 148, and which will speak for itself to every intelligent child.

THE DENUNCIATING DOG.

FOR many people horrors have an irresistible charm, and the more horrible the horrors are the better they like them, especially if founded on a ground-work of fact. Among these, the sale and serving of human flesh in unsuspected forms has ever been a favorite topic with the lovers of the hideous and the terrible. From the time of the Arabian Nights to the present date, many a listening ear has been fascinated by accounts of how monsters in human shape (a race of criminals, it is believed, now quite extinct) beguiled honest and healthy-appetited men into acts of unconscious cannibalism. It is a pleasure analogous to hearing the rain beat and the tempest howl while you are snugly ensconced in your chimney-corner. It is so utterly unlikely, so impossible, now, that you should be made, under any conceivable circumstances, to commit true and real anthropophagy, that it merely gives you a pleasing shudder, a delightful fright, when you hear of such things occurring in by-gone times. They are legendary lore, you think, no more authentic than Bluebeard's biography; their actors are imaginary beings, as unsupported by fact as European ogres or Oriental ghouls. Such legendary tales have, nevertheless, been almost always taken from history. In such cases, to arrive at the historical fact, it suffices to strip it of the details superadded by popular credulity.

Thus, many a child has been frightened by nurses' tales about butchers and pastry-cooks selling human flesh in Paris. Those tales were doubtless greatly exaggerated; nay, we might utterly refuse to credit them, if such facts were not attested by authentic documents. In parchment records, several centuries old, it is stated that a butcher at Tournus, a small town in Burgundy, publicly sold human flesh, passing it off for veal. Another memorable instance occurred in the year of grace 1260, when Louis the Ninth, commonly called Saint Louis, was king of France.

At that time there dwelt at the corner of the Rue des Deux-Ermites, at the entrance of the Rue des Marmousets, a master-barber, whose name was Olivier Galipaud. With the usual obsequiousness and gossip of his brethren, he handled the razor with unusual dexterity. His reputation, consequently, stood high, and his customers were well-to-do and numerous.

Master Galipaud's next-door neighbor was a pastry-cook named Grimaldi, a native of Florence, who drove, in his way, as flourishing a business as his friend Galipaud. His shop was one of the best frequented in town. Certain little patties, made after a receipt of his own, were sought by epicures from every quarter. The patties, in fact, were prepared with considerable skill; they were better seasoned, and more delicately flavored, than any to be had of other pastry-cooks. He sold an enormous quantity every day. As a matter of course, he made a deal of money by them.

One Christmas-eve, as it was getting dark, a bell-ringer at the cathedral of Nôtre Dame named Lefèvre, as he was passing down the Rue des Marmousets, had the unlucky idea of getting shaved. He stepped into Galipaud's shop, accompanied by a little spaniel called Carpillon. At a sign from his master the dog lay down in a corner of the shop near the door, while he himself went into the back shop, where the barber awaited him, napkin in hand.

A few minutes afterward Carpillon suddenly heard a groan, immediately followed by a dull heavy sound, like that of a door shut firmly to. The dog pricked his ears, jumped on his feet, and rushed into the back shop, barking loudly. He searched for his master, but no master was to be found. The bell-ringer had disappeared. Something strange and horrible must have occurred, for the dog could not be made to cease from howling. Galipaud, in a rage, seized a thick stick, with the evident intention of knocking the dog on the head. Carpillon avoided the blow, and, becoming furious in turn, attacked the barber's legs, which he bit severely in several places. After wreaking this partial vengeance, he retreated under a heavy piece of furniture, where he recommenced his cries and yells.

While this was going on two of the bell-ringer's friends entered the barber's shop. Carpillon, recognizing them at once, crept out of his retreat, ran toward them, and renewed his plaintive lamentations.

"Why, it's Carpillon!" one of them exclaimed. "What is the matter, Carpillon? Where is your master?"

These words redoubled the dog's excitement. He rushed again upon the barber, and followed him to the further end of his back shop. The two men followed, thinking to calm him; but they stopped short, as if petrified, at beholding Galipaud hastily pick up a bloody night-cap. The barber's fearful pallor, his haggard eyes, his strange embarrassment, were a complete revelation for these two witnesses. They turned pale, and trembled with horror themselves. "Lefèvre has been murdered!" they involuntarily exclaimed.

The words struck Galipaud like a thunder-bolt. He saw that he was lost, and tried to escape. The bell-ringer's friends barred the passage, shouting for help. In a few minutes the shop was crowded. The legal authorities soon arrived. They then set about searching the premises, which speedily resulted in a frightful discovery.

Olivier Galipaud was a practiced assassin, and Grimaldi, the pastry-cook, was his accomplice.

In the barber's back shop they found a trap-door, swinging on a hinge, and opening into the cellar beneath. As soon as the wretch had cut a victim's throat, he threw him down backward upon the trap-door, and the body immediately disappeared. At night, after the commission of every murder, Galipaud went down into his cellar, and cut up the body into joints, exactly as a professional butcher would. The head and the bones were put into a sack, to be thrown into the Seine at the first opportunity. The flesh was sold to his gossip Grimaldi; and it was with this meat that the wretch made the famous patties which all Paris enjoyed with so keen a relish. A small door, excavated in the foundation of the building, established a communication between the adjoining cellars occupied by this couple of cannibal accomplices.

The number of persons murdered by Galipaud could never be precisely ascertained. When the officers of justice searched the cellar, they found, besides the Nôtre Dame bell-ringer's corpse, two heads separated from their bodies. They were still lying close to the butcher's block on which the horrid monster used to cut up human flesh. Probably he had not had time during the preceding night to go and throw them into the river. A few days after their arrest these atrocious villains received the chastisement due to their crimes by being burned alive in the Place de Grève. The house where such deeds had been committed was demolished. A large square stone marked the accursed spot; and on the stone was sculptured the likeness of the faithful dog, who had avenged his master by denouncing the criminals to justice.

THE LOST ARM.

[See Illustration, page 148.]

"You were at Cold Harbor, soldier?"
"Ay, lady, that I was,
Fighting for home and freedom,
The Union and the laws.
I got a ball in my thigh there,
But I limp'd on through the days
When death seem'd clutching the army
In the swamp's bewildering maze."

"You were at South Mountain, soldier?"
"Ay, lady, I mind that day,
For the fight was long and bloody
Ere the stubborn foe gave way.
When our Colonel fell I caught him;
He died in my arms that night,
And I buried him on the mountain
By the moon's sad, misty light."

"You fought under Sherman, soldier?"
"Ay, lady, that I did;
Through blood, and fire, and slaughter,
I followed where he led.
I went through Atlanta with him,
As proud as a man could be,
And I followed him without flinching
From the mountains to the sea."

"You have lost an arm, brave soldier?"
"Lady, my loss is gain;
For I gave my right arm gladly,
And smiled at the bitter pain.
I gave it for home and country,
For the Flag of the boy in blue;
And had they needed the other
I'd have given it gladly too."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

IN this age of inventions paper is made to serve the purpose of wood, and wood, in turn, to serve the purpose of paper. In addition to greenbacks and stamps, cuffs, collars, shirt-bosoms, buttons, hats and bonnets, and numerous other similar articles, pails, buckets, barrels, and spittoons are now made from paper; and even boats have been constructed from this substance. A Portland paper describes a paper boat which is thirty-one and a half feet long, and weighs only twenty-two pounds, yet is four times stronger than a similar one made of wood. The displacement of water by such a craft will be very much less than that of a wooden boat, and the same exertion will propel it proportionately faster. Years ago, before the fashion of thick shoes for ladies was adopted, it was a standing reproach to them, in the opinion of many, that they exposed their health by walking in so-called "paper-soled" shoes. But now paper has really and legitimately entered into the manufacture of boots and shoes. The Japanese make excellent water-proof clothing from paper; and it has been suggested that shirts, hosiery, and other kinds of under-clothing be produced from this substance. This is not unlikely to be done at some future time; and we may expect, also, that houses and ships can be constructed in part, at least, of paper.

But a new invention has been attracting public notice, which threatens to supersede the use of common house-paper for covering walls. A very delicate, simple, and beautiful machine has been constructed which will take a portion of a tree, after it has been cut the right length and width, and shave it up into thin ribbons as wide as a roll of house-paper, making one hundred or one hundred and fifty to the inch. These rolls of wood are placed on the walls by paper-hangers with paste and brush, precisely in the same manner with paper. The wood is wet when used, and really works easier than paper, because it is much more tough and pliable. Any kind of wood can be selected to suit the taste, and the ordinary kinds are very cheap as well as handsome. The wood can be oiled, varnished, or shellacked, and then washed at pleasure, and thus kept perfectly clean. It will not crack or split in using, and when on the walls stands like solid work. Ceilings may be finished to correspond with the walls, either in plain wood or in panels of any of the rare woods. The invention is likely to prove a valuable one.

A few days ago a peddler in this city wished to sell to a woman a patent "non-explosive" kerosene lamp, and called at her residence for the purpose. To convince her of its good qualities he filled it with kerosene oil and lighted it. In a moment after it exploded, burning the woman terribly about the face, body, and arms. The peddler, frightened at the consequences of his act, fled from the room, leaving his stock of lamps behind. The woman died soon afterward.

The rumor that Secretary Seward has bought Saturn's ring, Jupiter's moons, and half a dozen asteroids, is contradicted. But recently, in the House of Representatives, an amendment was offered to the Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Bill, authorizing the Secretary of State to appoint an agent to enter into negotiations for the purchase of empires, kingdoms, rebellions, wars, volcanoes, icebergs, snow and rain storms, earthquakes, and submerged or undiscovered islands, instructing him to negotiate for the purchase of Great Britain; and in the event of that kingdom not being for sale to negotiate for war, provided it shall not cost more than $15,000,000 nor last over sixty days, the amount of any purchase to be liquidated as follows: Russian bears at $10 each, the purchaser to take them as they run; walruses $1 each, the purchaser to catch them at his own expense; Sitka Indians to be thrown in without cost; icebergs at twenty-five cents per ton, the purchaser to break his own ice; rain-storms at one cent per barrel, the purchaser to furnish his own barrels; volcanoes at $50 each, with a stipulation that they shall not shake the confidence of the State Department. The proposed amendment caused considerable merriment in the House, but was ruled out of order.

An exchange says there is no need of buying umbrellas. They can easily be procured without—thusly: Take your stand in a doorway on a rainy day. As soon as you see a man with a nice umbrella, step out and say to him: "Sir, I beg your pardon, but you have my umbrella!" Nine times in ten he will surrender it at once, for how does he know it was not you he stole it from?

The number of children in the Colored Orphan Asylum is now about two hundred and fifty. The total number admitted since the opening of the Institution is 1442. The managers find themselves unable to carry out their original design of erecting a new building, although they have land sufficient for the purpose, between Tenth and Eleventh avenues and One Hundred and Forty-third and One Hundred and Forty-fourth streets. The present high price of labor and material renders it impossible to complete the building with the existing funds.

The New York Infirmary for Women and Children during last year received 137 patients, visited 545 at their homes, and attended 6354 at the Dispensary. The Trustees propose, during the coming year, to provide instruction in anatomy, and in some other branches of medicine for ladies. During last spring eight ladies received the elementary medical instruction provided by the Institution. The Woman's Aid Society have received at their Home 151 destitute women since the opening of the Institution in April last. One hundred of these have been placed in suitable institutions. The object of the managers of this Institution is to take women sent to the Work-House on Blackwell's Island and reform them, if need there be, by giving them the advantages of a home while receiving religious instruction, and then enabling them to get a respectable livelihood. The Society also aims to take under its protection young women who desire a refuge from the dangers to which, from their destitution, they are exposed in this city.

Pennsylvania has one very considerate legislator. He recently began his speech with the remark that as debate cost the State one thousand dollars an hour he would be brief. If he kept his promise he showed that he was also very sensible.

What next? A man in Chicago recently attempted to swallow a common billiard-ball on a bet. By covering it with sweet-oil he succeeded in getting it in his mouth, but that was all. He couldn't swallow it, nor could he get it out of his mouth. Surgical aid was called, and after a long and painful operation the delicate morsel was removed. The ball was evidently in the wrong "pocket."

In July, 1861, the following dispatch was received at the Washington office, being dated at New York, and addressed to a member of one of the regiments then quartered at Arlington Heights: "Your wife wishes to know if you are dead, alive, or wounded. If dead, please send the body on."

The school-boys in England have taken to playing the game of Fenianism. It would seem to be a sport not unattended with danger. At the National School, at Newbury, for instance, the lads were amusing themselves with a mimic representation of the Fenian execution at Manchester. Three of them volunteered to take the disagreeable parts of the men who were hanged. The result was that one of the foolish fellows was nearly strangled. At another school several little boys were playing at a game which they called "Fenians," when two Irishmen came up, and not liking the sport, they seized a boy of seven, named Warrington, and while one held him the other put some gunpowder into his trowsers and set it on fire. The poor child was very much burned.

A visitor to one of the cheap eating-houses in Glasgow, Scotland, describes the rooms as well-lighted, and every thing scrupulously clean. For a penny a bowl of nice hot broth or a cup of coffee is given. For about ten cents barley broth, bread and butter, meat and potatoes, and a cup of tea is served, all of which is excellent in quality. The waiters receive no gratuity from guests, wear a neat and tidy costume, and seem to be very modest and well-behaved. In these eating-houses a part of each floor is especially arranged for ladies who desire a quiet, inexpensive meal.

The Mormons of Salt Lake City have an immense tabernacle, which will seat ten thousand people. One and a half million feet of lumber were used in the building. Inside of this immense structure is the grand organ, standing upon a base 23 feet wide by 30 deep. The front of this organ is octagonal in form, rising to the height of 45 feet. It contains 2200 pipes, 2 banks of keys, and 35 stops on the register. It contains 3500 feet of lumber, which was brought on wagons from Iron County, a distance of 300 miles. The longest piece of lumber used in the pipes of the organ is 25 feet in length. The lumber of which this organ is built has been three years in seasoning. It requires four men to blow the bellows.

The following joke is at the expense of the French Society for the Protection of Animals: A countryman, armed with an immense club, presents himself before the President of the Society and claims the first prize. He is asked to describe the act of humanity on which he founds his claim. "I saved the life of a wolf," replies the countryman. "I might easily have killed him with this bludgeon;" and he swings his weapon in the air, to the intense discomfort of the President. "But where was this wolf?" inquires the latter; "what had he done to you?" "He had just devoured my wife," is the reply. The President reflects an instant, and then says: "My friend, I am of the opinion that you have been sufficiently rewarded."

The largest organ in the world is credited to the little city of Freyburg, Switzerland. When in full play it pours forth a tempest of sounds through a forest of pipes seven thousand and eight hundred in number, shaking the walls and the foundations of the old St. Nicholas Church in which it stands.

POACHING.

GAME is a subject of legislation by almost every nation—certainly by all civilized countries—and poaching, in one shape or another, is made punishable as a crime. Originally, in England, to kill the game in the ancient forests of the kingdom was equivalent to murder, and punished as such. Only forty years ago a "property qualification" was necessary in order to have the privilege of shooting game in England, and this qualification was fixed as high as that which gave the citizen the right to vote. This was abolished in 1831, but at this time every hunter who wishes to enjoy a day's sport must carry with him a certificate which grants the privilege at an annual cost of about $20 as duty. Persons caught shooting hares without a certificate or within any inclosure are punished with three months' imprisonment; if the animal hunted happens to be a deer the punishment is transportation for seven years. In this country the game laws are intended to protect game from pursuit when not in season; and the term "poacher" is only applied to trespassers on forbidden ground.

In France the laws against poaching are as severe as were those of England in ancient days; and the surprised poacher, in our beautiful illustration on page 152, knows that his only safety is in successful resistance. He knows that the law has no mercy, and caught in the act of killing the Emperor's deer, he next raises his gun at the breast of the Emperor's game-guard. The poachers of France are a desperate class of men, and frequently do not hesitate to murder the guards as well as kill the game.

THE FRENCH POACHER AT BAY.—[See Page 151.]

WOLVES ATTACKING A STAG ON THE ICE—A SIBERIAN SCENE.—DRAWN BY H. C. BISPHAM.—[SEE PAGE 156.]

SOMETHING ABOUT WOLVES.

We give on page 153 an illustration representing a pack of wolves attacking a deer upon the ice. The deer has evidently been pursued in the forest, and sought this ice as a refuge, just as he would seek a pond in summer. His swiftness avails him little on the smooth surface. His feet have no hold upon the ice, either to advance or turn aside, and the wolves have overtaken and surrounded him. He is fighting as best he can, and is no mean adversary to his assailants, but his hours are numbered, and the hungry pursuers are already certain of their meal.

The wolf is found, in a variety of species, in most countries of the world, in the temperate zones. He is black, brown, or gray, large, medium, or small, according to the climate, ancestry, and mode of life. He is supposed to thrive where other animals find it difficult to exist, and a region "no poor man can afford to make a living in" is not considered of much value. He rarely display genuine courage, and does not venture an attack unless the odds are largely in his favor. He has a sneaking disposition, and his name the world over has little respect attached to it. When generally hunt in packs, and have a systematic way of worrying game too large to be overpowered by direct assault. Half a dozen of them will surround a buffalo, and, while some annoy him in front and others at the sides, one or two of the oldest will attack his hamstrings. They appear to understand that when once disarmed an animal is in their power, and his capture is only a question of time. In assaulting a bull, stag, or other powerful beast, wolves are said to relieve each other in the most exposed positions; but though persistent in worrying the expected prey they are not inclined to take great risks.

The wolf is not beloved by man in any part of the world, and his destruction is accomplished whenever possible. He is trapped, pursued, baited, or poisoned in this country, especially in the Eastern States and the Canadian provinces. In the West the same plans are followed, and sometimes a "circle-hunt" secures a large number. In circle-hunt a time is appointed for the sport, and the hunters gather at a designated spot. A tract of land, sometimes including many square miles, is surrounded and the game slowly driven toward its centre. Approaching the centre the lines are closely closed, and the wolves, as well as other animals that happen in the ring, are speedily dispatched. In Russia at a hunt of this kind fire-arms are not allowed, and the killing is done with spears. Two years ago the Governor-General of Eastern Siberia ordered a circle-hunt for which he gathered 1,500 men, when the hunt was a hundred and fifty wolf-skins were the net result.

There is a popular belief that wolves are dangerous, and often pursue men in various parts of Russia. In the western provinces of the empire it sometimes happens in very severe winters that travelers are attacked by wolves; but such occurrences are rare. The real objects of attack are the horses attached to the sledge, and not the persons within; but when once a train is overtaken the wolves, desperate with hunger, do not make nice distinctions of flesh. Sometimes the most thrilling character used to be in circulation, but were nearly all fabrications. One of them told how a party of six persons was pursued, and that the wolves gained so rapidly that one of the six jumped from the sleigh to be eaten up in order to retard the pursuit and allow friends to escape. Having hunched on this man the wolves again overtook the sledge, and another man jumped out. Another and another followed until only two, the youngest of the party, remained in the sledge, and, in safety, reaching to a Polish legend a town near the Vistula was once besieged by wolves during a severe winter, and the inmates only kept from entering by means of high walls, carefully-closed gates, and constant vigilance of the watchmen.

In Western Russia the first news made of hungry wolves is to go out on a moonlight night with a sledge drawn by two horses. Two hunters, armed with heavy short-guns, are seated in the sledge, and a driver on the box manages the team. A pig is a very important, though unwilling and roughly used member of the hunting party. In the best place in the forest one end of a short rope is tied to the pig's leg, and the other to the back part of the sledge. The animal is then "towed astern."

The wolf is fond, very fond, of pork, and when he hears the squealing of a pig and has hardened recently he is pretty certain to follow the sound. Of course the pig squeals very loudly when dragged at the back of a sledge, and in a night his doleful note can be heard far away. If the snow has been lying deep for a long time game is scarce, and the hungry wolves are on the alert. Following the pig, and hoping to obtain their favorite meal, they come within range of the hunter's guns and are shot down. Sometimes, when every thing is favorable, six or eight wolves will be killed in this way in a single evening's hunt; but in the great majority of cases the hunters return guideless.

About ten years ago the winter was unusually cold and stormy in Poland and Lithuania, and the wolves became desperate with hunger. In several instances travelers were pursued while traversing the forests that cover much of the flat region east of the Prussian boundary. No person was killed by wolves, but in a few cases horses were lost, and men saved their lives by abandoning their teams and climbing into treetops. In two of these States and Territories I have sometimes been "treed" by wolves and kept aloft for several hours. The celebrated but now obsolete mineralogist almanac of David Crockett contains several anecdotes of experiences of this kind.

There is a Russian story of a wolf hunt in one of the Polish provinces, in which the hunters found more than they wished. In the narrator's language it is as follows:

"During a winter of unusual severity, when the snow lay thick and the frosts were sharp, I passed several weeks at a friend's country seat, about a hundred miles from Vilna. We exhausted all the usual sports of outdoor life in that region, including two or three wolf hunts which were unsuccessful. At length there came a heavier fall of snow than usual, and for two or three days the roads were impassable. When the track was well beaten and communication was pronounced good we determined to make another search for wolves. Two of us, with a driver, formed the party, and we chose a night when a bright moon favored our adventure.

"We had our sledge carefully prepared, and took a team of three horses full of fire and energy. To make our pig more dragging as long as possible we fastened him in a cage made of withes and ropes woven together. We knew the jolting of the cage as it followed the sledge would produce all desired noise from the pig, while he would be less injured than if dragged by the leg.

"When we entered the forest there was not a sound audible beyond that made by ourselves. A minute after we had thrown out our decoy we heard half a dozen howlings as long as possible away. For some reason I can not explain the wolves from a wide region were gathered in that forest, and their howlings were repeated like an echo, was really the calling from one to another. Wolves, like dogs, will answer the voices of their kindred, and, unlike dogs, they seem able to vary their intelligence by modulating their tones. A young, steady oil means nothing more than a passion of compliance, while a short, broken, and sharper bowl is a signal to rally.

"In a few minutes we could see them coming out of the woods on all sides of the valley in which we had taken our road lay. We fired as they came in range and dropped them pretty easily, for the animals were massed together in front of our activity. It is the custom in these wolf hunts, where game is scarce, to stop and pick up the wolves as killed. This is necessary because the dead wolves are left to be gathered the next day. Before firing our first shot we knew we should have no occasion—and probably no desire—to halt.

"The howling made our horses restive, as it usually does, and our driver was hardly able to hold them. As the pack around us continued to grow larger we thought it best to increase our speed, and so gave the word to go ahead. Then we dashed over the smooth road the sledge rolled from side to side, and injured our aim so that many shots were fired in vain. Some of the wolves our pursuers behind us despite our best efforts, but were able to keep them at a safe distance. They came from the forest as we advanced, and sometimes reached the road just abreast of us. We were the more encouraged from that we got into it at random, as one might fire into a flock of sheep. Those that fell did not retard the rest.

"Our unfortunate pig was tossed about in his cage, and squealed until exhausted. When the animal became dead we threw him away, feeling confident that the wolves would stop to tear him out of his cage, and possibly quarrel over the division of the prize.

"They stopped but a short time. Either the cage was pretty well shaken to pieces and yielded very readily, or the greater number of the wolves left the prize to a few that happened to surround it. We heard the faintest note of the expiring pig as we left him to his fate. The driver held his reins perfectly taut, and seemed so firmly fixed in his seat as if nailed there. Though not frightened, he was doing his best by horses to their best speed, and carried us rapidly homeward.

"One horse fell, but was up in a moment—though not soon enough to prevent two or three of the foremost wolves darting past the sledge and just missing our feet. Then we had a dashed spring at the horses, and my friend at the same instant brought down a wolf on his side of the sledge. The hind legs clung to the seat for a time and caught his fore-paws over its end. I struck him with my empty gun and he fell heavily to the ground and was left behind.

"At last as our horses began to lag and our pursuers came so near that we could see their rows of teeth and almost guess from their glaring glare eyes, we heard the baying of dogs in the distance. A minute later the gleam of the lantern over our gateway came in view, and we dashed into the yard and were safe. As the sledge halted, a friend and all scampered, and the next I remember was when I awoke in my bed.

"I have never joined a wolf hunt since that night, and have no desire to be again in such imminent peril."

AN ANTI-PROPOSAL.

This weather would have been very agreeable for polar bears, but it was rather cold for human beings. Charles Harrington and Emily Hunter were trying to make themselves comfortable before the coal-stove in the coal grate, and to an impartial observer seemed to be doing very well. Emily was engaged in restoring the lost youth to some old black velvet, by dusting it vigorously with a worn tooth-brush, and Charles watched every stroke as if his future happiness depended upon it. Grandpa Hunter sat in his easy-chair, patient upon a book; and, as he was as deaf as his gold-headed cane, the course of true love had every opportunity to run smooth.

"You know my feelings, Charles," murmured Emily, with an impressive dash of the tooth-brush; "but grandpa never will consent until you get your professorship; so we must be patient, dear, for a little longer."

"Patient, dear, for a little longer," echoed Charles, thumping a coal with the poker; "if there ever were greater trials known than mine you will find them in the Book of Job. Here am I, with the conditional promise of the future hand in Christendom; but it's all a dead secret, and every man that admires you has a right to say so, and my mouth is sealed for evermore."

"Oh fie!" said Emily, with a roguish smile, "I wouldn't encourage such figments of the brain. My lovers are all invisible as yet, so pray don't anticipate."

"I believe there never was a woman who didn't enjoy managing somebody," said Charles, looking at grizzled grandpa Hunter as he spoke. "I have faith that your diplomacy will settle matters one of these days, Emmie; but if I had my way I'd prefer an open talk with your grandfather at once."

Emily only shook her wise head, with its wealth of sunny hair. Charles looked at her, admired her, and sighed.

"Such is the poise love composes,
As silver settle mixed with roses."

"Do look out of the window, Charles. Who is that man walking at such a break-neck pace? What a picturesque object!"

"That? Oh, that's my Lord Magnifico, engineer on the new railroad," replied Charles, laughing so heartily that his sentimental vapors were blown about at once.

"Lord who?"

"Why, his workmen call him the Magnifico, because of his capacity for self-appreciation."

"Look, is he coming here, Charles?"

"Yes, to this very door. Take care of your heart, my self-possessed Emily!"

"He looks like a ventriloquist or showman," said the young lady. "How his frame-colored hat danced then! The man down his shoulders!"

A shrewd little boy, who seemed to be of Emily's opinion, was following close at the man's back, calling out:

"Here, Sir! You want any bills posted?"

But the unfortunate engineer had misled him for once. Lord Magnifico had no bills to post, and shook off the small boy as if he had been a fly. He knocked the visitor's bell with the alacrity of a fireman, and the little waiting-maid ushered him into the back-parlor in his haste, fully persuaded that it was the best room in the house.

The occupants of the room had scarcely looked up before their visitor stood in the middle of the floor, but in fact had so overset that the blazing beard on his chin was nearly horizontal.

"Apollos Paddleford, at your service, miss—gentlemen, excuse my intrusion!"

"How do you, my friend?" said Charles, rising. "Allow me to introduce you to Mr. Hunter, Every man's friend, and his grandpa's daughter, Miss Emily Hunter. Please be seated, Mr. Paddleford."

The visitor took a chair, at the same time waving his hand imperiously. "I was directed to the venerable Mr. Hunter as a sort of town father. I have come on grave business, my dear Mr. Harrington; that is to say, I have come to look up a crime!"

Emily's dimples steadied themselves. "Grandpa, this gentleman has lost a friend, and has come to talk with you about it."

Mr. Hunter's white eyebrows and regarded his afflicted guest with becoming solemnity.

"I am sorry for you, Mr. Paddleford," said Charles, sympathetically; "is it a recent affliction?"

Mr. Paddleford shook out his handkerchief and gazed indignantly at Charles.

"No, not very recent as we mortals count time. He has been dead seventy-five years—my friend generally has. I refer to identity his sacred dust and consecrate it by a tombstone."

Emily's dimples began to dance again. "My grandfather is the oldest inhabitant of Hunterville village. I hope he may be able to assist you, Sir."

Mr. Paddleford immediately wheeled his chair within two feet of the pretty Emily, and gazed at her so intently that not the quiver of an eyelash escaped him.

"I called on funereal business, Miss Hunter; but allow me to say my attention is diverted by your magnificent hair!"

"And if any painter drew her,
He would draw her unaware
With a halo round her!"

It is seldom one meets with that peculiar shade of auburn, a complete match to my own!"

Charles Harrington moved to confront the "Insufferable idiot! As well compare a sunbeam to a fire-brand!"

But I am happy to say politeness kept him silent, while it compelled poor golden-haired Emily to sit quietly, though with indignant blushes, under the scrutiny of the bald-head.

"Really she is a rustic beauty," soliloquized Apollos Paddleford, "quite the vein in the tiny city of Skoodac, whereas this Tobyville only was only a village!—a rustic beauty, and exquisitely sensitive! I see it in the flutter in impression. I must turn away my eyes, or those tremulous fingers will make small progress."

So, out of gallantry, he refrained from his free and prolonged glance of admiration, but he could not tear himself away from his pretty conquest all in a minute. He must make a little conversation. Bending his eyes upon Emily's sleeve-trimmings he remarked to her grandparent:

"Mr. Hunter, when I entered you courteously laid aside the volume then engaging your attention; may I ask what treatise you were perusing?"

"Don't understand you, Sir," said deaf Mr. Hunter, who thought his visitor the most cheerful mourner he had ever seen; "didn't hear what you said."

"I asked what statistics were you examining."

"Sir?"

"Whose—history—were—you—peru—sing!"

"Grandpa, he would like to know the name of your book."

"Oh, oh, Gray's 'Elegy' in Country Churchyard!"

"Ah! Just so, Sir! Exceedingly appropriate at your time of life! Such a coincidence, too, for it is of the grave I came to speak!"

"Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid—"

you know the rest. My father sent me to you, Sir, to question you concerning a spot unknown. There is no 'frail memorial' to mark it, not even a stick. No doubt, though,

"The rudest touch to build and warble there!"

"Grandpa, Mr. Paddleford—"

"May I ask what friend you have lost?" said Grandpa Hunter, getting out of all patience.

"Alas, Sir, I never had the honor of seeing him. He was my father's grandfather.

"Whence his name,
And lineage long, it tells me not to say;"

but, Sir, suffice it he was—a—Paddleford!"

Emily hurriedly left the room, and, meeting her Aunt Keturah in the hall, astonished her by an uncontrollable fit of laughter.

"It's like mirth in a sepulchre," gasped she. "A young gentleman is in there, and he's there because he came to see his great-grandfather, a lamented Paddleford."

"It must be one of the Skoodac Paddlefords," just such fools," said Aunt Keturah.

"Not a late bereavement, you see, auntie, but an early one—such as very early!" sobbed Emily. "And, do you believe, he thinks my hair and his are just of a shade!"

The bereaved engineer soon made another errand to the house, and after it another and another. He had no more graves to look up, and his lamented ancestor had been discovered sleeping under a blackberry bush. Still Apollos could not tear himself away from Mr. Hunter's hospitable mansion. He found Miss Emily's hair an interesting study, also her dimples.

"That hair, Miss Hunter, the match to my own."

"Down-gushing in an arnful flows,
And floods her ivory neck, and glitters as she goes."

That he was winning Emily's virgin affections he knew just as well as if he knew he was the most irresistible of men; but really he couldn't seem to help it. And then, too, it was such a wicked satisfaction to pique Mr. Harrington. He would persist in coming to the house in spite of all discouragements. Pretending to put himself in competition with a Paddleford! Such audacity was simply absurd!

Meanwhile the humble Charles vowed silk for the fair Emily before the Magnifico, in a respectful distance, and now-and then "brought him out" in argument for the entertainment of his betrothed. Nothing could split a hair finer—west to northwest side. His reasoning was rather muddy; but then, as Emily said, it was clear to himself, and that was all-sufficient, for whose else was worth convincing.

"Well, well, child," mumbled Grandpa Hunter, "if this is the sort of man you admire, I think your judgment is getting a little warped! Why, bless your heart, he can't hold a candle to that young Harrington."

Charles does very well, Grandpa," remarked the blushing Emily. "I have a sincere friendship for Charles; but haven't you all your life-time known that I never could marry myself he hasn't a business turn?"

"Rather more of a book-worm than I like Emily, to say my heart," heard me say; but he has a good sound brain of his own. He'll turn out right you see if he don't."

"But, grandpa, he hasn't so much enterprise as Mr. Paddleford—not half."

"Well, well, I should hope not! Nor half so much impudence either. Don't talk to me about that little upstart! Why, child, haven't I known Apollos Paddleford, now and then, for seventy years, and did I ever see one yet that wasn't a scatter-wit and a swell-head?"

"Read him, dear. Grandpa's eyes are handy to have about the house, Emily, but they haven't a particle of sense. Young Harrington has a stupid appearance—I admit that—but he'll make a man yet.

"By-the-way, now you've put me in mind of him, I must tell you this very day that some by influence to get him that Professor's chair. He deserves it; and modest merit ought to be appreciated. Yes, I know what you are thinking of, Emmie; but you may as well give it up at once. I'll have nothing to do with that dapper little engineer, and I'm not going to whistle!"

"Dear old grandpa!" thought Emily, behind her book; "you precious old darling! I may not have a bit of sense, but I know how to manage you by the law of contraries."

Mr. Paddleford had such a gift of language, and such a fascinating manner of pouring it out, that Emily, in the course of a few weeks, grew heartily tired of him.

"Will you never finish our railroad, and go away?" sighed she.

"I hope, for his own sake, the time may be short," thought Charles, with an outcome of feeling; for, like a true lover, he never doubted that Mr. Paddleford's sentiments toward Emily were quite like his own.

Meanwhile, the gentleman in question was really suffering the pangs of remorse. He could no longer conceal from himself the too constant fact that poor Emily was becoming seriously attached to him. He was an honest, kind-hearted youth after all. He did not wish to gain her affections merely to throw them away.

"What am I doing?" said he to his conscience. "I am not in a situation to marry; and when I am shall look higher. I must undeceive the poor girl. It is my bounden duty as a man of honor."

Action always followed resolve with the prompt

Mr. Paddleford. He seized the first opportunity to see Emily alone. She, poor victim, was sobering herself with a book, and a cloud settled upon her bright face as she looked up and beheld the ubiquitous Mr. Paddleford.

"She is dejected," thought he, "and fancies no one perceives it. What greater humiliation can there be to a true woman than an unrequited love? Would to Heaven I am, I must implore her pardon, though at every word I speak—at the mere sound of my voice, indeed—I rivet her chains!"

Apollos cleared his throat and spoke of the weather. Emily answered courteously.

"Alas!" thought the swain, "there goes a piece of her heart!" for her voice was unusually sad.

"My dear young lady," said he, in tones which he regretted were so thrilling, "do not let it pain you that I have the key to your missings. "Oh Love, unconquerable in the fight, thee shall neither any of the immortals escape, nor of men, the creatures of a day. Do not blush, Miss Hunter, that you have not escaped."

Whereupon Emily blushed; what else could she do under the circumstances?

"Do not distress yourself," continued the remorseful Apollos; "never fear that I shall betray your secret to the cold world."

"Sir?"

Emily supposed reference was made to her engagement with Charles, a secret which would be divulged in a day or two, or as soon as Grandpa Hunter's consent could be relied on with absolute certainty.

"Poor martyr!" thought Apollos, watching her eloquent cheeks; "it would be well for that too warm heart if it could be packed in snow! Ah me! why was Mash so irresistible? Heaven knows it is not my own fault."

He cleared his throat; Apollos was becoming almost embarrassed.

"Miss Hunter, dear Miss Hunter, you do think we men are pitiless, I know you do! You think we would as lief break hearts as not; but I do assure you it is not so. At any rate it is far otherwise with me!"

"Sir?" said the mystified Emily again.

"Well dear!" soliloquized the conscientious youth; "that glance was as cold as a winter landscape. Then aloud: "Ah, Miss Emily, when I tell you that I have seen, that I could not fail to see, the desperate struggle going on in your heart, your maidenly heart, between pride and unconquerable love—yes, love—ah, do not turn away in such distress! Let me say this knowledge has not for one instant lowered you in my esteem! Not for one instant, dear Emily! Base, ungenerous, unworthy the name of man would he be who should triumph over such sweetness!"

Emily sat speechless, unable to comprehend one word of this harangue.

"Nay, beautiful, too susceptible young friend, on the contrary I feel"—here Mr. Paddleford was so unpleasantly choked as to be obliged to loosen his neck-tie—"I feel that I alone am to blame."

"Sir?"

"Do not look at me so, Miss Hunter. In the words of an old poet—

"'A mighty pain to love it is,
And 'tis a pain that pain to miss:
But of all pains, the greatest pain
It is to love, but love in vain?'

Why did I not foresee this from the first?"

"Poor fellow! He is going to make a declaration. What can I do to stop him?" thought Emily, uneasily.

"Yes, Miss Hunter, remembering your peculiar agitation even at our first meeting, and your fitful, I may perhaps say capricious, comment ever since, I ought to have heeded the warning and seen as little of you as possible. My power over your sex is truly involuntary; believe me, dear girl, I would not be guilty of trying to fascinate!"

Emily was still speechless, but her face was becoming what her guest was pleased to term "an interesting study."

"It was selfish in me, however, to come here so much, I confess. I have enjoyed your society at the same time that I have endeavored to cultivate your literary tastes. You are a simple, unsophisticated woman, my dear Emily, and though I must say with pain I do not and can not return your love] you have made a deep impression upon me. I shall never, never forget you!"

"Mr. Apollos Paddleford," stammered Emily at last, "do I understand you to say—"

"Yes, Miss Emily, would it were otherwise; but I can not, can not return your love! Remember,

"'Love is not in our power.
Nay, what seems stranger, is not in our choice.'

I would gladly give you some encouragement for the future, my cousin's friend, did I not feel that such an assurance would be mistaken kindness. No, go forget me, Emily; and oh, I humbly entreat you, forgive me!"

"Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?" sobbed Emily, growing hysterical behind her handkerchief. "It's the most exquisite joke I ever heard of in my life. If Charles were only here!"

Her words, which seemed like the ravings of despair, smote the penitent Apollos afresh. In his perplexity he was nearly on the point of promising that he never loved her, or at least try to do so, when she added, more calmly:

"My Lord Magnifico, I understand you at last. I appreciate your sentiments; they are worthy of you. But don't, oh don't be uneasy about me! I shall do very well. The impression you have made—oh, dear—the impression you have made will—it will wear away in time!"

"I do trust so, Miss Emily! Only say you will try to forgive me!"

"Forgive you? Oh, freely! I forgive you for making the most outrageously foolish mistake that any 'silly moon-struck elf' ever made in his life. Why, Mr. Paddleford, they said you were the most conceited man living; but did any body, in all this world of foolishness, ever dream you would do such a thing as this?"

Apollos's face was a "study" of surprise. Was she going to deny she cared for him? Why, what did she mean?

"Mr. Paddleford, a gentleman may now and then ask a lady to love him, indeed I believe it is customary in certain cases; but did you ever have before of his asking her not to love him? I consider it an original proceeding. I shall tell Mr. Harrington I have had an anti-proposal."

"But, Miss—Miss Hunter, you have certainly led me to suppose—"

"Then I am sorry, Mr. Paddleford. I certainly didn't mean to!"

"Oh, Miss Emily, if I could only believe you! But your capricious conduct—"

Emily had fallen to laughing again, and Apollos thoughtfully picked up his hat and walked away. He was not quite sure that his delicate intentions had been at fault, but he tried to believe they had. Heaven be praised, he had done his duty any way! A narrow escape for a tender-hearted youth; but how exquisitely he had handled the subject! He was astonished at his own dexterity.

Emily remarked to Mr. Harrington that she thought the Magnifico showed some signs of mortification as he strode away from the house with lowered head. Charles said No, that was constitutionally impossible. Charles was probably right. At nay rate on Emily's wedding-day the undaunted lord of creation was heard to say:

"Far be it from me to boast of my conquests; but there is a woman who married from pique. To one who understands law terms I should say Charles Harrington may be considered the 'resistanqy legatee' of her affections. That is to say, he receives all the blighted love she has left to bestow, after a—ahem!—to use plain English, after a serious disappointment!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LIGHT DIET—The Feat of Lanterns.

LEAP-YEAR.
Eighteen sixty-eight is an important year.
It is leap-year,
Of which fact I wish to remind the ladies.
There is a division of opinions as to the right of a woman to vote, but there can be no question as to her right to a husband—if she can get one.
But I would advise young ladies not to be rash.
Although it is leap-year, you had better look before you leap.
Because if you get a husband, and he don't suit you, you can't change him for a better one—at least without going to Chicago.
I wouldn't advise any young woman to marry a man who would expect her to support them.
Young ladies need not inquire too particularly whether the man of their choice belongs to a lodge which meets four nights a week.
She will find that out after they are married.
Husbands, like other domestic animals, when caught young can sometimes be trained to do a good many useful things.
They have also been known to get up in the morning and light the fire when the girl had gone away.
There are some professions not advisable to marry into.
But on the great object is to get a husband, and as the supply is limited, it may not do to be too particular.

CURIOUS EPITAPHS.
On a Loquacious Lady.
"Here rests in silent clay
Miss Arabella Young.
Who, on the 21st of May,
Began to hold her tongue."
On a Work-house Pauper.
"Thou Corpse."
On an Infant.
"She never cried her love."
On a Dyer.
"Beneath this turf a man doth lie,
Who dyed to live, and lived to die."
On an Old Man.
"Here lies Old Bill,
A man of skill,
His age was one hundred and three times ten;
He ne'er did good,
Nor ever would,
Had he lived as long again."
On a Bad Butcher
"At threescore winters' end I died,
A cheerless being, lone and sad;
The nuptial knot I never tied,
And wished my father never had"
On a Mr. Box.
"Here lies one Box within another,
The one of wood was very good,
We can not say so much for t'other."
On a Physician.
"Here lies the corpse of Dr. Chard,
Who filled the yard of this church-yard."

A WAY WITH MELANCHOLY—Suicide.

A gentleman passing along Water Street the other evening, detected a boy picking his pocket, and, seizing him, had determined to have him committed, when the boy begged heartily for mercy. "For indeed, sir," said he, "it is my first offense; here's your own handkerchief again, and take any of these few you like best."

WANTED—An ear from the head of a river, a feather from the wing of a house, a toe from the foot of a mountain, a hair from the tail of the "Twin Cities," a tooth from the mouth of a river, the buttons from a coat of paint, a bone from the arm of a sea, a shingle from the roof of a month.

"Electricity," said the scientific D., "travels faster than light." "Yes," said the reflective B., "It is easier to shock than to instruct."

A few weeks ago a cow dashed down the Mississippi on a piece of ice, and appeared such a cold thing as has yielded nothing but ice-cream since.

HORSE-FLESH AND TRIMMINGS.

MASTER OF THE HOUSE. "You my Life it's too bad! This is the Second Time Cook's forgotten to take the Shoes off. I'll discharge her this very night!" etc., etc.

ELDERLY GENTLEMAN (affected). "You haven't got such a thing as a Tumblerful of Pale Brandy in the Room, have you?"

GENERAL SIGNS.

To take down the gridiron from the nail where it is hanging with the left hand is a sign that there will be a broil in the kitchen.

If a mirror is broken it is a sign that a good-looking glass will be missed in that house.

If you hear a rooster crow when you are in bed and the clock strike a few times at the same instant it is a sign of uncommon luck.

To stroke a green-eyed cat with a white spot on her nose is lucky, and a hairy paw will be the consequence.

If you are in a house and hear a baby cry it is a sign of marriage, or if it isn't it ought to be.

To lose a pocket-book containing greenbacks is unlucky.

A clergyman was once sent for in the middle of the night by one of the ladies of his congregation. "Well, my poor woman," said he, "so you are very ill, and require the consolations of religion?" "What can I do for you?" "No," replied the old lady, "I am only nervous and can't sleep." "How can I help that?" asked the parson. "Oh, Sir, you always put me to sleep so nicely when I go to church, that I thought if you would only preach a little for me!" The parson made tracks.

I dearly luv the flegein' bird,
And little buzzin' bee,
But dearer than them all the world,
Is thy sweet voice to me.

Oh, very deep is daddy's well,
And very cold the water,
But deeper in my bosum is
The luv I bear for her.

Then smile on me, dear Angeline,
And you shall have the hull
Back the big dog and I will cum
A cortin' Sunday nite.

THE REAL PHANTOM SAIL.—A mock auction.

X, a French husband, discovered that Z, a French bachelor, was seeking to make himself too acceptable to Mrs. X, and that the lady, being French, was inclined to listen. Thereupon X went away from the island, and, after a short time, his wife learns by telegraph that he has fallen off a mountain, and that she is a widow. She bores no time in tenderly confiding to Z that, at a proper date, she may reward his love with her hand. That very night the lover bolts into Belgium. The husband returns! But his wife cured of her folly, and they live happy ever afterward.

THE FRUITS OF GOOD LIVING—The Pine, Olive, and Grape.

A POOR RELATION—Telling an anecdote badly.

When is a fast young fellow like a feather?—When he's on a lark.

When was Nicholas Longworth a pork-packer?—When he barreled his opwine.

Why is the little end of nothing like the first navigator?—Because it's nowhere.

Why is an ill-digested idea like a sailors' chorus?—Because it's a crew-dity.

SOLDIERS' MESSENGER COMPANY.

A most sensible, humane, and practical project for the aid and employment of our disabled soldiers has been lately started in New York city, and its practical plan of organization are well worthy of imitation in the other great cities of the country. The one which is now being established in that city promises to be very successful in a benevolent, but in a financial point of view, and to result not only in giving employment to a worthy and needy class, but in establishing that great desideratum in every metropolis—a city dispatch and transit company.

A certificate of incorporation of the "Soldiers' Business Messenger and Dispatch Company" was chartered in April, 1867, and subsequently organized by the election of General Alexander SHALER, President of the Board of Fire Commissioners, as its President. General HENRY A. BARNUM, General J. H. LADOMUCE, and others are associated with him, and will give character, responsibility, and vigor to the enterprise.

This new company proposes to place, at certain points in certain districts, into which they will divide this city and Brooklyn, booths, such as that which we illustrate on page 156, to the number of 300. Many have, indeed, already been erected. Each of these will be used as an advertising medium, and a shop for the sale of newspapers, magazines, stationery, cutlery, and the like. In each will be placed a maimed soldier as custodian and salesman, with the rank of corporal, preference being given to those who are unable to do messenger duty. These booths will be depôts for the reception of parcels, letters, or other messages. Between these the messengers will pass as they patrol their district, taking up the messages or packages en route, where their receipt has been duly recorded beforehand by the corporal in charge. When a gentleman is in so his way from booth to booth is stopped by a citizen, and receives a message to deliver on his route, he will report its nature at his first stopping-place, where the record will be made. If the delivery is not in his direction he will leave the packet there, to be given to its proper carrier, and so on. As messengers in this way will constantly patrol their district, they will always be in reach of citizens who require their services, and who may wish to save themselves walking to the nearest booth. This carrying of parcels and messages is not all. Special wagons are to be used upon the railroad tracks, to run hourly or semi-hourly, as it may be found desirable. These will carry heavy packages, grocers' supplies, and the like, to the extreme end of the island or to intermediate points, and telegraphic wires will be laid, so that messages may be sent in this way from certain points designated to any other within the district. Arrangements have been or are about being made with a telegraph company to use their poles throughout the city to this end. A message will be delivered 10 blocks distant for 10 cents; 15, 12 cents; 20, 15 cents; 25, 17 cents; 30, 20 cents; 35, 22 cents; 40, 24 cents; 45 to 140 blocks, 25 cents. Packages under 2 pounds 10 blocks distant for 12 cents; 140 blocks, 35 cents, and the intermediate distances at proportionate rates. So on with packages, bundles, or boxes, a gradual increase of tariff with weight until they reach 75 to 100 pounds; this will be carried 10 blocks for 30 cents, 140 blocks for 62 cents, and intermediate distances in proportion.

BOOTH OF THE NEW SOLDIERS' MESSENGER COMPANY.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

We shall watch with interest the development of the plans of this institution, and hope to see it realize its promise to the full in giving to New York a messenger and dispatch system rapid and punctual in its labors, an honest worker in all directions, and a field of respectable and fairly remunerative labor for the disabled soldiers of our city.

A STREET SCENE.

RACING is not confined to Jerome Park; sleighing is not an exclusively Fifth Avenue enjoyment; and the long-continued sleighing season has been appreciated and improved by all classes of high and low degree. Races between the truckmen and expressmen, butchers and milkmen, have been of daily occurrence, and for weeks past the New York streets have been lively with such scenes as that of "Pork versus Milk" which we illustrate on this page.

A NEW YORK STREET SCENE—"PORK VERSUS MILK."—[SKETCHED BY H. C. BIRPHAM.]

MEDANOS IN THE PAMPA OF ISLAY, PERU.

TAMBO OF LA JOYA, PAMPA OF ISLAY, PERU.

GENERAL CANSECO, ACTUAL PRESIDENT OF PERU.

it to say that about two years ago a native Arequipan, General CANSECO, second Vice-President, incited a revolution against General PEZET, who, as first Vice-President, had become President on the death of General SAN ROMAN. It was alleged that PEZET had betrayed his country to the Spaniards, and was acting in collusion with them. But CANSECO was unable to direct the revolution he had raised. He was deposed by a younger aspirant for place, Colonel PRADO, who made himself Dictator. He gained much popularity by beating off the Spaniards at Callao, and on the strength of that achievement he was elected President. He then attempted, in framing a new Constitution, to curtail the power of the Romish clergy, and thereby made an enemy of the Church. He lost popularity by this movement, and made many enemies.

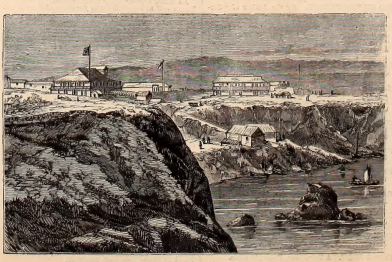
It was now CANSECO's turn. He left the capital, Lima, and returned to Arequipa, where he incited a new revolution against the man who had profited by his previous one. PRADO endeavored to crush him in his strong-hold, but was defeated, as stated, on the 27th of December last, and compelled to leave the country, while CANSECO enjoys his triumph in Lima.

Arequipa, the scene of this struggle, is the second city of Peru in respect of population. It contains about 50,000 inhabitants, and, in many respects, is one of the most interesting towns in South America. It was founded by PIZARRO in 1540, at the base of the great volcano Misti, 20,300 feet in height. This symmetrical colossus is crowned with

PERUVIAN INFANTRY AND CAVALRY.

THE PERUVIAN REVOLUTION.

THE Republic of Peru enjoys annually about 30 earthquakes, which upset all houses over two stories in height; it also indulges, in the same space of time, in at least one political revolution, which overturns all existing forms of government. The last revolution in that unfortunate country culminated on December 27, 1867, at Arequipa, in the failure of President PRADO to capture that city, which he had for some time besieged. We illustrate on this page the scene of the struggle between PRADO and General CANSECO for the supremacy in the government; together with several engravings illustrating the peculiarities of the country in which the campaign was made, sketches of the troops, and a portrait of the victorious chieftain.



The detailed history of this last struggle would require more space than we can give to it. Suffice eternal snow, and forms, with the other nevados of the Cordilleras, a magnificent back-ground to the city.

CITY OF AREQUIPA AND VOLCANO OF MISTI, PERU.

As every well-informed reader knows, the whole Pacific coast of Peru, between the Cordilleras and the sea, is a vast sandy desert, where rain never falls, and is only relieved by occasional transverse, ribbon-like strips of verdure, marking the courses of the streams or torrents that flow down from the mountains, where they are fed by the melting snows. Arequipa stands where one of these streams, the Rio Chile, debouches from the vast gorges of the Cordilleras, a hundred miles back from the sea, forming an oasis in the desert of considerable extent and of great beauty and fertility. The Incas had made an establishment here to facilitate communication between Cuzco, their capital, and the coast; and the name of the city comes from two Quichua words—ari quepui, signifying "Yes; rest here." Most of the trade of those vast districts of interior Peru, the departments of Cuzco and Puno, is carried on through Arequipa, and has made it, together with its local resources, rich and luxurious. Standing at an elevation of 7850 feet above the sea, its climate is delightful. Its principal drawback is the frequency of earthquakes, by which it has several times been ruined. To guard against the effects of these shocks the dwelling-houses are low, never exceeding two stories in height, and are built of a white volcanic stone, with their roofs and ceilings vaulted with the same material. The suburbs are surrounded by a massive wall, and the town is embellished with two well-shaded alamedas or public walks. The Cathedral is a large, modern building, and is believed by the inhabitants to be among the finest structures in the world. It has a bell, cast in the city, of greater size than that of St. Paul's, London. The principal square and market-place, of which we give a view, is 450 feet square. One side is occupied by the Cathedral, and the other sides by various municipal buildings resting on arcades.

PORT OF ISLAY, PERU.

GRAND PLAZA AND MARKET-PLACE OF AREQUIPA, PERU.

The people of Arequipa claim to be the most active, enterprising, vivacious, and intelligent in Peru, and the claim is well founded. Most of the names in Peruvian history, whether in government, art, literature, or commerce, are of Arequipans, and the women of Arequipa are far from yielding the palm of beauty to their more famous sisters of Lima, while they prove by assert their intellectual supremacy. A strong jealousy of Lima exists in Arequipa, and the two cities are seldom in political accord; and as the Arequipans are most active, restless, and impetuous, they are almost always the leaders in political intrigue or in revolution. What Lyons is in France, so is Arequipa in Peru. As a consequence, it has suffered much from the civil wars that it has so frequently provoked, but never probably so gravely as in the one just closed, when it was bombarded for three days by the forces of General Prado.

From the description we have given of the sandy desert of Peru it is easy to conceive that campaigning in that country is very difficult. These deserts are called pampas, and over one of them, known as the Pampa of Islay, General Prado had to march to reach Arequipa from its port, Islay. This desert waste is ninety miles broad, and for the space of seventy miles not a drop of water is to be found in it. The passage of this desert is usually accomplished, as sportsmen would say, "at the full gallop," and is a severe trial of physical endurance. Yet there is hardly a lady in Arequipa who has not often accomplished it.

For the most part the sand is dry and very smooth by the winds, and unrelieved by any thing except an occasional stone and the more frequent skeletons of mules and horses that have perished by the way. In places, however, the traveler comes upon great heaps formed by the drifting sands, called medanos. These are of varying size, from those which are only ten or twenty yards in length and six to eight feet high, to those which are half a mile long and about the ninety feet high. They are all crescent-shaped, with the horns of the crescent toward the wind, and as regular and sharp in outline as the new moon itself. Some, which have a core of rock, rise permanently, but most are shifting, varying in shape and position with the varying winds. These substances are known in which not only individuals but portions of travelers and domesticated animals have been buried beneath them in their sudden changes. In the deserts, where little flakes of mica cover the sands, these, being of the same color, will drift over the crest of the medano, and falling on the inner side, make it appear, under certain lights, as if piled with burnished silver.

The only refuge or sign of life in the dreary pampas of Islay is the rude little tambo, or resting-place, of La Joya, midway between Arequipa and its port. It is rough and uncomfortable enough, but affords rest and water and a little food to the weary traveler and his weary horse. Yet this water is brought from a distance of many leagues on the backs of mules, and is sold at a price per quart higher than that of good wine in the provinces of France.

The Port of Islay is simply a rough, rocky, dangerous landing-place, partly protected by existing, rocky headland from the heavy swell of the Pacific. The few dirty and extortionate tambos, the dwellings of the custom-house officers—and a storehouse or two, constitute all there is of the place. Water here, as at La Joya, is brought from a distance, as is also the food for man and beast. From the sea the place appears picturesque enough, but no illusions can be kept up when once you enter it.

The Peruvian army is made up almost exclusively of Indians or negroes, or cholos. The Indians constitute the infantry, and have become accustomed to travel on foot in the mountainous interior from which they have wonderful vigor and endurance on the march. The negroes are confined to the plains of the coast, and are accustomed to riding and to the management of mules and horses. Hence the peculiar distribution.

The Peruvian soldiers are tractable, and if well led are brave as any in the world. The native Indian tenacity and stubbornness are excellent elements in the composition of the soldier. Almost every Peruvian foot-soldier is attended by his cholo, who may be, but is not generally, his wife. She marches with him, cooks and mends of what few rags he carries his knapsack sometimes his musket, and always the little roll of matting which, when unfolded and supported on a couple of sticks, constitutes his tent. It is of little moment on which side the Indian fights. He knows nothing about the political squabbles of the country, and cares less. But the case has been different in past years, and will be again, when the rapidly-approaching struggle for supremacy between the Indians and the descendants of the conquerors takes place.

LOST SUNSHINE.

Ora Hone is emptied of Delight;
It is no more the house of joy
That once shone with his presence bright,
That echoed to his laughter light,
His bounding step upon the stair,
His joyous accents every where—
It is no more our home, without our Boy.

All's Gloom, although the sunbeams glow
On yonder church-yard Tomb and Cross
(So pearly, so purified, even though
His brothers' footsteps come and go,
And voices, that are dear to me
As living voices e'er can be),
Too young for the dreariness of their loss.

Ah, Room wherein our dear one lay!
As sacred as the sacred Fane
Wherein he now doth rest and pray—
The good seed ripened day by day,
Is sown! In the air, in the blessed
And on upon his death-bed laid,
He is one of the Lord's Harvest, golden grain!

Oh, manly Form that never more
Shall swell this yearning heart with pride!
Oh, bright Eyes that no more shall see
Its best for me!—I watch the door,
Half-hoping, half-fearing, that they gaze!
My sorrow gives me such amaze,
At times I know it is not so, he died."

The landscape now has lost its charm,
The home view he was wont to prize
(Ah, how he loved each path and farm!)
The very air now lacks its balm,
The point of care upon my pain
Is silent; and his gun can wake
No echo; a man must have eyes to take.

Yet dwells he in some heavenly home
Far fairer; and about him lie
The plains and heaven, from which come
To Thy good time, where grief is dumb;
Not on with me, and on this speech
The depth of our distress to reach,
But where There will be time for from every eye.

My boy, my Bayard without stain,
Whom the world loved, yet solid not;
We would have spared you one pain,
Else you would feel it; but would fain
Still think, that you are with me now
In Jesus' breast, that you and we Have yet many years to journey,
That somehow, Sweet, we are not quite forgot.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM IN FRANCE.

A MOVEMENT has lately been made in France in connection with the education of young women and girls which considerably disturbs the Romish Church authorities. Hitherto, while there has been no restriction as to the Church more or less directly, through nunneries, schools, and similar establishments, has had the chief control of the education of girls. Latterly, however, it has become pretty common for young ladies to attend what are called cours—that is, courses of lectures on various subjects, comprising that more robustness and solidity is imparted to the mode of instruction. The present French Minister of Public Instruction, M. Duruy, being a great admirer of this system, resolved to give it his personal position and encouragement. He announced his intention of opening his own cours an official basis in connection with the Imperial University, and called upon the municipal bodies and the University professors to assist in their establishment. The Bishop of Orleans, M. Dupanloup, denounced the scheme in his fiercest style, and declared that the ruin of ruin for young ladies would result from the giving of instruction now designed for them. The true reversion of the Education papers in his closing words: "Our young ladies have hitherto been educated on the knees of the Church; we are now going to pass them into the arms of the University." The immediate effect of this opposition was to flood the Paris cours with applicants, among whom, it is said, are the two nieces of the Empress, the Milles. de Montijo. It is plain that the movement has struck a result of the effort now so general in regard to education wholly from religious influences of every kind.

OUR INTEREST TO EVERY BODY.—Since the advent of the Star Shuttle Sewing Machine in the market, about ten thousand, and such unprecedented testimonials of their merits, that we have compiled them to enlarge the machine, and otherwise improve it, that now the Star Shuttle Sewing Machine is without a rival. The machine deserves great credit for assuming the responsibility of putting up the Stitch Shuttle Sewing Machine in the market at such a very low price, in direct competition with the five-and-six-and high-priced machines.—Communicated.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and money. Those who desire more full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Send new books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents.

DAVID WILKINSON & CO.,
29 Courtlandt Street, New York.

TO the WORKING CLASS.—Farmers, Mechanics, and Boys, we offer employment that will pay you handsomely with constant employment at your homes—the whole of your time, or spare moments, as you prefer. Business new, light, and profitable. So cts. to $5 per evening is easily earned by industrious persons, and the boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. Great inducements are offered those who will devote their whole time to the business; and, that every person who sees this notice may make their address, and test the business for themselves, I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, &c., sent free. Sample sent by mail for ten cents. Address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Maine.

$5 NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Simple, rapid, strong, easy, reliable, elegant. Warranted. Stitch alike on both sides. Price $5. No premiums. Single Machines sent cash on receipt of $5. Family Sewing Machine Co., 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

EDWD. J. EVANS & CO.,
Nurserymen and Seedsmen,
York, Pennsylvania.
Illustrated Descriptive Prait and Seed Catalogues mailed to any address on receipt of stamp.

$60. FOR ESSARD INSTITUTE.—Spring term of 13 weeks begins March 26. $60 for board, washing, fuel, and common English. Brick buildings, 16 teachers, classical, scientific, commercial, and musical departments. For 13 years the best sustained boarding seminary in Pennsylvania. Address, J. B. FORSARD, "Alpine Christian Institution, impartially non-sectarian." Address, for catalogues, or forms, JOSEPH E. KING, P.O. Fort Edward, N.Y. 28th Studies accompanied by a Preparatory Department.

$5 PER HOUR realized by our Agents. For particulars address A. J. FULLAM, Springfield, Vt.

$15 NOVELTY SEWING AND EMBROIDERING MACHINE is the only cheap Machine manufactured in America, and will do all kinds of work done by the high-priced machines. It makes the famous Elastic Stitch, which will not rip or break if every third stitch be cut. Run by hand or foot. Price $15. Agents wanted. Machines sent on receipt of price. Address PRESCH, GILBERT & CO., 614 Broadway, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Ready:

I.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND. A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1867. Edited by William Smith, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

II.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL. Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal during the Years of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Extracts from Journals. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

III.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Baron Christian Stockmar. With a Portrait. New Edition. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

IV.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By Samuel Smiles, Author of "Self-Help," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

V.

DU CHAILLU'S GORILLA COUNTRY. Stories of the Gorilla Country: Narrated for Young People. By Paul B. Du Chaillu, Author of "Explorations in Equatorial Africa." Profusely Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

VI.

MRS. COMFORT'S FAMILY STORIES. Folks and Fairies: Stories for Little Children. By Lucy Rankney Comfort. With Engravings. Square 4to, Cloth, $1 00.

VII.

BARNES'S EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century. Delivered in the Mercer Street Church, New York, January 21 to February 21, 1867. By the "Rev. Albert Barnes, late Princeton Theological Seminary. By Albert Barnes, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," &c. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

VIII.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dictionary. Translated by Two Thousand Appliances as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Passion. Post 8vo, Cloth, $2 50; Gilt Edges, $3 25.

IX.

THREE ENGLISH STATESMEN: Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt. A Course of Lectures on the Political History of England. By Goldwin Smith, Author of "Lectures on the Study of History," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW NOVELS
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

MY HUSBAND'S CRIME. With Illustrations by Harry Fenn. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

LORRIMER COUNTRY FAMILY. By Madame De Witt, née Guizot. Translated by Susan Mecrae Crane, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Noble Life," "Olive," "Mistress and Maid," "Life of Edward Irving," &c. 8vo, P., 25 cents.

MARGARET'S ENGAGEMENT. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By Annie Thomas, Author of "On Guard," "Denis Donne," "Theo Leigh," "Walter Goring," "Quiet Quit," "Called to Account," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

GUILD COURT. A London Story. By George Mac Donald, Author of "Alec Forbes," "Robert Falconer," "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," "Alec Forbes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE BROTHERS' BET; or, Within Six Weeks. By Emily Foley. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. By Sarah Tytler. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

MABEL'S PROGRESS. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WATERDALE NEIGHBORS. By the Author of "Paul Manicle." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CARLTON'S YEAR. By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

STONE EDGE. A Tale. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

By J. L. MOTLEY.

THE DUTCH REPUBLIC. The Rise of the Dutch Republic. A History. By John Lothrop Motley. With a Portrait of William of Orange. 3 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $10 50.

THE UNITED NETHERLANDS. History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce. With a full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By J. Lothrop Motley, LL.D., D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Portraits. 4 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

All the essentials of a great writer Mr. Motley eminently possesses. His mind is broad, his industry unwearied. In power of analysis, Macaulay is the only modern historian—except perhaps Mr. Carlyle—surpasses him, and in analysis of character he is elaborate and distinct.—Westminster Review.

Mr. Motley—we say it with English homage.—London Times.

Mr. Motley's place is now with Hallam and Lord Mahon, Alison and Macaulay, in the old country, and with Washington Irving, Prescott, and Bancroft in this.—New York Times.

The name of Motley now stands in the front rank of living historians.—Church Journal.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

12TH HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$15 PER DAY, SURE, and no money required in advance. Agents wanted everywhere to sell our Patent Everlasting Metallic Cloths-Lines. Send for circular. Address the SILVER WIRE CO., 162 Broadway, N. Y., or 16 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

$2 00 to $5 00

FOR every hour's service, pleasant and honorable duties, suitable for farmers, merchants, mechanics, soldiers, every body. W. JACKSON & CO., 80 Beaver Street, New York.

IMPORTANT. An entirely new article, just by peddler. A chance for making money rarely offered. Endless sales after the first purchase. Address "UNIVERSAL INDEX CO.," Box 1706, Boston.

LOVE & STEPHENS'S FAMILY DYE COLORS. Thirty different shades, all warranted fast colors and clear shade, all to powder form. We advise the use of the Black, Blue, Green, and Red, in the powder form. For sale by all druggists and dealers.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

MARCH, 1868.

In the Number for January was commenced "The Woman's Kingdom: A Love Story," by Miss Dinah Craik, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructive monthly variety of reading for all.—Boston Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

In the Number for June was commenced the issue of "The Mountains," a Novel, by Wilkie Collins, Author of "The Woman in White," &c.

The model newspaper of our country.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Able articles upon public questions which appear in Harper's Weekly form a remarkable series of brief political essays.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

In it is now being published "The Curd and Crème," a Novel, by Jessie Benton Frémont.

The Bazar, so an intelligent critic upon all feminine topics, will doubtless become the Queen of American newspapers.—Albion.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00; any two for $7 00.

Specimen Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $2 00 per Volume, sent by mail, postage paid, free of Expense to the Subscriber. Cloth Covers, for preserving the Numbers for a Year, will be furnished for $1 00, freight or postage paid by the Publishers.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY, one year, Twenty-four Cents; BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, and 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will please to state with what number their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the time paid for expires, as no bills are sent, necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. Names cannot be erased or changed, nor can the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting, by Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $63—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line, each insertion.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., Removed from 42 to 37 and 39 Nassau St., Opposite the P. O.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIODE WATCH FACTORY.

ORIODE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are fitted with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time, appearance, durability, and time they have never been excelled by watches costing five times as much. Each one bears the name, "C. E. COLLINS & CO.," Factory and Laboratory Cases. For this warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time for fifteen years. Equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one small sum may one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oriode Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money used as if paid with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.,37 AND 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the Philadelphia Press.

THE ORIODE WATCH.—By reference to the advertisement of Messrs. Collins & Co., it will be seen that the firm claims to give a really good watch, and at a very low cost, for fifteen dollars. Gentle is evidently humbug, and will be discarded by gold, wearing like it, and never changing color like pinchbeck. We have examined these watches and found them good and cheap—two having been purchased at retail price by gentlemen of this city, and have satisfied themselves they are fully what Messrs. Collins & Co. represent them to be. Their lines are neatly and tastefully finished as the best gold cases, and we should be more than pleased to see these watches are very beautiful, and we know of no present so cheap which would be more appreciated. The very small proportion of gold which is given in most of the so-called gold watches of the present day renders them practically of no greater value than oriode.

BLACKSHEAR, GEORGIA, January 6, 1868.

C. E. Collins & Co., Nassau Street, New York:

GENTS.—I have just seen one of your gold fifteen dollar ($15) watches, and must have one immediately. You will please ship at your earliest convenience one of the same kind to me. If I'm satisfied with it I'll get a good many more. I have just seen I can make a good trade for you in this part of the country.

J. S. COLLINS, S. A. and G. M. Third Judicial District, Georgia.

Yours respectfully,

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, January 10, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTS.—I have carried one of your oriode watches some time. It keeps good time, and keeps its color good. I am well pleased with it. Mine is a large size, at $15, and I have others of smaller size.

A. H. BISCOE, 256 So. Desplaine, Chicago, Illinois.

FORT SUMNER, NEW MEXICO, December 28, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

